THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

THIRTY-SIXTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Offshore Supplies Office

1. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to increase the staffing and extend the role of the Offshore Supplies Office; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): I shall continue to ensure that the Offshore Supplies Office is sufficiently staffed to enable it to fulfil its important role.

Dr. Godman: Does the Minister agree that the role and staffing of the OSO should be increased over the next few years to deal with what will be the Petroleum Act? Is the Minister satisfied with the OSO's role in securing contracts for United Kingdom companies? Naturally, I am primarily concerned with the fortunes of Scott Lithgow.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I pay tribute to the staff at the OSO who are hard-working and dedicated, and who are ensuring that British industry has a full and fair opportunity to win orders. I expect that for 1986, United Kingdom firms will have gained more than 80 per cent. of the orders available. That demonstrates the success of its work. I want that to continue, as I know the hon. Gentleman does. I am grateful to him for what he said.

Mr. Rowlands: Given the admission by the Government that 20,000 jobs have been lost in the oil industry in the last 12 months or more, and given the awful announcement today of the loss of highly skilled jobs at Huntings, one of our most internationally renowned consultancies, should the Government not be bringing forward more positive measures to stimulate development and exploration of the North sea, instead of this misplaced confidence and attitude that the Minister has shown today?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman does not appear to have noticed that there has been a substantial drop in the price of oil, which has a great effect on the industry. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman does not acknowledge that.

The situation is difficult at the moment because of the drop in the price of oil. The hon. Gentleman has also overlooked the fact that at the end of last year we improved the industry's cash flow by some £300 million through the early repayment of advance petroleum revenue tax. The hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that action has been taken.

Oil and Oil-Related Construction Activity

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current level of oil and oil-related construction activity in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The total contract tonnage associated with current developments on the United Kingdom continental shelf which has been awarded to United Kingdom construction yards, is around 200,000 tonnes. That construction work takes place over a period of time related to each project schedule.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Minister for that reply, but may I underline—I know that he is very conscious of this—the extremely depressing effect that the oil slump has had on construction-related activity in the Highlands? Will his Department be sympathetically disposed towards accepting evidence from, for example, the Highland regional council as to the related impact which the regional development cuts have had on the oil-related construction sector in the Highlands, which has acted as a double blow against it, and which also underlines the need for further tax concessions in the forthcoming Budget?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Highland regional council has been in touch with my Department and I am sensitive to what the hon. Gentleman says. In my own area, Grampian regional council has said the same thing. Both councils have taken the opportunity of giving evidence to the Select Committee on Energy which is looking into these problems. I accept that there are much wider repercussions to the economy of these areas, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is aware of the problems and shares my concern.

Mr. Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend give the House an update of onshore exploration and development, particularly that which is related to sensitive areas of the south of England?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Onshore activity has continued and there was considerable interest in the first onshore licensing round. It provides opportunities for smaller British firms to get involved, but I know that my hon. Friend acknowledges that, as I have said previously, any activity is strictly controlled under planning legislation and environmental considerations are involved. That must be right.

Nuclear Power Stations

3. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received about the Government's long-term policy towards nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): I have received a number of letters, principally in relation to Sizewell B.

Mr. Thompson: The Secretary of State's response was very brief. Bearing in mind the fact that since the publication of the Sizewell B report, the chairman of the CEGB has said that he wants to press ahead with nuclear power stations in other parts of Britain, will the right hon. Gentleman carefully consider the folly of the proposition that a group of nuclear power stations should be built on a coastal strip of Northumberland, adjacent to a profitable and extensive coalfield and close to a coal-fired power station, which is owned by the CEGB and is ripe for coal-fired development?

Mr. Walker: From the statements by the CEGB chairman that I have seen, I know that he has mentioned the board's interest in new coal-fired stations. However, I have received only an application for Sizewell B and that is the only one on which I can comment.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a PWR is urgent and would be competitive and timely as the only power station that is likely to be commissioned before 1995 when it will be required?

Mr. Walker: I cannot comment on such matters until I have made a decision on Sizewell B.

Mr. Dormand: Will the Secretary of State go further than he went in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) and address himself to the unemployment problem in the north-east? Productivity is greater than ever in our coalfield and it would be a suitable place for a coal-fired power station. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman accepts that it would be cheaper to build and run a coal-fired station than a nuclear power station.

Mr. Walker: I know that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that I cannot comment on his final point until I have made a decision on the report that I have received. I believe that the coal industry in the north-east has considerable importance for the future and I am pleased that the enterprise company is bringing new jobs to the region. I hope that that will be on an ever-increasing scale. I am certainly aware of the unemployment dimensions of the problem.

Dr. Michael Clark: Among all the representations about the future of nuclear power, has my right hon. Friend received any that point out the need to conserve hydrocarbon fuels, particularly as they will be chemical feedstocks in the future and will be a source of man-made fibres, fertilisers and plastics, as well as premium fuel for aviation use?

Mr. Walker: I have received representations on almost every aspect of energy and every possible use of energy. The factors mentioned by my hon. Friend deserve careful consideration.

Mr. Orme: The Secretary of State mentioned that the CEGB has been talking about new coal-fired power stations. Will he comment on reports in the press and elsewhere that the Treasury is very much opposed to that type of development?

Mr. Walker: I read with amazement the newspaper report that a debate was taking place between the Treasury and myself. No such debate was taking place.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As the CEGB will be applying later this year to build a PWR at Hinkley Point in Somerset, will my right hon. Friend ensure that, while safety requirements must be rigorous, the planning inquiry will be more narrowly focused and that it will take less than a year to reach a conclusion?

Mr. Walker: As I have not been informed of any such application by the CEGB, I cannot comment on it. I know that people in Somerset or any other area will want the proper planning considerations to take place, and that should be done within a limited time scale, which gives enough time for objectors, but does not delay important decisions.

Dismissed Miners (Review)

5. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the chairman of British Coal has kept him informed about the results of his review of cases involving dismissed miners; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): On 8 September 1986, the chairman of British Coal announced a final internal review that would look at all outstanding cases of alleged unfair dismissal arising from the National Union of Mineworkers strike. The result of that review is not yet available, although I understand it is now nearing completion.

Mr. Eadie: Since it was in October last year that the chairman of British Coal promised a review of the cases of the dismissed miners, is it not time that we knew the results of that review? Is the Minister aware that, despite the fact that the strike has been over for two years, 113 Scottish miners are still dismissed? Is the Minister aware that the dispute will never be over until justice is seen to be done and these men from all over the country are reinstated?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman is aware that the dismissal and re-employment of employees is a matter for British Coal. Indeed that would be the case with any employer. The hon. Gentleman will also be aware that, of the 1,014 members dismissed as a result of that tragic and unnecessary strike, over half have been taken back. I plead with the hon. Gentleman for one moment to lift up his eyes from his normal Scargill brief and to recognise that the barriers to progress, which have been built up over the years by negative attitudes and entrenched by restrictive practices, are coming down all over the coal industry. It is about time that the hon. Gentleman recognised that the only power left to Arthur Scargill appears to be the control that he exercises over the Labour party's energy policy.

Mr. Hannam: When discussing coalfield manning will my hon. Friend congratulate the chairman of British Coal on the acceptance by the South Wales miners at Margam, as a result of their vote last Thursday, of the six-day shift system? Has my hon. Friend noted that that vote took place exactly two years to the day after the end of the coal strike?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend is right to point out that a far better topic of conversation with the chairman of British Coal would be the important meeting on Margam. My hon. Friend is right that that vote took place exactly two years to the day after the tragic and unnecessary strike.

The industry has moved on and I wish that Opposition Members would recognise that. The industry has moved away from the political strikes of the past and from the negative, confrontational style of Arthur Scargill and towards the most positive attitude to productivity ever seen by the nation.

Mr. Allen McKay: Does the Minister agree that his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) was less than helpful? Our concern is for miners who have been dismissed — in some cases for reasons that would not have warranted dismissal in normal circumstances. Some of the cases for dismissal result from stealing a bit of coal and the Minister and I would have done that if we had found ourselves in similar circumstances. [Interruption.] If Conservative Members would not have done, they have forgotten their marriage vows. Does the Minister agree that it would be a good stroke for industrial relations to make a magnanimous gesture in these cases?

Mr. Hunt: As well as hoping that the hon. Gentleman will regret some of his words, I wish to make it clear that what I was protesting about is that Opposition Members are aware that these are matters for British Coal and that a review is being carried out. Over half the miners concerned have already been taken back. It is not a matter for Ministers.

Mr. Pollock: When my hon. Friend next meets the chairman of British Coal will he take the opportunity to congratulate, through him, the management and the work force on achieving record levels of productivity? Surely, it is that productivity that offers a better prospect of security and continuity of employment for the work force?

Mr. Hunt: I believe that the enthusiasm and determination of the men and management in pushing through the new productivity records will take the industry into a stable and viable future. It will ensure good markets and job security.

North-East Leicestershire Coalfields

6. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last discussed the development of the north-east Leicestershire coalfields with the chairman of the Coal Board.

Mr. Hunt: My right hon. Friend and I have regular meetings with the chairman of British Coal to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that pits in north-west Leicestershire are closing down rapidly and that it is vital that new pits are opened in north-east Leicestershire? There has been exploration and an inspector's report approving a pit additional to Asfordby. Will the new pits be opened in time to preserve the jobs and the work of the excellent Leicestershire coal miners?

Mr. Hunt: I understand that British Coal is still considering the future of the rest of the Belvoir coalfield, and it is for it to assess the relative attractions of potential investment projects. British Coal is discussing a six-day shift in south Wales and the good news is that discussions have been going on with the trade unions on mulit-shift workings at Asfordby. If the discussions reach a successful conclusion, the mine will be uprated to production of 3·5 million tonnes a year and the number of jobs available will be in excess of 1,500.

Mr. Ashby: Will my hon. Friend give priority to the south Leicestershire coalfield miners, who have endured a number of job losses and worked in extremely difficult circumstances? They are known to be some of the best miners in the country. I ask my hon. Friend to recall that in the south midlands coalfield production is at a record level. The miners in this area would be a tremendous enchancement to the mining industry if they were kept on and given priority for jobs within the Leicestershire coalfield.

Mr. Hunt: Decisions on the manning of these pits must be a matter for British Coal. My hon. Friend is right to recognise the men's tremendous effort in his area — in Leicestershire and in the south midlands. These successes are being built on as we move from one productivity record to another, and that must be the best possible news for the future.

Mr. Orme: I wish to support the argument of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) for further development in this area of the mining industry. I visited it recently and it was impressed upon me that the original decision was that there should be three pits in the area. Can the Minister give an assurance that development will take place very soon in north-west Leicestershire?

Mr. Hunt: These are matters for British Coal. I am pleased to hear that Asfordby is on schedule and that the upcast shaft and the downcast shaft are now 300m and 180m down, on schedule, on cost and within budget. There is also the important development of south Warwickshire, where I understand tha discussions are proceeding on multi-shift working.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree that, bearing in mind the needs of the Leicestershire miners, it would make more sense to develop the Witham coalfield in Nottinghamshire, which is adjacent to the present site of West Burton power station, and will also be the site of the next coal-fired power station in Britain?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend will understand that I cannot comment on the last part of his supplementary question. As for the first part, I shall pass his remarks to the chairman of British Coal—[Interruption.] I remind Opposition Members as they heckle me, that productivity measured by output per man shift fell each year under the previous Labour Government, compared with a 4 per cent. per annum improvement envisaged in "Plan for Coal". We have seen record productivity under this Government.

Mersey and Severn Barrages

7. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy what meetings he has had on a regular basis with interested bodies concerning the Mersey and Severn barrage schemes.

Mr. David Hunt: My colleagues and I have met representatives of the Severn tidal power group and the Mersey Barrage Company. It is my right hon. Friend's policy to ensure that the organisations carrying out these studies consult fully all interested bodies.

Mr. Davies: Will the Minister confirm that neither of the bodies to which he has referred has an obligation to consider the environmental impact of the schemes, despite both areas being of international wildlife significance? Will he take steps to establish appropriate advisory bodies to ensure that research takes place? Will he give an undertaking now to continue formally to consult the voluntary organisations, which have already expressed their concern about the environmental impact of the schemes?

Mr. Hunt: I am happy to reassure the hon. Gentleman that environmental studies are recognised as an essential feature of barrage studies and that a significant proportion of the present expenditure on the two estuaries will be devoted to environmental studies. Full environmental appraisals will not be possible, especially for the Severn, until a decision is made to progress the scheme beyond the scope of the present studies.

Mr. Marland: Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituents in west Gloucestershire on the banks of the river Severn accept his undertaking to consult all the interested bodies as being thoroughly responsible? We are concerned not only with the environmental aspects, but with the full impact of the cost of construction, since the Severn barrage could be one of the most expensive civil engineering projects ever undertaken.

Mr. Hunt: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and to other right hon. and hon. Friends who have pressed my ministerial colleagues and I on what I believe is one of the widest work programmes and consultation arrangements that the country has ever seen into what is, after all, one of the most promising of our renewable energy resources.

Mr. Corbett: I agree with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies). Can the Minister say what timescale is involved in taking a decision, particularly on the Severn barrage? To my knowlege, the decision-making has been going on for about 30 years. The proposal presents a viable alternative to the further development of the nuclear energy programme which will not provide anywhere near as many jobs as the Severn barrage scheme stands a chance of providing.

Mr. Hunt: Without commenting on the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question, we are seeing remarkable progress on both the Severn and Mersey barrages. Indeed, I heard only last week that the Mersey barrage studies are well ahead of schedule and part I of the study is expected to be finished later this year. On the Severn barrage, we are now in the midst of a two-year programme, jointly funded by the Severn tidal power group, the Central Electricity Generating Board and the Department. I have every optimism that the studies will be completed ahead of schedule.

Nuclear Power Industry (Accidents)

8. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many fatal accidents there have been in the civil nuclear power industry in the United Kingdom in the last 10 years; and what was the number of fatalities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): There were 10 accidents, each involving one death, in the 10 years to February 1987. None involved radiation.

Mr. Chapman: Although one fatality is one too many will my hon. Friend confirm that the figures that he has given the House compare favourably with accidents in other major energy-conversion industries? For example, will he confirm that in the coalmining industry the figure is over 300, and does he agree that safety is an important factor in assessing how we meet our energy demands in the future?

Mr. Goodlad: I note what my hon. Friend says. He is correct that there were, sadly, 388 fatal accidents in the coal industry in the 10 years to 1985. The Government and the nuclear industry are fully conscious of the importance of both site and environmental safety, and the industry's record in that respect is excellent.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Minister aware that the figures—I do not challenge their accuracy in any way—are totally misleading? A fatality in the mining industry is a tragedy for the individual concerned and his family, but it is totally unlike incidents in the nuclear power industry which have implications for the local community and society at large? There is no relevant comparison between figures.

Mr. Goodlad: The important point is that the industry is conscious of its safety responsibilities.

Mr. Yeo: Will my hon. Friend assure the House that he will keep in mind the importance of maintaining the excellent safety record when he arrives at his decision on the possibility of constructing Sizewell B? Will he assure the House that approval for Sizewell B will be given only if his Department is satisfied that there is every prospect of maintaining the safety record?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister confirm that all information relating to the Windscale fire in 1957 has now been published and will he accept that one of the problems for the supporters of nuclear power, such as myself, is that the industry is clouded in a cloak of secrecy? If we could remove that secrecy I believe a majority of the British people would wholeheartedly support its development.

Mr. Goodlad: I believe that the hon. Gentleman is correct to say that full publication has been made of the details relating to the Windscale fire. I agree that openness on the part of the industry is extremely important and I believe that the industry is very open with information. All incidents at nuclear installations, however minor, must be reported by law to the nuclear installations inspectorate. Any incident that might give rise to a significant radiological hazard, either to the public or to a member of staff, is also promptly notified to Ministers. The details of all significant incidents are published regularly by the Health and Safety Executive.

Shetland Islands

9. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much oil has so far been brought ashore to the Shetland Islands; and if he will make a statement about the future involvement of the Shetlands in North sea oil development.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Up to the end of 1986 the total amount of crude oil brought ashore to the Sullom Voe terminal was 351·6 million tonnes. There is continuing opportunity for the Shetlands.

Dr. Clark: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. He will be aware that the Select Committee on Energy recently visited the Shetland Islands. Will he acknowledge the co-operation that the Shetland Islands have given the North Sea oil companies over recent years? Will he also ensure that his Department does all that it can to let the companies that have business in the North sea know that they will be welcome in the Shetland Islands, so that the expertise and technology that has been built up there can be used to full advantage?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Yes, Sir. The Shetlands have some good facilities, not only at Sullom Voe, which I mentioned in my answer, but in the Lerwick base and at Sumburgh airport. In the longer term, the geography of the Shetlands is such that they could find themselves strategically placed for developments in the northern North sea or in the area to the west of the Shetlands where prospecting is taking place.

Mr. Douglas: Does the Minister of State acknowledge that one should be wary in the House and elsewhere of speaking for the Shetland islanders because they are pretty good at speaking for themselves? Does he concede that one of the things to which he should turn his mind, with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor, is the ring fence arrangement for taxation in the North sea, so that development for satellite fields can be assessed as new development to step up the rate of activity both east and west of the Shetlands and in the North sea as a whole?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Having for many years had dealings with the Shetlanders on fisheries and oil and gas matters, I believe that no one respects more than I do the independence of the Shetlanders, but, so far as I am aware even the Shetlanders have not claimed a ring fence for those islands.

Mr. Wallace: It may not necessarily follow from the Minister's departmental responsibility, but does he accept that the reform of local government finance will have an important influence on future oil developments in the Shetlands, not least on the terminal at Sullom Voe? Has his Department been in touch with the Scottish Office on the importance of that, the necessity for the arrangements that will follow from the changes to the non-domestic rate, and any implications for possible pooling of non-domestic rates?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman should address his remarks to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I hope that, like the rest of the House, he will welcome the interest that my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) showed following the enterprising visit by the Select Committee on Energy to those islands. I very much welcome the interest taken in the House in the important role played by the Shetlands in the economy as a whole, particularly in relation to oil.

Coal-Fired Power Stations

10. Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many applications for the construction of coal-fired power stations have been submitted to him or his predecessors by the generating boards since May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: No applications for coal-fired stations have been made by the CEGB since May 1979, although for much of the period since then the largest coal-fired station in western Europe has been under construction at Drax. It was completed last year to time and budget at a cost of some £900 million.

Mrs. McCurley: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. As he has given us assurances that the Treasury will not interfere in any approvals that his Department gives for the construction of coal-fired or, indeed, nuclear power stations, can he also give an assurance about the conversion from oil-fired to coal-fired stations, especially now that the oil-fired station at Inverkip desperately needs that conversion, and needs it quickly?

Mr. Walker: I note my hon. Friend's remarks. On no occasion in my ministerial life have I ever, alas, been able to say that the Treasury will not interfere in anything. I can only say that no discussion or debate is going on between myself and the Treasury on those matters because only one application is before us. Conversion schemes or any other application by the CEGB will be carefully and quickly considered.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: When the Secretary of State is considering alternative forms of power generation, will he bear in mind that there is a very wide consensus of support for coal-fired power stations and that the power generating industries that make and design much of the power station equipment for nuclear and other types of power generation can also generate jobs and wealth in designing and commissioning a coal-fired power station?

Mr. Walker: I am well aware of that. If the Government had not recognised the continuing importance of the coal industry, we would not be investing £2 billion in that industry over the next three years. We have invested far more over recent years than the Labour Government that the hon. Gentleman used to support. In return, I hope that he will give careful consideration to the 150,000 jobs that are involved in the nuclear industry, particularly in the north-east.

Mr. Holt: In considering Sizewell B, will my right hon. Friend recognise the importance of the coal-fired industry particularly as it relates to NEI Parsons in the north-east of England where any further loss of jobs would be quite untenable? Until those orders come from the Government, nothing further can be done. We wish for a lead in that respect.

Mr. Walker: Orders come from the CEGB, not the Government. The Government do not own or run any power stations. I understand that applications must come from the generating industry, depending upon requirements. My hon. Friend knows that the CEGB has been examining a number of sites for coal-fired power stations. It will undoubtedly be considering what future strategy to pursue. I can only repeat what I said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley), that as soon as any applications come in they will be carefully and quickly considered.

Mr. Orme: Is it not a fact that, because there have been no orders for any type of power station over the past eight years under this Government, there is now a shortage of capacity, particularly in the south-east and south-west of England?

Mr. Walker: The Labour Government, who made the decision in 1978 on the Drax power station, decided to compensate the CEGB because they decided that the power station had been ordered ahead of time and the capacity was not needed.

Coal-fired Power Stations

11. Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss the ordering of new coal-fired power stations.

13. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent discussions he has had with the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board about the ordering of coal-fired power stations.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman regularly and we discuss a wide range of issues. Applications for consent to the construction of power stations are a matter for the CEGB, and I have received no application in respect of a coal-fired station.

Mr. Grylls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that unless orders for new power stations are placed quite soon there will inevitably be more redundancies in the power construction industry? Does he accept that that could be very serious, because it could damage one of our most successful industries not only in its capacity for building power stations in Britain, but all over the world?

Mr. Walker: My hon. Friend is well aware of the way in which the Government have given quite considerable assistance to the industry in obtaining overseas orders. He will also be aware of the manner in which we have organised credit facilities and so on for power station projects on a considerable scale. My Department has done all in its power to obtain those overseas orders. My hon. Friend will also understand that, as the CEGB applies to me to meet its capacity needs for the future, these matters will be quickly and carefully considered, as I have already said.

Mr. Beith: Is it not a matter of serious concern to the Secretary of State that the CEGB should not have submitted applications for coal-fired power stations to him? Does he not recognise that that was part of the strategy to get Sizewell through? Will he not now recognise that his overall responsibilities for energy require him to ensure that we have investment in coal-fired power station building quickly because that would be of immense importance to industry in the north of England?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman should be more objective in his study of capacity needs. It is not true that capacity needs will not be met at present. Quite reasonably, before deciding on its overall strategy, the CEGB should know whether the availability of nuclear power stations is part of that strategy. That is a perfectly reasonable decision to take. The CEGB has not delayed decisions so that there will be a lack of capacity. Therefore, I do not agree with any suggestion that it has done that.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Is the Secretary of State aware that one of the difficulties in ordering a coal-fired power station before the 1990s is the technical problem of getting rid of nitrous oxide, which is a real problem in the industry?

Mr. Walker: It is a problem, but it can be tackled.

Mr. Skinner: If the Government wish to improve the manufacturing base, would it not be sensible to start to build a coal-fired power station immediately and to follow it with another? Does the Secretary of State accept that a coal-fired power station, or stations, should be built adjacent to the coalfields and that he should make an early start by siting one in the north midlands and south Yorkshire area as quickly as possible to provide some jobs?

Mr. Walker: It is important that the CEGB should decide how best to meet its capacity needs, and in terms of employment those needs must be dealt with efficiently and effectively. The improvement in the productivity of the coal industry will considerably assist it in making people believe that it deserves the orders that it requires. The industrial dispute which the hon. Gentleman supported so enthusiastically considerably damaged the coal industry.

Mr. Favell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that not only are coal-fired power stations important to British manufacturing industry but that civil nuclear power stations are important, especially to the north-west and to William Fairey, which he will visit next week? Has my right hon. Friend read the report in The Sunday Times yesterday? Will he confirm that he will not be bullied by the French and other EC members, but will continue to support British manufacturing industry?

Mr. Walker: As for the report in The Sunday Times, as far as I am aware, no official complaint of any description has been made by the Commissioners of the European Community, so I cannot comment on the issue. The Labour party's decision to eradicate the nuclear power industry during the next 20 years will be disastrous for jobs, especially in the north-east and the north-west.

THE ARTS

Scotland (Expenditure)

34. Dr. Godman asked the Minister for the Arts what is the current level of expenditure on the arts in Scotland.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): The Arts Council of Great Britain has allocated £13·52 million to the Scottish Arts Council in 1986-87. In addition, the programme of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland provides for £80 million expenditure on arts and libraries this year.

Dr. Godman: The Glasgow citizens theatre is anxious to extend its season from 35 to 52 weeks at an additional cost of £250,000. This will help tourism and jobs in terms of the garden festival in 1989 and the city of culture in 1990. Will the Government and the Arts Council help in this laudable endeavour?

Mr. Luce: I acknowledge the remarkable range of arts facilities in Glasgow, including the citizens theatre, and I am glad that in 1990 Glasgow will be the cultural city of Europe. I hope that will bring many tourists and give much help to Glasgow. The allocations of funds is a matter for the Scottish Arts Council, which this year will receive a 4·6 per cent. increase in its overall grant. It is for the council to decide how precisely to allocate that money.

Mr. Maclennan: Has the Minister made any assessment of the effect upon expenditure on the arts of the transfer of responsibility for leisure and recreation from the regions to the districts? Has central Government funding taken any account of that effect, especially to offset the damage that has been suffered in rural areas because of the withdrawal of funding from the arts?

Mr. Luce: What I can say—I can only speak for the arts—is that the Scottish Office has provided an extra £600,000 for this financial year and the coming financial year to help the national arts organisations for Scotland. A formula has been operating for many years to allocate the total sum of money to the Scottish Arts Council, whose policy is to spread the money as widely as it can and to make the arts as accessible as possible to as many people in Scotland as possible.

Mr. Fisher: Does the Minister understand that the feebleness of his answer will greatly disappoint people in Glasgow and in Scotland in general? The Glasgow garden festival and the year of culture will need positive investment by the Government if their potential for the arts and for the people of Scotland is to be realised. Is the Minister aware of the possibility of a substantial Scottish arts presence at the 1989 Toronto arts festival, and does he accept that the Government must invest in that if the potential is to be realised? Will he again allow these opportunities to slip because of the feebleness of the Government's arts policy?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is talking absolute nonsense. When the cities made their bids to become the culture city, it was made quite clear that there would not be funding from central Government, that we would look to them to take the lead, and that it was a test of their good intent and plans to do a good job in providing arts facilities in their city as a cultural centre. It was precisely on that understanding that Glasgow was chosen and Glaswegians have shown their confidence in their city by saying that they can set aside, to add to local government and private sector money, enough resources to enable the city to be a great success in 1990.

Acceptance-in-lieu

35. Mr. Hanley asked the Minster for the Arts if he has any plans to change current arrangements for acceptance-in-lieu of works of art.

Mr. Luce: I continue to keep the arrangements under review in consultation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Hanley: Will my right hon. Friend say how much was spent last year securing pre-eminent works of art for the nation and whether he believes that the £2 million reserve in his Department and the £10 million reserve at the Treasury are adequate for this purpose and also whether co-operation between his Department and the Treasury is adequate?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to the important new arrangements for acceptance in lieu, which means that we can now draw on a contingency reserve to the tune of an extra £10 million in addition to the £2 million that my Department gives. Overall, in this present financial year, just over £3 million has been drawn upon. There have been only seven acceptances in lieu this year and the opportunities for more are very strong. The more people who take this up, the better.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Will the Minister bear in mind that, with the recent escalation in prices at auctions, what might have been adequate a year ago is no longer adequate? Does he accept that these sums need to be revised to take account of changing circumstances.

Mr. Luce: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the rates of inflation of some objects of art are very high, and that is a factor to be taken into account. As I have already said, the contingency reserve has not been fully drawn upon for this year and opportunities to draw upon it are still available. He will be aware of other arrangements, including the private treaty sale and the douceur, all of which are mechanisms for making it cheaper to purchase important objects of art and to save tax for the seller.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I acknowledge the substantial contribution that the Government have already made to enable the National Trust to acquire Kedleston hall, but is my right hon. Friend aware that the trust is still about £1·5 million short of the funds it needs to enable it to preserve the contents? As the origin of the problem is very much bound up with capital transfer tax obligations, will he look urgently to see whether there may be further scope, perhaps by drawing on the contingency fund that he has mentioned, to help by way of the AIL arrangements, or, if that is not appropriate, by some other route?

Mr. Luce: Many of these matters are for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. My hon. Friend will recognise that the new arrangements for acceptance in lieu have been operating for only a short time and that the full contingency fund has not been adequately and fully drawn upon. The opportunity is still there, and I urge people to take full advantage of it.

Mr. Meadowcroft: We appear to be less and less able to compete with American galleries and foundations in our attempts to retain art treasures in Britain. Does the Minister agree that one way in which he could assist in the retention of such treasures would be for him to take a much more generous view of the valuation of such treasures which may be given in lieu of tax?

Mr. Luce: There are very clear mechanisms and we bring in expert advisers to assess values. I am satisfied that those arrangements are working well. As regards the selling of treasures abroad, the export review committee, which has been in place for over 30 years, does an extremely good job in recommending what should or should not have a stop put upon it. These procedures are working well.

Museums and Galleries (Refurbishment)

37. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on progress in refurbishing national museums and galleries.

Mr. Luce: I attach high priority to maintaining and improving these buildings, and have allocated over £27 million to it in 1987-88. That is over 30 per cent. more in real terms that in 1979-80.

Mr. Bowden: I welcome my right hon. Friend's answer, but may I ask him whether he is obliged to accept the services of the Property Services Agency? The agency does a good job and provides professional expertise in many cases, but occasionally some museums could benefit from competitive tendering for refurbishment.

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to this matter. From 1 April 1988 our museums and galleries will be untied from the PSA and will be able to take whatever action they wish about tendering and will be able to recruit whatever staff they need to enable them to do their job on that basis. This is the right way to proceed and it is right to give more responsibility to the trustees and to the directors.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Minister aware of the appalling state of upkeep of many of our great national museums — particularly the Victoria and Albert museum? Since voluntary charges were meant in part to assist in the refurbishment of that museum, what has been the most recent impact on attendance figures of the amount of money that the V and A has been able to produce from those charges? Has it not resulted in a great fall in the number of people attending the museum?

Mr. Luce: I must make it absolutely plain to the hon. Gentleman that, over a number of years, I have made available £27 million to the Victoria and Albert alone to enable it to undertake very important maintenance and refurbishment work. The record shows that the V and A has done a marvellous job under Sir Roy Strong's leadership and that a number of new galleries have been refurbished, including the medieval treasury. It is for the trustees to decide whether voluntary charges are in the interests of the museum. If the net increase in income leads to an improvement in facilities, I am sure that the vast majority of the British people will welcome it.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, even where there are charges, voluntary or otherwise, there is always a time during the day when children have access to museums and galleries, and that he is pleased to see that happen?

Mr. Luce: I welcome the fact that a number of museums which charge, including almost every independent museum, give an excellent service to the public and offer a wide range of special services to enable schoolchildren to enter at a discount.

CIVIL SERVICE

Recruitment

82. Mr. Wareing asked the Minister for the Civil Service what plans he has to change the system of recruitment into the Civil Service.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): There are no plans to change the basic principles of fair and open competition and selection on merit in Civil Service recruitment. Changes are continually being made to the detailed procedures to meet the changing needs of the Civil Service and of the labour market.

Mr. Wareing: Although it is now 17 years since the Fulton report was produced, is the Minister aware that the administration group of the home Civil Service — and, even more, the equivalent grades in the diplomatic service — are overwhelmingly dominated by the products of Oxbridge? Is it not time that we ended this elitism in the Civil Service and introduced some democracy? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware, and is he content with the fact, that 70 per cent. of those recruited into the home Civil Service administration groups in recent years have been the products of Oxford and Cambridge? Can it be that the other universities are no use at all in turning out our higher officials in Government service?

Mr. Luce: Our sole interest must be to get the best people for the Civil Service. [Interruption.] We have a fair and open system, based on merit. [Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Gentleman will listen to this answer, because it may be of some interest to him. Whereas, in 1982, 75 per cent. of the recruits for the high fliers in the Civil Service were from Oxbridge, at the end of 1986 the proportion was down to 46 per cent. The hon. Gentleman will see that a much broader range of backgrounds is now coming into the Civil Service.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Does my right hon. Friend accept that those who have to deal with the administrative sections of the Civil Service think that they are extremely good and do not want them mucked up with some sort of equality nonsense from the Opposition?

Mr. Luce: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The thing that really matters in the Civil Service is that the system should be fair and open and that we choose people on merit, irrespective of their background.

Dr. McDonald: As we are considering recruitment, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that civil servants will be recruited to staff the management centres for the Government data network? Will he also ensure that any exchange of information between Departments when the network is established will come under parliamentary scrutiny, bearing in mind the fact that information about individuals from the Department of Employment, the Home Office or the Department of Health and Social Security could be put together in a package, thus posing an obvious threat to civil liberties?

Mr. Luce: I shall consider what the hon. Lady has said and, if I may, write to her in due course.

Trade Unions

85. Mr. Soley asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met the Civil Service trade unions; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Luce: I have informal meetings from time to time with representatives of the Civil Service trade unions. Matters of mutual interest are discussed.

Mr. Soley: When the right hon. Gentleman next meets the trade unions, will he discuss with them the effect on morale in the Civil Service of the cuts being made by his colleagues in other Departments, especially the DHSS, where cuts are preventing the provision of a good standard of service to the public and undermining morale in an increasingly serious way?

Mr. Luce: I and my colleagues who are in charge of Departments are keen to ensure that the morale of the Civil Service is high. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have noticed that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has acknowledged that there have been pressures on certain parts of the DHSS, particularly in offices all over the country, as a result of which he is planning to increase the size of the Civil Service by 5,000. That is an acknowledgement of the pressures and an attempt to deal with the morale problem in the Civil Service.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: May I suggest that not everything is right in the Civil Service at the moment? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the four Civil Service unions have set up a campaign for a better Civil Service at a cost of £6 million? Should not all members of the Civil Service now declare loyalty and allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen and act like true civil servants by being honourable, respectable and responsible?

Mr. Luce: All the evidence that I see as I travel around the country and meet civil servants is that they do an outstandingly good job and that they are loyal, dedicated and professional. When individuals are not, disciplinary procedures can be taken.

Mr. Corbett: Given the fact that, in the face of rising crime, extra police officers have been appointed, why does the Minister resist calls, in the face of rising VAT fiddles, for an increase of 1,000 officers to deal with VAT frauds? Does the right Gentleman understand that, for about £20 million a year, they could recoup about £122 million in what is now fiddled VAT money?

Mr. Luce: The fact that, with the DHSS, VAT and in certain other areas, we have shown flexibility about the size of the Civil Service and are prepared to make modest increases when that would lead to an improvement of the service shows that we are anxious to ensure that there is a proper service.

Mr. Gow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the offer that the Government have made to civil servants is sufficient to recruit, retain and motivate civil servants of high quality?

Mr. Luce: That is principally a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but my hon. Friend may have noticed that there is now a provisional pay agreement with the Institution of Professional Civil Servants to provide much more flexibility in the pay scheme to acknowledge retention and recruitment needs. I hope that that will be progress in the right direction.

Mr. Maclennan: Did the Minister take the opportunity to explain to the Civil Service unions whether the policy on decentralised pay bargaining was that proposed by the Paymaster General or that followed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Luce: There is common agreement among us that there is a need for more flexibility in the pay system. The provisional pay agreement that has been reached with the IPCS is a step in that direction and has the suppport of the whole Government.

Official Forms

86. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many official forms have been scrapped since 1979.

Mr. Luce: Since the Government's review of forms began in 1982, at least 17,500 forms have been abolished and 25,000 have been improved.

Mr. Bowden: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on that achievement. Can a price be put on it? Can he say how much has been saved by scrapping those forms? Is there not a case for simplifying the forms that must remain to ensure that they are understood even by the most simple-minded of us?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The saving made so far is £9 million of taxpayers' money. I hope that, as a result of the more recent reductions in the number of forms, further savings will be made. I welcome the fact that there is a campaign, led by Chrissie Maher, that is designed to improve plain English in this country. Her campaign has helped to improve and simplify many of the forms that the Government produce for taxpayers.

Mr. Holt: Could my right hon. Friend state why it is necessary for the Ministry of Defence to circulate a form asking about ethnic origin, when the Secretary of State for Defence has refused to do that for the armed forces? What is the difference?

Mr. Luce: Principally, that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Dykes: Despite that welcome reduction, is my right hon. Friend aware that the tax assessment regulation forms now total more than 600 pages, compared with half that figure in 1950? Will he discuss that with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to see whether it can be reduced in the forthcoming Finance Bill?

Mr. Luce: I shall certainly discuss that with my right hon. Friend. For my part, I will do anything that I can to try to simplify the forms and make sure that they are better understood and more easily interpreted by the citizens of this country.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that the simplest of all the forms recently issed in the Civil Service was the one that asked civil servants whether they wanted to set up a political fund in the Civil and Public Services Association? As a result of all the attacks by the Government on civil liberties of one kind or another, the CPSA decided by a majority of 2: 1, on this very official form, that they would set up a political fund. Does he agree that that shows that civil servants realise they have been badly treated by the Tory Government?

Mr. Luce: The vast majority of civil servants wish to do what has always been their duty—remain impartial. The Government believe that trade unions need political funds only if they propose to participate in party political activities or to campaign for or against political parties or candidates.

Zeebrugge Ferry Disaster

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John Moore): With permission Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the loss of the vessel Herald of Free Enterprise.

Shortly before 7 pm GMT on Friday 6 March, the roll-on/roll-off passenger ferry "Herald of Free Enterprise" capsized, without warning, in a position about three quarters of a mile outside the entrance to the port of Zeebrugge. She had left Zeebrugge about half an hour before on a passage to Dover. It is my sad duty to inform the House that a total of 53 people are known to have died and 82 others are believed to be missing. A total of 408 passengers and crew were rescued. I am sure that the whole House would wish to join me in expressing our deepest sympathy to the bereaved and the injured.

Immediately the tragedy occurred, the Belgian authorities took charge of the search and rescue arrangements, with assistance from Her Majesty's Coastguard and the Ministry of Defence rescue co-ordination centre at Plymouth. Two British warships were immediately dispatched to the scene, together with search and rescue helicopters carrying divers and other rescue equipment. I wish to pay tribute to all those involved in the rescue arrangements, especially to the Belgian authorities and the Belgian people, without whose speedy response the casualties would have been much greater. I should also like to pay tribute to the police, hospitals and fire services on both sides of the Channel, the staff of Townsend Thoresen and the British ambassador and his staff in Belgium for their assistance to the injured and bereaved.

A team of marine surveyors from my Department led by Captain Vale have begun to conduct a preliminary inquiry into the loss of this vessel.

I have decided that a full formal investigation should be held into this disaster. It will be conducted under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts. I am pleased to announce that after consultation with my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, the hon. Mr. Justice Sheen, the Admiralty judge, has been appointed to be the commissioner for the investigation. He will be assisted by four assessors who will be appointed shortly. The date and venue for the inquiry will be announced when arrangements have been made, but I am anxious that there should be no delay.

It will be for the formal investigation to investigate the causes of this disaster and to make recommendations to ensure that all possible lessons are learnt. But the preliminary reports which I have received suggest that the cause of the capsize of the vessel was an inrush of water through the bow loading doors. I have no evidence to suggest that this was due to any fundamental fault in the design of the ship.

My Department has today embarked on a programme of checks on roll-on/roll-off ships leaving United Kingdom ports to ensure that all loading door mechanisms are in working order; that officers and crew are aware of the operating procedures, that all openings in the hull and superstructure must be closed before ships proceed to sea in accordance with statutory requirements, and that recommendations of safe practice should be observed.

I am also advising owners of roll-on/roll-off ferries to fit warning lights on the bridge of the vessels to show whether the loading doors are properly closed. Clearly, I shall consider whether to make this a statutory requirement.

Understandably, there is anxiety about the financial difficulties of the injured and bereaved both immediately and in the long term. As regards immediate needs in Zeebrugge, the British consul and his staff are offering all possible consular assistance. In this country, the Department of Health and Social Security is providing emergency arrangements so that people arriving at Gatwick and Dover can be given immediate help. As regards concern about long-term financial entitlements a team from the Department of Health and Social Security is going out to Zeebrugge today to give advice on the spot.

I understand that P&O has announced today that it has set aside £250,000 to meet the immediate personal needs of those in distress following the tragedy. This fund will be handled by the Townsend Thoresen office in Dover. The company will also be advertising in the national press tomorrow with details of the central point for claims. I have its assurance that all claims will be dealt with as quickly as possible.

On the initiative of Dover district council, a Channel ferry disaster fund has been established to assist the victims and their relatives. This will not affect claims for compensation. The Government will contribute £1 million to the fund. Parliamentary approval to this payment will be sought in a supplementary Supply Estimate for the transport services and central administration vote. Pending that approval, the £1 million donation will be met by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund.

Every year some 28 million passengers are safely carried on United Kingdom ferries and it is tragic that our fine record of safety has been marred by this disaster. I share the grief and anguish of those who are bereaved, and of those who are still uncertain of the fate of their friends and relatives. I am sure that the thoughts of all hon. Members of this House are with them.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): On behalf of the Opposition I express our shock at the magnitude of the tragedy and loss of life. We give our condolences to all those who lost family and relatives, and to the injured. It was a particular shock to many of us who have seafaring connections.

I join the Secretary of State in paying tribute to the rescue services and the Belgian authorities, which acted with exemplary speed and efficiency. I also pay tribute to individual passengers and crew members. Reports are coming in of individual acts of heroism and it is clear that passengers and crew alike put their lives at risk and may, indeed, have lost their lives, trying to save other people.

I thank the Secretary of State's staff who, after I spoke to them on Friday night, kept me in constant touch over the weekend. I thank the Secretary of State for phoning me when he returned from Zeebrugge on Saturday night. I thank the Government for the donation of £1 million to the Dover disaster fund.

Does the Secretary of State agree that it is of paramount importance that we discover as quickly as possible whether the primary cause of the disaster was the ship sailing with the doors open? I am glad that he has already put his surveyors on the ships to check the mechanisms to ensure that there is nothing wrong with them. I am pleased that he is insisting that all roll-on/roll-off ferries are now fitted with monitoring devices and warning signals so that the skipper or the crew on the bridge can know immediately if something has gone wrong. Will he not hesitate to use section 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1979 to insist that that is done? I cerainly hope that it will not be necessary for him to use compulsion.

Will the Secretary of State discuss with European Transport Ministers of maritime nations how they can instigate common safety procedures? We want to ensure that all ships have proper standards of sailing procedures, no matter which port they are leaving—not just our ports or Belgian ports. Will he undertake an immediate examination of the need to secure vehicles before vessels leave port? It appears that there may have been a contributory factor of vehicles moving rapidly because they were not secured.

Will the inquiry look at the possibility of fitting stanchions in these vessels, which have no bulkheads, to prevent the vehicles from moving quickly in the event of such disasters, or in the event of a collision, because movement of vehicles affects the stability of the vessels? Will there be an inquiry into the ship's design, especially with regard to stability? The most important question to be answered is how, within 45 to 60 seconds, a vessel such as this could roll over.

Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the inquiry to look at the possibility although it is extremely expensive, of fitting moving bulkheads, if not to existing vessels, to new vessels, as some sort of bulkhead would at least buy some time to evacuate people safely?

I agree that we want a thorough and urgent report. Will the Secretary of State undertake that there will be interim reports so that any safety lessons that emerge will be put into effect without any delay? Will he urge the inquiry to look at the commercial pressures that may be compelling vessel owners to have swifter turn-rounds? Whatever lessons came out of this, in no circumstances can commercial pressures be allowed to militate against the safety of our people and our passengers.

Mr. Moore: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his initial comments. I know that he speaks for all hon. Members in what he has said, and I welcome it. I start with his last point. Safety cannot be inhibited by any pressures. It is the first prerequisite, and all hon. Members would expect it to be the prerequisite of any Government, to establish regulations on safety at sea. The hon. Gentleman was right to pay tribute to the passengers and the crew. It is difficult at this stage to be precise, but in my conversations at Zeebrugge and again this morning, with Jeffrey Sterling, it is clear to me that there are many, as yet untold, heroic actions both by members of the crew and passengers. I am sure that the former would have done their duty in the standards and tradition of the British merchant navy.

The hon. Gentleman asked me to establish the inquiry urgently—of course we must. To follow up another of his questions, I make it clear that no action will be inhibited by the time that it takes us to establish the precise cause. The preliminary investigations that I started on Friday night and Saturday morning are already under way. If there are, as a consequence, any actions to be taken, or if actions become necessary because of what the formal inquiry presents, we shall not be inhibited in taking those actions by the inquiry process.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Act and the way that I might use other sections of the Merchant Shipping Act and section 21 in particular. I would not hesitate to use them. There is already a considerble number of regulations in this sector, as he knows. There are no statutory regulations on the physically securing of vehicles. It is done by advice to the masters of the marine. Whether that should be turned into statutory regulations is something that I should be more than happy to consider.

With regard to stanchions, the inquiry will not be inhibited in any aspect. It cannot be and should not be. We shall look at that point. With regard to the European Transport Ministers, the House may not be aware that the Commissioner for the European Commission, Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis, and some of his staff, spent most of Saturday with me. Not only did he show sympathy and concern, but he wishes, with the European Transport Ministers, to look at and discuss this matter.

With regard to the character and design of the ship, the public inquiry will no doubt address the design and safety margins for such ships. For the present, I stress again, as it is important for the many millions who travel by sea, that there is no evidence to suggest any reason for imposing restrictions on their operation. I would not have said that without clear advice. I would not inhibit, but encourage, the inquiry to look at this and all aspects of the issue.

Mr. Peter Rees (Dover): I thank my right hon. Friend for the statement and for his decision to make an immediate grant to the Dover district council disaster fund. His prompt visit and that of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to Zeebrugge to see the aftermath of the disaster was much appreciated. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and I appreciated the prompt visit that the Minister with responsibilities for shipping paid with us to the coastguard station at Dover and to the headquarters of Townsend Thoresen on Saturday.

Will my right hon. Friend accept that many people in east Kent will wish to be associated with the tributes that he has paid to the rescue services, and with the expression of gratitude that he made to our neighbours in Belgium for their prompt and sympathetic response?

I welcome my right hon. Friend's prompt decision to set up a judicial inquiry under the Merchant Shipping Act. Will he ensure that the judge and his assessors are accorded all of the resources and assistance that they require, so that, while their inquiry will be a thorough one —it must be that to command confidence—it will also be a fairly speedy one? The obvious uncertainties over the reasons for this incident, and therefore over the passage of the ferries, may prejudice the ferries, which have had, until now, a well-deserved reputation for efficiency and safety in carrying millions of people across the Channel every year.

Will my right hon. Friend consider whether, in incidents of this kind, the methods of contacting and informing the families of those directly involved could be sharpened up? I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe and I came across one or two distressing cases over the weekend of families who were left in considerable uncertainty for a long time. One appreciates that, when an incident has occurred in foreign waters, and the primary responsibilities for the rescue lie with foreign authorities, the difficulties may be considerable, but I know that my right hon. Friend will be sensitive to that particular point.

Mr. Moore: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend and start by saying how much my Department appreciated the assistance that he and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) gave by going to the rescue centres and information areas in Dover and Folkestone and ensuring that they did everything that they could to help the relatives of those who were looking for their kin.

As to the Belgium authorities, may I reiterate to the House what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said, and what I said when I was in Belgium? I cannot express enough the thanks of the House and the British people for the extraordinary courage, efficiency and care with which the Belgian authorities and the Belgian people greeted us on this occasion.

The inquiry must not be restricted in any way as to resources. It is essential that it does its job properly; it would not wish to do anything else. I understand the point that my right hon. and learned Friend is making about speed. It is essential that we move as fast as we possibly can because, as he said, this involves an important industry that safely carried 28 million of our people across the Channel last year.

I heard the points that my right hon. and learned Friend made concerning the difficulties that occurred with regard to some of the telephone lines. Some 26 telephone lines were put in in the Maidstone special emergency area. I shall ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to look at this matter again, but it is very difficult when an incident has occurred in somebody else's jurisdiction. I shall certainly look at the point because of many of the difficulties that the bereaved found in these circumstances, and still find, is something that we all appreciate.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends with the expressions of sympathy for the bereaved and injured. I also pay tribute to the emergency services, the rescue services and to all those who supplied comfort and assistance to the injured and bereaved in Belgium and on this side of the Channel. From information supplied by my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who has constituents missing, presumed dead, I know that the prompt and sensitive response of the staff of Townsend Thoresen has been particularly welcomed.

I welcome the announcement that the Minister made of Government support for the disaster fund and also the very prompt steps that he and his Department have taken to ensure safety and to reassure the public, who will need to have their confidence rebuilt after what has happened.

The Minister said that a full and public inquiry will take place, which will perhaps establish how the water got in. No doubt the Minister will be aware of the great concern that has been expressed at the volume of open space on the car deck. Will he confirm that that will be one of the matters that the inquiry will be looking into? The Minister can be assured that, if there are findings that suggest safety measures that could, perhaps, be said to conflict with commercial pressures, he will have our support in ensuring that safety is paramount.

Mr. Moore: I thank the hon. Member for what he said on behalf of his party. He will know that nothing can take second place to safety. He must understand that, and I reiterate the point.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks about Townsend Thoresen. Those who have been involved in the tragedy are fully aware of the enormous resources that the company has devoted to try to make sure that the difficulties are handled with as much sensitivity as possible.

The hon. Member is absolutely right to say that, as far as we can, we must take every action quickly. I will not let the inquiry inhibit action to reassure people.

I said earlier that the public inquiry will no doubt address the design of the ship and the safety margins of this type of ship, but I also said carefully that, as far as we could see at this stage, there is no evidence to suggest that we should impose restrictions on operations, apart from the additional action that I have announced today.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): While joining in the expressions of sympathy to the bereaved, may I ask whether my right hon. Friend is satisfied that steps to recover and identify the remaining bodies in the wreck are being taken without delay?

Mr. Moore: I thank my right hon. Friend for that question. He has drawn attention to a difficult and important issue. I have spoken to Sir Jeffrey Sterling and to the people involved and there is no question but that the only criterion that concerns them is the raising of the vessel in such a way as to obtain the bodies of those currently entombed in the ship. That is the first, last and only important criterion that they are addressing, and that must be right. It is a very difficult operation, as those who have been involved know. Therefore, I am afraid that it will take time, but we wish them speedy success.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): May I associate myself with the expressions of sympathy and with the thanks offered to the rescue services for the fact that, despite the tragic deaths, many passengers were rescued alive? Like other hon. Members, I represent a constituency which is served by roll-on roll-off ferries. I make no imputation against that type of vessel, but will the Secretary of State include in the public inquiry a general review of roll-on roll-off ferries?

Mr. Moore: I made it quite clear what I suggested that the public inquiry should examine and I do not think that I need to repeat the words for the third time. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his initial remarks. He is right to remind the House of the extraordinary achievements of the rescue services. It is impossible to describe how cold the waters were. To get 408 survivors out of 543 passengers in such conditions is one of the most remarkable miracles. We are all desperately sad at the death toll that we already know about and at the deaths that we suspect, but the achievement of the authorities and of everybody else is something for which we must all thank God.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. In a tragedy of this magnitude there is hardly an hon. Member whose constituency has not suffered loss or injury. I think that it would be fair to all concerned if we moved on, because it is impossible for me to decide or discover who has suffered most.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the four motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Carriage of Passengers and their Luggage by Sea (Domestic Carriage) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping Act 1979 (Commencement No. 11) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Civil Defence (Grant) (Scotland) Amemdment Regulations 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Civil Defence (Grant) (Amendment) Regulations 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

European Community Documents

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the two motions relating to European Community documents.

Ordered,

That European Community Document No. 10279/1/86, relating to medical and health research, be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Documents Nos. 11198/85 and 10522/1/86, relating to road haulage, be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents. —[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

CHEVENING ESTATE BILL [LORDS]

Ordered,

That the Chevening Estate Bill [Lords] be referred to a Second Reading Committee.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

[10TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Intermediate Nuclear Weapons

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

3.54 pm

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): There is widespread agreement in all parts of the House about the significance of Mr. Gorbachev's announcement on 28 February that the Soviet Union was dropping its previous insistence that any agreement on intermediate nuclear weapons in Europe could not be implemented until a similar agreement had been reached on strategic and space weapons. That statement was warmly welcomed throughout the world. Sadly, so far there has been no opportunity to discuss it in the House. There has been no statement from any Minister and, despite the Government's skeletal legislative programme, they apparently cannot find the time for a debate on the subject. That is why the alliance parties have given up half a day of their precious time to enable Parliament to discuss the issues and to probe and clarify the Government's position on this important subject.

The alliance strongly welcomes the Soviet decision, first because we believe that Mr. Gorbachev was wrong to try to hold progress on INF negotiations hostage to progress on strategic and space systems. The three negotiating baskets of Geneva were always intended to be separate and they should remain so. Secondly, we welcome Mr. Gorbachev's decision because it demonstrates the validity of the 1979 dual-track decision — the decision to modernise NATO's capability, while, at the same time, negotiating to remove the threat of the Soviet SS20s. The apparent success of that strategy reinforces the alliance's belief that sound defence and sensible disarmament are complementary and not contradictory. It also confirms our belief that progress in disarmament is less likely to result from great moral gestures than from patient, tough and determined negotiation.

The worldwide response to Mr. Gorbachev's announcement has been extremely positive. In the United States, the assistant Secretary of Defence, Mr. Richard Perle, seldom known as a dove in such matters, suggested it was "a constructive step that should open the way to concluding the remaining issues, leading ultimately to a treaty."

That was fairly typical of the response throughout the world.

Strangely, the British Government were almost the last to respond. When the statement appeared the Government were somewhat restrained in their enthusiasm. The Daily Telegraph of 3 March described the Foreign Secretary's statement as "carefully avoiding any impression of being over the moon about the prospect of a zero option agreement".

At this stage we should be clear about the origins and purposes of the zero option. It is by no means some sinister Soviet ploy. After Reykjavik, Lord Carrington reminded us that the zero option was inherent in the original dual-track decision of December 1979. The zero option was first put forward officially in a speech by President Reagan as long ago as 18 November 1981. At that stage, he offered the non-deployment of cruise and Pershing II missiles in return for worldwide dismantling of Soviet INF missiles. That offer was incorporated in the United States draft treaty that was tabled on 2 February 1982. It is also worth recalling that the draft treaty called for a freeze on the shorter range systems with reductions to be "sought in subsequent phases".

I argue that the zero option represents a good deal for Western Europe. Some 441 Soviet SS20s are now deployed. We may argue about how many of those are deployed against targets in Western Europe, how many are targeted against Asia and how many are in the so-called "swing" zone, which enables them to hit targets on either continent. They are mobile systems and therefore all of them are potentially available for use in the European theatre. With three warheads on every missile, that means that the Soviets have a total of 1,323 warheads in place. That compares with the 572 single warhead cruise and Pershing missiles that would be eventually deployed if NATO completes its planned programme within the next year or so.

Thus, there are substantially more Soviet missiles and warheads to be dismantled or destroyed as a result of the zero solution than there are NATO systems. This would be the first time in the history of arms control that brand-new, effective and sophisticated nuclear weapons were destroyed as a result of an agreement. That is extremely significant.

The Government's position on the zero option has undergone some subtle change since the Reykjavik summit. [HON. MEMBERS: "Subtle?"] It may not be so subtle, but we shall see as I develop my argument. The Prime Minister was originally an enthusiastic supporter of a straightforward zero option solution. On 27 March 1982 at Harrogate the right hon. Lady said:

"That is our objective, the zero option objective. That is a balanced objective. 'You get rid of yours and we won't put ours in place.'"

That is a clear and straightforward description of the option.

On 1 November 1983 the Prime Minister said:

"No one would be better pleased than the Government if the result of negotiations was a zero option by the end of the year."—[Official Report, 1 November 1983; Vol. 47, c. 736.]

That was clear, unconditional support for a simple zero option solution. No qualifications were being set out at that stage about, for example, short-range weapons. It seems that it was the Reykjavik summit that set the alarm bells ringing. That summit seemed suddenly to reveal the possibility that the zero option was no longer an abstract theory, no longer a negotiating position. At that stage zero option was threatening to become a reality, and the right hon. Lady seemed to be somewhat concerned about how far President Reagan was intending to go in his negotiations with the Soviet Union.

The Camp David meeting between the President and the Prime Minister produced the statement of November 1986 suggesting that

"priority should be given to an INF agreement with restraints on shorter range systems."

That was no different in character from what had been said before about shorter-range systems in relation to INF. However, the Prime Minister seems to have reinterpreted the Camp David statement in a much stronger form. On 18 November 1986 she was talking about an INF agreement and saying:

"It would also be subject to negotiating at the same time on shorter-range systems".—[Official Report, 18 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 444.]

In other words, an INF deal was somehow to be held hostage to progress on shorter-range systems.

That is not the view that American Administration officials have taken. Paul Nitze and other officials have made it clear that the United States endorsed the Reykjavik understanding that short-range INF systems would be dealt with but in follow-on negotiations. There has been no support for the idea that an INF deal would somehow be conditional on an agreement on short-range systems.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has great experience of these matters because I am a member of the North Atlantic assembly with him. Does he agree that General Rogers, the C in C of NATO in Europe, took the same position as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister? He had doubts and he wanted to safeguard certain matters.

Mr. Cartwright: That is a fair point. I wish to consider short-range systems in more detail later. When I reach that stage, I shall try to deal with the issue which the hon. Gentleman has raised.

I was dealing with the switch in Government emphasis and the much greater importance that was suddenly given to short-range INF systems after the Reykjavik summit. The Secretary of State for Defence does not seem to have been swept along by the sudden anxiety about short-range systems. The right hon. Gentleman attended a Gleneagles meeting of NATO Defence Ministers in October after the Reykjavik summit and he was quoted in a number of national newspapers on 22 October as saying:

"any INF deal should take into account the 'wider spread of weapons' in Europe, but at the end of the day 'if we can get a deal on INF alone then that's fine as far as the British Government is concerned.'"

That was a welcome statement, and I shall be interested to see whether the right hon. Gentleman is as clear-cut in his comments this afternoon on that issue or whether he, too, has had to refine his attitude towards the zero option.

Since Mr. Gorbachev's statement on 28 February the Prime Minister has become even more strident in her denunciations of what she has described as the "huge imbalance" in the Soviet Union's favour in shorter-range nuclear systems in Europe. She has talked about the Soviet Union's "total superiority" in such systems. As a result, it seems that there is a suggestion that no deal should be done on INF until the imbalance is somehow sorted out.

I wish briefly to consider the issue of shorter-range INF systems. It is understandable that there should be concern that, if the SS20s are withdrawn, their role might be performed by shorter-range systems, especially if those systems are based forward. We know that the SS21s and SS22s were brought forward into eastern Europe as a counter to cruise and Pershing deployments after December 1983. The Soviets have made it clear, however, that they are willing to withdraw those forward-based SS21s, SS12s and SS22s as soon as an agreement is signed on INF systems—the cruise and the Pershing on the NATO side and the SS20 on the Soviet side. There is thus a willingness on the part of the Soviet Union to deal with the problem as soon as an INF deal is signed.

There is also a proposal by the Soviet side to begin talks immediately with a view to reducing and, if necessary, eliminating other nuclear missiles in Europe. There is a willingness, a possibility and a potential for dealing with the problem to some extent immediately, and further by additional negotiations.

There is nothing new about Soviet superiority in shorter-range nuclear missiles. That has been the position for at least 20 years. It was well known in December 1979 when NATO took its dual-track decision, and NATO did not make that decision relate to the problem of shorter range systems.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I appreciate that there were strong political reasons for Europe taking that dual-track stance in 1979 and again later. I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the world has moved on since then, especially in the grey area of shorter-range systems. Is he suggesting that we should trust the Soviet Union, after we have signed a zero-option agreement on long-range systems, to fulfil the promise that it has made, and that there should be no linkage with the discussions on long-range systems?

Mr. Cartwright: I believe that the deal that was accepted by both sides at Reykjavik is a sensible one. We can arrive at a settlement on the long-range INF systems immediately — that was implied originally by the 1979 dual-track decision — and then move on to consider short-range systems. I take up the issue of the Soviet short-range threat.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the West should trade the certainty that its own INF, which has been so painfully put in place, would be dismantled in return for the possibility of negotiations, with no certain outcome, on short-range systems that directly affect us?

Mr. Cartwright: I am suggesting that the deal that was worked out at Reykjavik is a sensible one. It responds immediately to what was set out to be dealt with in 1979, the longer-range INF systems. The Soviets have offered negotiations and to take back immediately the systems which have been based forward. They have offered negotiations on the shorter-range systems. That seems to be acceptable to the United States and I cannot understand why it is not acceptable to Conservative Members.

I shall deal with the alleged difficulty about Soviet short-range systems. The most modern SS21s and SS23s account for only about 200 systems in the Soviet inventory. Much of the apparent Soviet superiority consists of elderly missiles of extremely doubtful accuracy. It is worth saying that Soviet superiority in very short-range systems, such as battlefield and short-range tactical systems, is balanced by NATO's much larger stocks of nuclear artillery shells and bombs. That is something we should bear much in mind.

Short-range systems are certainly important but we should not allow ourselves to be mesmerised by the problem. Secondly, we should not start to shift the INF goalposts as a result of the Soviet's superiority in short-range systems.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): I am interested that the hon. Gentleman is now such an enthusiastic supporter of the zero-zero option for intermediate nuclear systems. That has not always been his position. In a debate in the House on 31 October 1983, the alliance tabled an amendment that urged the Government effectively to cease deploying cruise and Pershing missiles in exchange for a reduction by the Soviet Union in the number of SS20s that they deploy. Does he think in retrospect that that was wrong and that the Government's decision was right?

Mr. Cartwright: No. If the hon. Gentleman does a little more research than he has apparently done, or does not depend only on Tory Central Office, he will discover that in that debate the alliance had an amendment of its own which called for further negotiations with the Soviet Union without in any way weakening NATO's bargaining position. He would also find out that my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) made it clear that we regarded the zero option as the best long-term possibility, but at that stage in the game it was not a practical possibility because the Soviet Union had clearly ruled it out. Therefore, we were arguing for something very much closer to the "walk in the woods" solution, which had a great deal of support at that time.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): The hon. Gentleman has put fairly the position that he put in the debate in 1983. However, does he recall that he and his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Social Democratic and Liberal parties, including the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), voted against the deployment of cruise and Pershing at the end of the debate, with the Labour party? Every single one of them voted in that way.

Mr. Cartwright: Every member of the alliance voted in favour of our amendment and the Labour party summoned up all its courage on the issue and bravely abstained on our amendment. That was the position. We set out five objections to the Government's motion and we voted against the Government's motion, not against deployment. If the right hon. Gentleman disputes that in any way I refer him to the comment made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) on 23 November 1983 after the Soviet Union had quit the negotiations at Geneva. He said:

> "NATO has no alternative but to continue with the first stage of the deployment."—[Official Report, 23 November 1983; Vol. 49, c. 329.]

That kills the right hon. Gentleman's argument that somehow we voted against deployment. We did not; we voted against the Government.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cartwright: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. I have been generous in giving way.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Does my hon. Friend recall that when I was the defence spokesman for the Liberal party in 1979 I agreed with the Government on the need to deploy cruise and Pershing missiles if the SS20s were not withdrawn and I repeated that and carried the party with me in 1981 at Blackpool?

Mr. Cartwright: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that helpful contribution.

Mr. Leigh rose——

Mr. Cartwright: I have been reasonably generous in giving way. I think that I have given way sufficiently for the moment.

I want to move on to some of the other issues that have been raised against the background of Mr. Gorbachev's announcement. That includes issues such as verification, chemical weapons, the conventional imbalance and the doctrine of flexible response. All those issues have been raised in relation to the possibility of an IMF deal.

Verification is obviously an extremely essential element in any agreement. The United States has proposed a full exchange of information. It has proposed on-site verification of dismantling and effective monitoring of the future of missile sites. The Soviet Union, for its part, has agreed in principle but has so far been somewhat reluctant to fix details of verification procedures. However, modern satellite surveillance systems have enabled us to know accurately the details of SS20 deployments made so far and I believe that it should be possible by using those methods to prevent cheating. It is worth recalling that there are problems for the Soviet Union, too. The United States deploys many hundreds of cruise missiles which could be nuclear armed or conventionally armed. It is extremely difficult for the Soviet Union to know whether they are carrying nuclear or conventional warheads. Verification will obviously involve a great deal of tough, detailed negotiation but I do not believe that it should be allowed to become a stumbling block in the progress towards an agreement.

There is no doubt that the Soviet Union's possession of chemical weapons is a threat but that threat has not radically changed since December 1979. The progress now being made at the United Nations disarmament conference—I give credit to Her Majesty's Government for the role Britain has played in the negotiations—is of great importance. Currently, the negotiations are balanced on the issue of verification, particularly the American concern about challenge verification, but I cannot believe that tying chemical weapons to an INF deal in any way would make agreement at Geneva any easier.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): On the matter of chemical weapons, when the hon. Gentleman says that the threat has not changed, is he telling the House that there has not been a build-up of Soviet chemical weapons since 1979?

Mr. Cartwright: I accept that there has been a build-up but the threat, as an effective threat, is still there. There has been no additional strengthening of that threat. The United States' decision to press ahead with the binary system is something that I very much regret, but whether the threat is stronger or at the same level, the situation is not altered or improved by trying to link negotiations on chemical weapons to INF negotiations.

It has been suggested in some quarters that NATO somehow needs the cruise and Pershing missiles to answer Soviet conventional superiority in Europe. It is worth reminding ourselves that those weapons systems were not deployed in answer to a Soviet conventional superiority. They were deployed in answer to the Soviet's introduction of very much more powerful, accurate and sophisticated intermediate nuclear weapons. NATO was well aware of the conventional imbalance in December 1979 when it took the dual-track decision but it was not an element in that decision. The deployment of cruise and Pershing was conditional on the Soviet removal of SS20 and not on cuts in conventional forces. Again, I would argue that there is no hard evidence that the conventional position has worsened dramatically since December 1979. In fact, I would suggest that there is some evidence that NATO is at last beginning to get its act together on conventional forces.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cartwright: Yes, but this must be the last time.

Mr. Stewart: Would the hon. Gentleman take into account the evidence of Robert McNamara from his tremendous knowledge of the position, that when there is a slight preponderance in favour of the Soviet Union, it has been grossly exaggerated?

Mr. Cartwright: I would probably go a little further than the right hon. Gentleman. I do not think that it is a "slight preponderance" but a worrying preponderance. However, I take the view that one can exaggerate. That is a fair point.

In NATO we cannot go on seeing nuclear weapons as some sort of crutch to bolster NATO's conventional deficiencies. Deterrence has to rest on a mix of nuclear and conventional strength and the nuclear component ought to be seen as a weapon of last resort, not something to be used for war fighting. Therefore, I could not accept any attempt to link an INF deal to conventional force levels. That is an important issue but it should be the subject of separate negotiations.

That brings me to the issue of flexible response. I certainly accept that it could be argued that a zero option and the removal of intermediate nuclear missiles undermines the doctrine of flexible response because it removes one rung in the ladder of escalation. However, that again was clearly foreseen in December 1979 as an inherent result of the dual-track decision. If the SS20s are removed there is not the same need to respond with comparable nuclear weapons systems. In any case, NATO would retain substantial nuclear capability in the European theatre; for example, dual-capable aircraft, United States submarine-launched cruise missiles and even the United Kingdom nuclear forces dedicated to NATO.

In any case I have some doubts about the scenario of nuclear escalation being based on some sort of stately gavotte starting with battlefield systems, moving through tactical and intermediate systems to strategic nuclear weapons. I agree with General Rogers, the supreme allied commander in Europe, who has always said that when one crosses the nuclear threshold at the lowest level one has no idea about what will flow from that decision. Therefore, I do not believe that we should let some slavish adherence to the doctrine of flexible response stand in the way of sensible disarmament.

The Government are right to be careful and cautious about the prospect for an INF deal. The deal is certainly not in the bag. A great deal more negotiation will be needed before we can sign an agreement. Therefore, a cautious and careful approach is justified but there is a difference between being cautious and careful and raising unnecessary obstacles along the road. I think that we are all agreed that Mr. Gorbachev was wrong to link INF agreements to progress on SDI. It would be just as wrong now for the West to try to link an INF deal to other important issues which must be the subject of separate negotiations. NATO fixed the goalposts of the zero option in 1981 and it would be foolish for us now to try to move them.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman speaks with great knowledge and authority on these matters. Therefore, can he tell the House once and for all, because it is important for the House and the nation to know, whether he now disavows the statement in the official 1986 Liberal publication "These are Liberal Policies", that the alliance was opposed to the deployment of cruise missiles?

Mr. Cartwright: Fortunately, I am not responsible for what goes into "These are Liberal Policies". If that statement were simply reflecting a Liberal assembly decision, no doubt it was an accurate description of the Liberal assembly vote. However, if we are talking about the way in which the alliance votes in Parliament and the position that it took, it is absolutely clear that we backed the dual-track position of December 1979. Although we wanted negotiations to go on until the last moment and we wanted them to succeed, at the end of the day we accepted that deployment had to take place. That is the position, which we made absolutely clear.

Let me look again at the prospects for negotiations. The House should also bear in mind that an agreement on INF would be an important confidence-building step for other negotiations, which are likely to be even more complex and demanding, for example, on shorter-range systems, conventional defence, chemical warfare, and so on. Those of us who believe in negotiated disarmament should bear in mind that it is important that we start to show some results from negotiated disarmament. The Labour party is no longer interested in securing negotiated disarmament. It believes that one disarms first and hopes that the others will follow in one's footsteps. Those of us who do not accept that road and who believe that disarmament comes through negotiations must now start to show some results. There is not much to show from the past—the threshold test ban treaty, the unratified and now increasingly tattered SALT II and an ABM treaty that is increasingly under pressure. There is now a welcome sense of urgency about INF negotiations, and it would not be right for us to confuse our objectives with other important issues.

We need a clear step-by-step approach to the difficult and time-consuming business of disarmament negotiations. That approach was endorsed strongly by the Foreign Secretary in the unlikely setting of a dinner in East Berlin on 4 April 1985 when he justified the case for seeking individual disarmament agreements by quoting Plutarch as having said:

"Many things which cannot be overcome when they are taken together yield themselves up when taken little by little."

Those words are just as relevant today as when the Foreign Secretary used them almost two years ago.

I urge the Government to throw their full weight behind the effort to secure the zero option as a vital first step in the long process of negotiated disarmament.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): I am most grateful to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) for giving us the opportunity to discuss what is undoubtedly a matter of great importance, which greatly interests all hon. Members. I thank him for the thoughtful way in which he has done his best to present a case, but I am bound to add that I cannot help feeling a great deal of sympathy for him in the impossible task with which he has been landed. There are some clear pointers to the extreme difficulty of that task. One is a truly extraordinary situation that I cannot recall happening before. An Opposition party that had to choose an important matter for a debate in which there are clear policy lines to be discussed has failed even to attempt to table a motion on which the House can express a view for or against. We know why that is. There is not the remotest chance that the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party could have got together between the middle of last week and now and devised any motion that would have got both parties into the same Lobby.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): My right hon. Friend says that he cannot recall a similar incident. I recall not long ago a debate on defence matters, initiated by the leader of the Liberal party, in which he gave several options, none of which he thought he would favour. In fact, he said in terms that these matters could not be decided by a party in opposition because it did not have sufficient knowledge.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is correct. I remember that other strange operation, of which today's operation reminds me, when the leader of the Liberal party produced 10 different options. He expressed doubts about all of them, and none has been heard of again. That is not surprising.

It cannot be without significance that this important debate, decided upon by the alliance I understand, has been attended by only two members of the Liberal party. It is clear why that is so. Most of the remarks of the hon. Member for Woolwich—certainly all those with which I agreed, of which there were a considerable number—would be turned down outright by any version of the Liberal assembly that anyone likes to invent.

With respect to the hon. Gentleman, his anxiety to try to please both halves of his responsibilities has led him to some strange conclusions. He said that he had no doubt that the zero option was a good deal. I am grateful for that. He is right. That is why we should pursue it. However, the hon. Gentleman may not have remembered that on 31 October 1983 his right hon. Friend—if that is the right description—the leader of the Liberal party gave as the third reason for not having supported the Government on the twin track decision that he did not agree with the emphasis put on the zero option.

Mr. Cartwright: I cannot let the right hon. Gentleman get away with that. If he looks at the rest of what my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal party said, he will see that he said that he dislikes the emphasis placed on the zero option, and he added:

"Of course that was the best option".—[Official Report, 31 October 1983; Vol. 47, c. 640.]

But it was not the best option to obtain agreement at that time.

Mr. Younger: That was a noble effort. I can only say that, in the Government's view, that was the best option; and today it is clear that it has paid off handsomely and the Government were right throughout.

The hon. Gentleman tried to suggest that the Americans were not in favour of restraints on the short-range intermediate nuclear forces. With respect, that is untrue. It has been part of the American negotiating position for several years—about four or five years. So the hon. Gentleman is not correct on that.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned that Mr. Gorbachev was said to have announced that he would withdraw the short-range intermediate nuclear weapons, but the point is that the word is "withdraw". The hon. Gentleman would do well to ponder the difference between "withdraw" and "destroy". Withdrawing those highly mobile weapons is not a great reassurance to those of us who are frightened that they could easily be moved around quickly and deployed against us.

The hon. Gentleman has one advantage in his difficult task—he is provided, by the twin-headed advisers who sit behind him, with an argument for almost every occasion. He cannot be stuck, whatever happens. For instance, he had to marry the difference between these two statements. His hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), whom I am delighted to see here, correctly intervened on 13 December 1979 to say:

"I, on behalf of my parliamentary colleagues, fully support the decisions taken in Brussels yesterday, as we agree that it is necessary to update and modernise the NATO theatre nuclear capability."—[Official Report, 13 December 1979; Vol. 975, c. 1545.]

Well done indeed. However, let us look at the more up-to-date "These are Liberal Policies" of 1986. Page 19 of the Liberal document states:

"The Liberal Party and the Alliance in Parliament oppose the deployment of cruise missiles in this country. We will seek the immediate removal of those that have now arrived."

It is a hard task to represent the alliance on a subject such as this.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Woolwich on one strange theory that he produced today, which simply will not do, and I hope that he will not try it again. He said that he is not responsible for Liberal party policy. I understood that he was appointed as the defence spokesman of the alliance. I can reveal to the House that the alliance consists of two parties — the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party. Therefore, whether the hon. Gentleman likes it or not, from now on he is responsible for the policies of the Liberal party.

Mr. Stephen Ross: No—for the alliance party.

Mr. Younger: From a sedentary position, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight has said, "for the alliance party." Unfortunately, the electors are not given such a luxury. Each one of us must decide whether we support a particular candidate in our constituency. We must support either a Social Democrat or a Liberal, and the policy must be spoken for by the alliance spokesman who is in the Chamber now. I believe that argument is one to which the hon. Gentleman had better not return.

I want to spend a few moments spelling out the Government's position on this important issue. In spite of all that I have said, we are grateful to the hon. Member for Woolwich for raising this issue. It is now more than seven years since NATO's twin track decision in 1979 to deploy long-range INF missiles in Europe and at the same time to seek an arms control agreement with the Soviet Union. It was a decision that epitomised this Government's approach to security: a determination to provide the defence forces we need, together with a willingness to reach arms control agreements that would provide for security at lower levels of weapons. We went ahead with those deployments, and today it is beginning to look as though the Soviet Union may at last be willing to negotiate a balanced agreement on them.

It is as well to remember how we got to where we are today. By 1979, the Soviet Union had reached approximate parity in strategic weapons with the United States. Then, as now, there was a gross imbalance in conventional forces in Europe. The Soviet Union was rapidly building up its deployments of Backfires and SS20 missiles. Each of these missiles is capable of carrying three nuclear warheads, which could strike targets throughout western Europe. Faced with these threats, it was clearly essential that NATO had an effective response, short of the strategic level, with European-based forces cabable of striking the Soviet Union. NATO's existing capability in this area consisted of aircraft — mainly US F111s — which were becoming increasingly vulnerable to attack on the ground and which faced increasing Soviet air defences. We and our NATO partners therefore decided in 1979 to modernise those forces with ground-launched cruise and Pershing II missiles, to be based in the United Kingdom and four other European countries, beginning in 1983. This was the deployment part of the 1979 decision. The arms control part of the decision was to seek a negotiated agreement on weapons of this type.

For many months, the Soviet Union refused to negotiate at all, but when it became clear that NATO was firm in its resolve to go ahead with the deployment part of its decision, it agreed to negotiations, and these began in November 1981. NATO's position throughout these negotiations has been that there should be global equality between United States and Soviet LRINF missiles.

The most radical proposal was the one we tabled in 1981 for a global ban on all United States and Soviet long range INF missiles. When it became clear that the Soviet Union was not ready for such a radical step, the United States, between 1983 and 1986, tabled a series of interim offers, providing for global equality at levels above zero. The deal agreed at Reykjavik was quite close to the original NATO proposal of global zero — but, as an important concession to the Soviet Union, it was agreed that it could retain 100 SS20 warheads in Soviet Asia, while the United States would retain a similar number in the United States.

What of the attitude of the Soviet Union? Well, we saw a range of tactical moves from the Russians. First, back in 1981, they pretended that balance already existed in INF weapons by distorting the figures and including the United Kingdom and French deterrents of a quite different nature and purpose. They claimed that this meant that NATO should not go ahead with deployments. They tried scare tactics, with dire predictions in 1983 about the consequences if NATO deployments went ahead. Then they tried walking out of the negotiations. When that did not work, they returned to the negotiating table, and we saw Gorbachev's offer of January last year, which offered a zero solution in Europe, but would have left the Soviets with 500 SS20 warheads in Asia, which could rapidly be returned to Europe at a time of tension. Finally, at Reykjavik, they agreed to the zero-100 solution.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Is not the right hon. Gentleman missing out the other important concession made by Mr. Gorbachev at Reykjavik—that he accepted that the French and the British should retain nuclear weapons as they were European states? Without that concession it would have been harder, and I believe indeed wrong, for the United States to have accepted the 100 SS20s on the Chinese border.

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman is quite correct. I was going to mention that later. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would agree that the reason why the Russians accepted that qualification was largely that we were clearly determined not to be pushed from that position. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would be generous enough to agree with that.

Mr. Wilkinson: Would my right hon. Friend clarify a very important point about the Soviet SS20 deployments? He referred to Soviet Asia. Is it not true that the 100 SS20s could, from Soviet Asia, threaten Iran, Turkey, Pakistan, the ASEAN states and Japan? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Soviets are seeking to prevent the United States from deploying their 100 INF systems in Alaska?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is correct. Of course, the precise positioning of where we can agree to have those 100 missiles in the Soviet Union will be an important part of the negotiations.

Having reached the zero-100 solution, the Soviet Union then put up another obstacle. Mr. Gorbachev had agreed at his Geneva summit with President Reagan in 1985 that an INF deal could be agreed independently of the other negotiations. But at Reykjavik this linkage was imposed once again. The Russians declared that they could not go ahead with an INF deal without a solution on the SDI, and the opening of negotiations on a comprehensive test ban. It was always hard to see the logic in this position, and we can all welcome the fact that this latest Soviet barrier to progress in the negotiations has also been put aside.

One prominent red herring has been the Soviet attempt to involve the United Kingdom and French deterrents, and the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) raised that point a moment ago. We and our NATO allies have been clear throughout that they have nothing whatever to do with the INF negotiations, which are about land-based intermediate range United States and Soviet systems. At first the Soviets claimed that those national deterrents should be matched against their SS20s in Europe; then they tried insisting that they should be prevented from being modernised; and finally, at Reykjavik, Mr. Gorbachev confirmed Soviet acceptance that they had no connection with the INF negotiations.

What lessons can be drawn from this? It is obvious enough that many of the Soviet proposals have been tabled not so much in order to make progress towards a negotiated solution, but rather with the hope of beguiling Western publics and undermining support for NATO deployments and our negotiating positions. Our people, or most of them, are not as naive as some in the Soviet Union appear to think. You will need no reminding, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of the volume and heat of the debate on INF deployments when it reached its height in 1983. But we and our allies were clear in our determination to proceed with deployments unless an equitable deal could be reached, and the general election result that year demonstrated that, despite the antics of a noisy minority, the British public knew that to be the right course.

At this point it must be recorded for the benefit of the right hon. Member for Devonport and his right hon. and hon. Friends that throughout this business the Labour party has been solidly supporting the actions and efforts of the Soviet Union to drive a wedge between the two halves of the Alliance on this point. Many Labour Members know that to be true.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is most important that we should be extemely cautious about this offer from Mr. Gorbachev, especially as in his statement on 2 March he said:

"Of course, the conclusion of such an agreement, as has been repeatedly emphasised, should be conditioned by a decision on the prevention of deployment of weapons in space, in view of the organic interconnection of these issues."?

In other words, there appears to be something of a qualification there.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend has raised two points. First, I am sure he will agree that this is not an offer from Mr. Gorbachev. We must remember that this is not an offer from Mr. Gorbachev; this is an acceptance by Mr. Gorbachev of the offer that we have been making and that has been on the table for some considerable time.

Secondly, my hon. Friend may be right to say that there is a qualification in those words. However, as I read them, they refer specifically to deployment, and it is common ground in the West that deployment is not allowed under the anti-ballistic missile treaty and, if it became necessary, it would have to be the subject of negotiation between East and West.

There are other conclusions to be drawn from all this. The 1979 twin track decision was the result of extremely close consultation in the Alliance, and that consultation has continued to this day, at all levels. We have worked together, respecting each other's needs and interests, in pursuing our common goal, often in the face of great pressure and difficulties. That is the strength of the Alliance—that we can work together on that basis—and Opposition Members would do well to reflect solemnly on that fact.

One other point is abundantly clear. We would have got nowhere in the negotiations if we had not been determined to proceed with deploying cruise and Pershing II missiles. We have done so, and that has brought us to the position today where we can see the outline of a deal that would get rid of 90 per cent. of the Soviet SS20 threat. What would the Soviets have offered the unilateralists? What would they have offered if we had failed to go ahead with our deployments?

But we are not home yet. During the past few days, some hon. Members seem to have acquired the impression that an INF agreement is in the bag. That is far from being the case. The Soviet Union has removed this latest self-imposed obstacle, and that is to be warmly welcomed, but a number of important issues need to be resolved, not by declarations and speeches, but by serious and detailed negotiations, if we are to have an agreement. Important details on the long-range INF missile reductions must be resolved. There is also the question of shorter-range INF missiles, which the hon. Member for Woolwich mentioned at some length, which have ranges between 150 km and 1,000 km. The Soviet Union has a large imbalance of about 9 : 1 in its favour at this range band. It is an important range, because it allows missile systems in the Warsaw pact to target almost all of western Europe, while NATO missiles of a similar range would be incapable of targeting the Soviet Union. If they were left unconstrained in an LRINF agreement, and especially an agreement banning LRINF missiles in Europe, this could be undercut by Soviet deployments of SRINF systems that could be almost as effective.

That is why part of NATO's negotiating position since 1982 has been that any INF agreement should include constraints on SRINF missile systems of the 500 km to 1,000 km range, which means the Soviet Scaleboard and SS23 missiles. The NATO proposal has remained broadly the same over those years. It calls for a ceiling in Soviet systems of this range, together with a United States right to match them. It is an essential condition for any equitable INF agreement, but the Soviet Union has yet to agree to it. Its offer of negotiations on missile systems of 1,000 km and below is all very well, but it does not provide what is required to prevent an INF agreement from being undercut by deployments at this level.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): There is bound to be an element of confusion in relation to the word "we". I hope that the Secretary of State will try to establish any difference of emphasis between the negotiating posture that INF should be linked to the short-range missiles possessed by the Soviet Union and NATO in Europe and what he seems to be suggesting is the Government and NATO position.

Mr. Younger: I am not sure whether I understood the hon. Gentleman's point, but I have tried to make clear to the best of my ability whether I mean the United Kingdom or NATO when I have used the word "we". If I have not done so, I apologise and will try to make sure that it is clear in the future.

Mr. Douglas: I am sorry if I did not put it clearly. The deficiency is obviously mine. What I am trying to establish is that the United States' negotiating policy does not seem to have a linkage to the short-range nuclear weapons in Europe. We seem to be insisting on such a link.

Mr. Younger: I do not think the hon. Gentleman is correct. It has been part of the United States' negotiating position for years that there should be constraints on short-range systems. That was clearly repeated to me recently when I was in Washington and when Ambassador Nitze and Richard Perle came over here last week.

Mr. A. J. Biffen (Berwick-upon-Tweed): There is a world of difference between reminding the House that the United States and, indeed, Britain continue to be concerned about short-range nuclear missiles and about seeking a solution to the problem and declaring that it is a condition of arriving at the INF agreement.

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman had better check it again himself, but this has been part of the position on the negotiations for a very long time. Indeed, he will find that it is part of the United States' negotiating position at Geneva.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): As I understand it, the United States has produced a counter-proposal to the Soviet initiative — if we can call it that — and circulated a draft treaty. Does that draft treaty refer to SRINF?

Mr. Younger: I cannot go into detail on the proposal that the United States has tabled at Geneva. The negotiators on both sides will know, but I cannot go into that today. I am absolutely clear that the United States has agreed—this was reinforced to me recently—that this is part of its negotiating position. There is no change in that position, and this difficulty, if it is one, is entirely imaginary.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): This is the nub of the debate. My understanding is that the United States' position, as expressed by Mr. Maynard Glitman in Geneva last week, was that they would deal with the intermediate nuclear force negotiations and secure a treaty, in the expectation that they would follow it immediately with further negotiations to deal with the other short-range missiles. That excludes the offer that Gorbachev has apparently made to withdraw — the Secretary of State used the correct word — those deployed in Eastern Europe as a result of our deployment of cruise.

As there might be a difference between the British Government and the United States Government, the House will be interested to know the answer to this question. Is it the view of Her Majesty's Government that short-range nuclear missiles must be included in the same treaty as that for intermediate nuclear forces, on which they seem to be about to embark? If so, those of us who supported the Government's attitude on deployment would differ from them very strongly.

Mr. Younger: I think that I can give the right hon. Gentleman the assurance for which he asks. He may have noticed that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary referred to this in a broadcast on Sunday, but it was made clear that the draft treaty contains articles constraining the shorter-range weapons that might be used to bypass an LRINF agreement. That is clearly in the negotiating position as of now. I can answer the right hon. Gentleman's question by saying that, of course, it is possible that an initial agreement may be drawn up containing constraints, and it does not rule out later negotiations about other aspects further to the constraints that may have been agreed. But our position is clear. If an INF agreement is to be struck, it must include constraints on SRINF, the details of which are still to be negotiated. I hope that that reassures the right hon. Gentleman. It is certainly intended to do so.

It is for these reasons that NATO's position is that, in the event of an LRINF agreement, it will also be important that it is followed by negotiations aimed at addressing the imbalance in SRINF forces and dealing further with LRINF. Furthermore, as the Prime Minister and President Reagan agreed at Camp David last year, reducing the levels of nuclear weapons will increase the importance of eliminating conventional disparities. But there is no suggestion that we are imposing any formal negotiating linkage between these aims and an INF agreement. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office will deal with this issue further, if he is fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, later this evening.

The third issue that needs to be resolved in an INF agreement is verification. We have welcomed the general statements by the Soviets of willingness to accept on-site inspection, but, if an agreement is to be effectively verifiable, it will need to include specific and detailed provisions as to how this is to be achieved. This will require long and painstaking negotiations and a constructive approach on both sides. We will need to be patient, and the Soviet Union will have to understand that we will not be rushed into an agreement with inadequate verification just on promises that the details can be settled later. But if the Soviet Union really wants an agreement, and is prepared to negotiate constructively, then it will find the United States, with the full support of its allies, more than willing to join it in negotiating and implementing an agreement.

I should like to conclude by giving a view of the Reykjavik INF European zero deal from my point of view as Secretary of State for Defence. We have seen a lot of comment in the press over worries in Europe about the deterrence implications of this INF deal. It would indeed involve the complete removal of the cruise and Pershing II missiles that we have worked so hard to deploy here in the first place. Of course, any arms control agreement that involves substantial reductions of forces will mean difficult choices and hard decisions. We and our NATO allies have discussed these and will continue to do so in the months ahead; but the Reykjavik deal would also remove a major element of the Soviet intermediate range threat facing us, and I am totally confident that we would be able to maintain effective deterrence following such a deal. I also hope and believe that a successful INF deal would help to make progress possible in other areas of arms control.

The Government's policies on all this are clear. We will maintain the forces required for effective deterrence — unlike some who would throw them away. We will work with our allies to maintain our common security — unlike some who would throw them out. In this way, rather than through pious statements and wishful thinking, we will also provide the most effective basis for reaching arms control agreements that can provide for security at lower levels of forces.

I started by welcoming this debate and making a few suggestions to the hon. Member for Woolwich, who opened the debate, about how difficult his task must be. However, his task is relatively simple compared to the task facing the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) who is to speak in the debate. The whole House awaits with great interest every word that will be spoken by the right hon. Gentleman. It is widely known, not just in this House but throughout the Western Alliance, that the right hon. Gentleman is gravely disturbed and greatly disagrees with the vast majority of the Labour party's policy on this matter. Yet he is faced with the prospect of making a speech defending many matters with which he completely disagrees.

Moreover, the right hon. Gentleman has to do that, a time when it has become crystal clear that the policy followed by the Labour party for the last four or five years has fallen in ruins about the ears of those by whom it was formulated. They have resisted, fought and disagreed with the whole policy of deploying cruise missiles in response to the SS20s on the basis that to do so would force the Soviet Union never to remove them and to be more intransigent than ever.

It is plain to anyone who can read and understand English that exactly the reverse has taken place, purely because we resisted the blandishments of the right hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends, although usually he did not employ such blandishments — until recently anyway — and stood up to the threats that were made and deployed the cruise missiles. As a direct result that Soviet Union is now prepared to come to discuss the removal not just of cruise missiles in this country and in other western European countries, but of the SS20s which caused the problem in the first place.

There can seldom have been a clearer case of the policy of a party being proved in mid flight to be absolutely unviable and to have produced the opposite effect to that which was intended. Therefore, it is a highly suitable policy for the Labour party to have adopted and I look forward to the right hon. Gentleman's defence of it.

4.54 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I shall start by echoing the Defence Secretary's words because I welcome the chance to debate this important matter. I am staggered to find that the alliance parties, as they call themselves, should have chosen to debate possibly the most important single issue in world affairs and yet neither the leader of the Social Democratic party nor the leader of the Liberal party has chosen to speak in the debate. Indeed, the leader of Liberal party is not even here.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Where is the leader of the Labour party?

Mr. Healey: My right hon. Friend will be here in a minute. I thank the Secretary of State for Defence for offering me a poisoned chalice. I hope to return it to him and watch him drink it to the dregs in the course of my speech.

I shall start by talking about the fundamental issue— about what is happening in the Soviet Union and how we should respond. I am afraid that so far that matter has been largely ignored by both opening speakers. I do not think that anyone any longer denies that something absolutely new and encouraging has been happening inside the Soviet Union since Mr. Gorbachev became general secretary. The incompetence and corruption of the Soviet bureaucracy is now castigated every day in the newspapers, officers of the KGB have been imprisoned for maltreating journalists and I noticed this morning that even Mr. Bernard Levin had left his machine-gun post unmanned on the Golan Heights to express his views about what was happening in the Soviet Union and, very reluctantly, to specultate that just possibly the whole system is beginning to transform itself.

Perhaps it is still too early to feel confident about how the internal situation in the Soviet Union will develop over the next few years. However, the evidence about fundamental changes in Soviet foreign policy is now overwhelming and highly encouraging. Last April Mr. Gorbachev used the jargon of dialectic materialism to renounce the doctrine of the inevitable conflict between the two camps that has guided Soviet foreign policy since the time of Lenin. He spelt out in more detail his new ideas about the world to the Soviet central committee and to the recent international forum in Moscow this year.

It is clear to all observers that he now believes two things which are quite new for a Soviet leader. First, that in the nuclear age security must be based on co-operation with one's political opponents rather than on a continuing arms race with them, and that both sides in their military arrangements should pursue purely defensive strategies. That was a central theme in his speech to the Moscow forum. The second fact that is emerging, not only from discussions like those recently attended by Professor Erickson but also from Soviet behaviour, is that the Soviet Government now accept that it is impossible to achieve military superiority in an arms race, that even equality is unnecessary and that the objective is sufficiency.

So far the only Western statesman who has had the wisdom to recognise and admit this in public is the West German Foreign Secretary Mr. Genscher in an impressive speech at Davos at the beginning of February, to which I had the privilege of listening. Since Mr. Genscher spoke, the truth of his remarks has been borne out by what Mr. Gorbachev said 10 days ago in Moscow. He accepted the zero option for intermediate nuclear forces that was first put to Mr. Brezhnev by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and me in September 1981 and adopted by NATO and President Reagan in November 1981.

The Secretary of State for Defence has said a good deal this afternoon about the reasons why that was put forward. It was not, with respect to him, a concession to Western strength, a response to the deployment of cruise and Pershing—first of all, because cruise and Pershing have already been matched since their deployment by the bringing forward of SS22 and perhaps SS23 missiles to Czechoslovakia and East Germany, and by the patrolling of submarine-launched cruise missiles off both American coasts.

I am rather surprised that the leader of the Social Democratic party should have taken so much credit in that outburst of his last week for the response to the cruise and Pershing deployment, when, as has been pointed out already, he and his Liberal colleagues voted against that specific proposal, side by side and shoulder to shoulder with the Labour party, in the only debate that we held on the matter before deployment, in 1983.

Mr. Maples: Despite all the exciting and encouraging noises coming out of the Soviet Union at the moment, does the right hon. Gentleman really think that Mr. Gorbachev would be offering to withdraw all SS20s from Europe if NATO had not deployed cruise missiles?

Mr. Healey: This is the question that I am immediately coming to. The striking thing about the zero option is that it is not a concession to Western strength; it is a concession from Soviet strength.

As the Secretary of State for Defence pointed out—this was confirmed yesterday by the American negotiator in Geneva — the zero option means that the Soviet Union will dismantle over three times as many missiles as NATO will dismantle and many more than three times as many warheads. If one adds in the Soviet missiles already deployed in the far east, they will have to be reduced from, I think, about 130 to some 33.

The plain fact is that this is a remarkable proposal. I suspect that General Rogers may be right in saying that some of the Western Governments who put it forward in 1981 did so only because they thought that the Soviet Government were certain to reject it. That was General Rogers's speculation in a speech that he made on the Gorbachev offer last week.

Since it was NATO which first proposed the zero option some five years ago, one would expect the Western Alliance to give it an immediate, unanimous and positive response. Yet the leaders of the Western Alliance are now running around like chickens with their heads chopped off. Oddly enough, the only Government who seem united and positive in their response are the Government who, in previous episodes of arms discussion, have been divided — the Government in Washington. For the first time since President Reagan came to power, Mr. Shultz, Mr. Weinberger, Mr. Nitze and Mr. Perle are all offering a welcome to Mr. Gorbachev's speech.

But that is far from being true elsewhere in the Alliance. NATO is behaving more like the alliance in this House than the Alliance of Western Governments. The Secretary-General, Lord Carrington, welcomed the proposals, but the Supreme Allied Commander, General Rogers, said that they gave him "gas pains" and said that they are unacceptable unless there is a simultaneous agreement, not only on short-range intermediate nuclear forces, but on chemical weapons and on conventional weapons.

In France, there is public disagreement. The President and the Prime Minister have pronounced themselves in favour; both the Foreign Minister and the Defence Minister have publicly pronounced themselves against. In West Germany, on the other hand, the Foreign Minister is in favour and the Defence Minister is against.

In Britain, the Gorbachev speech was met over the following two days by an avalanche of negative briefing, largely emanating, I understand, from No. 10 Downing street, which culminated in the extraordinary performance of the Prime Minister at Question Time last Thursday, when she brought the dinosaurs on her Back Benches shambling out of their caves to grunt approval of what she said because they thought that she was taking a bold, negative posture, as against the wet, wimpish posture of the American President — and, by God, they have actually put down an early-day motion in those terms.

The Prime Minister won the approval of the dinosaurs because she insisted that last Thursday there was a 9 : 1 superiority in short-range intermediate nuclear forces—those with a range of between 500 and 1,000 km—and that this must be corrected at the same time — she repeated this again and again and again—as there was an agreement on intermediate nuclear forces.

Yet in his broadcast yesterday, the Foreign Secretary took exactly the opposite view. I am glad to see that the Secretary of State for Defence agreed with him, rather than with the Prime Minister; I do not suppose that he is looking forward to his next meeting with "Attila the Hen", but still I do not suppose that he looked forward very much to his last meeting.

The plain fact is that what the Foreign Secretary said, and the Secretary of State for Defence repeated today, is that there must be some constraints on short-range intermediate nuclear forces in the same treaty as INF. Unlike the Secretary of State for Defence—who was a bit nervous about revealing that he either had or had not seen the draft treaty that the Russians have been reading for the last five days—the proposal in the American treaty is quite clear.

It is that the Russians should remove the SS22 and SS23 missiles which they brought forward — the right hon. Gentleman is quite right about that—to East Germany and Czechoslovakia, and that they should freeze their superiority of 9 : 1 and not increase their superiority so as to circumvent the removal of the intermediate nuclear forces. That is a completely different proposal and exactly the opposite of what the Prime Minister seemed to be saying last week.

Indeed, I was interested in the fact that Mr. Matthew Parris — one of our late colleagues, a former Conservative MP and a former member of the Prime Minister's kitchen cabinet—told the Foreign Secretary, after Mr. Parris had carefully deployed all the Prime Minister's arguments against agreeing to an INF treaty, that his position appeared to be just like a Conservative caricature of the Labour party's position.

[Mr. Healey]

I can see why Mr. Parris said that, and I can see why the Secretary of State for Defence is looking so thoughtful when I repeat it — because the American policy, endorsed by the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence, is to freeze the Soviet 9:1 advantage in SRINF and then begin to negotiate it after the treaty on INF is signed.

I see that the right hon. Gentleman does not dispute this. The only difference is that the Americans at Reykjavik said that they asserted the right to raise their number of SRINF to match those deployed by the Soviet Union. But their negotiators have since made it clear in Geneva, according to the newspapers, that they have no intention of taking advantage of that right. So we are going, in my view quite rightly, for an INF agreement which freezes a 9:1 superiority in SRINF and leaves that for negotiation immediately afterwards.

The question that we must ask ourselves is, if the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence are so convinced that this is the right policy, why has the Prime Minister tried to overthrow it—and on the eve of a visit to Moscow in which we assume that she was hoping to cut what the Italians call "una bella figura"? I think that there are three reasons. They are pretty obvious. The first is that she has been hoping to use her visit to Moscow as she, the Foreign Secretary and the Minister used his last visit—for self-advertisement for election purposes. That is not my phrase but that of the spokesman of the Soviet Foreign Office, Mr. Gerasimov, who was extremely irritated by some of the things which Ministers have said about their recent discussions with the Soviet Union.

The Conservative party's election strategy is based on reviving the psychoses of the cold war, the suggestion that there has been no real change in the Soviet Union since the days of Stalin and that the Russians would drop nuclear weapons on us if ever we adopted the same defence policy as most of the other NATO countries already have. We saw that in a recent and disgusting party political broadcast, a recent advertisement placed by the Conservative party in the Daily Express and in the quite disgraceful film which, I am glad to say, embarrassed even the Defence Secretary when he saw it, and which has been produced by the Ministry of Defence for circulation to schoolchildren.

The second reason why the Government, or the Prime Minister, have sought to torpedo the INF discussions is that, as she admitted in her communiqué signed at Camp David the other day, any agreement on nuclear weapons will make conventional forces more important. She knows that she is gravely weakening our conventional forces to pay for the Trident submarine programme. We have had a concatenation of military officers, starting with Major Lord Morpeth through General Frank Kitson up to Field Marshal Lord Bramall, who said in The Times this morning that if the Government go on like this, they will be shooting themselves in the foot and gravely damaging the morale of the British Army.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): The right hon. Gentleman talks about the weakening of our defence forces, but his policy and that of his party is to put our corps in Germany in an impossible position in which they could not hold one inch of ground on that important central front. He knows that and would never have supported such a policy in the past, so why on earth is he supporting it at the moment?

Mr. Healey: The hon. and, perhaps, gallant Member is talking tripe. If he reads the lengthy and thoughtful report of The Economist's defence correspondent, Mr. Meachin, last August, he will find that soldiers in the Rhine Army are confident of holding a Soviet attack. We also have the word of General Rogers, the supreme allied commander, that there is in any case no danger of a Soviet attack out of the blue.

Mr. Spicer: With no nuclear forces?

Mr. Healey: Yes, with no nuclear weapons. They were talking about the conventional capability. No British Army in Germany has ever carried out an exercise which involves the use of nuclear weapons because it has not the slightest idea how it would be possible to fight a war with nuclear weapons. Field Marshal Lord Carver and Lord Louis Mountbatten have said that it would be quite impossible ever to fight such a war.

Mr. Younger: In view of his usual marvellous array of name-dropping, which, according to my calculations, has now got to 11, and as the right hon. Gentleman has included The Economist of last August, would he care to look at this week's The Economist in which the main leading article is a devasting critique of everything that the Labour party stands for in defence?

Mr. Healey: I apologise for referring to Field Marshal Lord Bramall. I thought that, possibly, his name would impress the right hon. Gentleman, but the right hon. Gentleman is new to the job so I dare say that he has never even heard of him.

There is one thing that I should say about The Economist, however. The first six or seven pages are absolute tripe. The stuff that is good is the reporting which follows in the middle and latter part. I am sure that many Conservative Members share my view.

The third reason why the Prime Minister does not want an agreement on INF is that she knows that the next stage will be negotiations on strategic nuclear forces and that, in those negotiations, the Trident submarine programme is bound to be involved because there is not a cat in hell's chance of the United States providing Britain with Trident missiles if it has already agreed, as it is committed to try to do, to abolish all strategic ballistic missiles by 1995.

I should like to congratulate the Foreign Secretary and the Defence Secretary—this is the poisoned chalice that I told the right hon. Gentleman was coming—on trying once again to lead the Prime Minister back to reality. They have both had this problem ever since they have been in office. The Foreign Secretary had it only the other day with Hong Kong and Lord Carrington had it in spades with Rhodesia and many other issues.

The interesting thing about the Foreign Secretary's speech yesterday is that he went a little further and was a little franker than the Defence Secretary today. First, he utterly rejected the view of General Rogers, which was repeated by some Conservative Back Benchers a moment ago, that intermediate nuclear forces on the NATO side are a vital rung on the ladder of escalation. That was the initial reason why the NATO military tried to persuade NATO to introduce these weapons. It was not because of the SS20s, but as a rung on the ladder of escalation.

Secondly, the Foreign Secretary, not perhaps fully understanding what he was doing, also rejected the strategy of flexible response which depends on the concept——

Mr. Wilkinson: No, he did not.

Mr. Healey: With great respect, I know a little about this because I introduced this strategy 20 years ago. I just want to quote what he said.

Mr. Wilkinson: Who?

Mr. Healey: The Foreign Secretary. He said yesterday that he does not believe that it is possible to have a number of steps on a ladder, but that he favours uncertainty. We now have the Howe uncertainty principle to join the Heizenberg uncertainty principle. He said that it would be all right because we have what he bizarrely called a carnival of nuclear options. There is a circus element in the Foreign Secretary's approach to these problems and it is different from the way in which the NATO military look at it.

Thirdly, the Foreign Secretary fully supported the American proposals at Geneva which the Secretary of State for Defence has or has not seen but is not telling us about — although the Warsaw pact and the Soviet Government know them off by heart by now and although they have been rejected by the Prime Minister. He appeared to be quite relaxed about NATO's conventional position. He could not easily take up a different stance because he expressed those views in an interesting lecture which he gave to the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies only two months ago. He said then that the SRINF that he wanted dealt with were the SS22s and SS23s in Czechoslovakia and the German Democratic Republic. Mr. Gorbachev has already undertaken to withdraw them with the destruction of the SS20s when the time comes.

Mr. Wilkinson: No, he has not.

Mr. Healey: Oh yes he has.

Mr. Wilkinson: The general secretary of the Communist party has made no undertaking to withdraw the SS22s and SS23s. He has suggested that if a zero option agreement is reached he would consider negotiating their future, which is quite different.

Mr. Healey: With great respect, I have the text here and I shall read it out to the House in a moment. Mr. Gorbachev repeated what the Warsaw pact as a whole said at its meeting last June—that those weapons were put forward only because of the Western deployment of cruise and Pershing and that they would be withdrawn the moment an INF agreement was reached. Beyond that, he agreed to freeze the 9:1 disparity on the rest.

It is not surprising that the position of the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence this afternoon may be somewhat disappointing to those whose imagination was inflamed by the Prime Minister's remarks during Question Time. However, the plain fact is that we all know perfectly well—and this has been said many times by the Foreign Secretary—that disarmament will be achieved only step by step. If we do not reach the first step, the others will not follow.

As the Prime Minister agreed with President Reagan at Camp David, the first step must be agreement on the INF. Then we can discuss the shorter-range intermediate nuclear forces, where the imbalance is nothing like 9:1. We can achieve that only by leaving many of the NATO nuclear weapons out of account. Taking the shorter range forces as a whole, from the lowest to the highest, once cruise and Pershing have gone the United States will have 4,650 warheads in Europe with another 1,900 promised in case of tension. That includes the F111 bombers in Britain, which can drop bombs on Moscow, and, of course, the 400 Poseidon.

Mr. Cash: They will not be there.

Mr. Healey: They will not be there if we get an agreement on SRINF, which is what we want, and on the 400 Poseidon missiles, which are still allocated to SACEUR after the decision on deployment of cruise and Pershing.

The aim in the SRINF negotiations should be to get nuclear weapons out of Europe and to have a zero option for SRINF, just as we hope to have one for the INF. If that can be achieved, substantial cuts in conventional forces will be needed to provide a much better conventional balance. The imbalance is nothing like as great as some propaganda suggests. It is close to 1.2:1 if we take account of the military capability of NATO and the Warsaw pact in armoured defence equipment. The man who has argued that most persuasively, ambassador John Dean, for eight years conducted the MBFR negotiations for the United States in Vienna.

When the impending talks take place we should act on the advice of Mr. Genscher, which is that both sides should aim to be capable of only defensive operations, and not take an offensive stance.

We stand on the verge of a historic opportunity. If we achieve the deal on the LRINF which is in our grasp—the American and Soviet negotiators clearly think the same—we can start a process that gives the world new hope for peace through co-operation. It is desperately urgent to start that process, otherwise the prospect of proliferation in other countries will become imminent. There is already a nuclear rivalry between India and Pakistan on the subcontinent, and nuclear competition between Israel and the Arabs will be close behind. I fear that in the process of producing a new basis for world peace and security, there is no chance of the British Government taking the lead. The leadership is now with the United States and West Germany, with Britain far behind. However, I hope, at least, that what the Secretary of State for Defence has said today, and what the Foreign Secretary said yesterday, will persuade the British Prime Minister to remove the new obstacles to agreement that she rolled out into the road last Thursday.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): It is a pity that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) did not accept the invitation of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to talk about the policy of the Labour party. Rather than defend that policy, the right hon. Gentleman chose to defend the policy of Mr. Gorbachev. Apart from that, because of his usual knock-about, radio commentary style, I could not interpret what he was saying.

The subject of disarmament is extremely complicated. It has dragged on for years. It has attracted acronyms and nicknames galore and only a few people wish to thread their way through the debating minefield. As weapons change, and disarmament talks change, too, surely our present interests and objectives are fairly easy to identify. They are that we must not be left exposed to the much stronger conventional forces of the Eastern bloc. Some people say that we could and should rearm conventionally to the extent necessary to hold them off. In theory we could do that, but at the price of converting ourselves into an armed camp like Nazi Germany in the 1930s and Soviet Russia today.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): And by bringing back conscription.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: As my hon. and learned Friend says, we would have to bring back conscription.

I cannot think of a more dangerous situation. We are talking about two blocs armed to the teeth, both believing that, because the weapons are conventional, it might be possible to win a war. That part of the Labour party that believes in defence would bring about just such a position. We would return to the uncertainties of the 1930s, and the only certainty would be that sooner or later war would break out.

If everyone is sure that, because of the presence of nuclear weapons, no one can possibly win a war, there will be no war. To be more precise, our nuclear weapons must be of two particular types. First, we need battlefield nuclear weapons to counter conventional superiority; and, secondly, we need strategic nuclear weapons to ensure that Russia realises that her homeland would not escape. If we had those two types of weapons, there would be no war.

People may say that battlefield nuclear weapons are not meant to be used, and that if they were used war would escalate. So it would and, because the Russians also know that, they will not use them and will not start anything. If we have only strategic nuclear weapons and can only respond to a conventional defeat or impending defeat by self-destruction and blowing up the world, everyone knows that we would not do it. Such a weapon is incredible. It will not be used. One would need the inexorable logic of General de Gaulle to make that possible.

The intermediate weapons can go, provided that the other two types stay and that there are restraints on them, as suggested at Camp David after Reykjavik. Prior to the talks at Reykjavik, and immediately afterwards, I feared that the United States might press us too hard to come to some sort of agreement — and, even now, I have a sneaking feeling that the United States' President needs some kind of political prestige, and therefore might go a little too far for us. But I noted this morning that Mr. Max Kampelman, the negotiator for the United States, is reported to have said that he understands our need for short-range weapons.

There can be no doubt that the United States wants the agreement to succeed, and I believe that Mr. Gorbachev also wants it to succeed. Perhaps his principal reason for that is economic. The Soviet Union already lags far behind the United States and Europe economically, and it is falling further behind every day. In the year 2000 the gross national product of the Soviet Union will be half that of the United States and of Europe; and I do believe that the Communist system and technological age are even more remarkably inappropriate to bring economic welfare and prosperity to the USSR. Nevertheless, if it was not necessary for the Soviet Union to spend so much on armaments in the short term, that would obviously be some weight off the shoulders of the population.

Therefore, I hope that when the Prime Minister goes to Moscow, she will insist that the two sorts of nuclear weapons are necessary to us. I do not insist that they should match absolutely in numbers. We should have enough for our own purposes. If the others wish to keep more, that does not matter because they will not be used if we have them in sufficient quantity. We can do without the INF and the two superpowers could sharply reduce their strategic weapons without any loss of security to either. If chemical weapons could be thrown into the agreements as well, so much the better.

All those things depend on proper verification and negotiation. Those negotiations will take place because the Russians have seen that they will not get their way by our abandoning our weapons and being unwilling to defend ourselves.

If we get this preliminary step-by-step agreement about INF, that may create the climate of confidence upon which other negotiations and steps can be taken to secure the peace of our world.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): The hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) referred to the importance and necessity of step-by-step negotiations. That seems to be the right approach in all these matters. The hon. Member for Stroud made many points with which I agree.

However, I should like to go back a little further. I want to support the agreement put forward by the hon. Gentleman, but there is no doubt that when we first approached this question in about 1977 or 1978, although there were other reasons for considering cruise and Pershing, there was no doubt that the impetus that led us to believe that it might be necessary to deploy them if we could not reach agreement was the deployment of the SS20s. Undoubtedly, that led us to consider the matter carefully. At the Guadelupe meeting, which I attended with other Heads of Government and state, we agreed that we would make a further effort with the Soviet Union to secure if we could the withdrawal of the SS20s that had already been deployed. At the time, there were relatively few, about 20 or 30. If we could do that, we would seriously consider, as a measure of confidence, not proceeding with cruise and Pershing.

It seems that, eight years later, that is exactly the position to which we have returned, except that there have been changes in the deployment of other weapons. We still have to decide whether the bargain is worthwhile. I asked Mr. Gromyko about that after I had ceased to be the leader of the Labour party. He was adamant in his refusal to withdraw the SS20s, under any circumstances or in any conditions. I warned him at the time that if he insisted on continuing with that deployment, despite the agitation and protest in this country and elsewhere, I had no doubt that NATO would then deploy cruise and Pershing. He replied, "If that is the case, we must go ahead." It was one of the gloomiest interviews that I have had, because once again we were ratcheting up nuclear arms.

However, I have no doubt that our expressed determination to go ahead and deploy the SS20s and Pershing brought him back to the negotiating table. That is a lesson for people to learn now. One does not have to use the rhetoric of the United States. The personal abuse and the level to which the American Administration descended in the earlier part of President Reagan's tenure of office was deplorable. There is no need to use that kind of language to be firm. For what it is worth, my experience is that the Russians will pocket any concession that is made and say "Thank you" but give nothing in return. One must negotiate at every level.

After the Prime Minister spoke last week, I detected that we were apparently unwilling to show any confidence in securing an agreement with the Soviet Union. That is disappearing in this debate and the Foreign Secretary yesterday and the Defence Secretary this afternoon have gone some way to dispelling that. However, if that were so, there would be no hope for our Western world. There has to be some measure of confidence between us. I summed that up many years ago by saying, "Compete where we must, and co-operate where we can", and provided that we can reach agreements with the Soviet Union that are worthwhile to both sides, that must be of value to our people.

The latest proposal is worthwhile and we should accept it, subject, as the hon. Member for Stroud said, to proper verification. The proposal that the Soviet Union's 100 SS20s might be put into one military base at Novasibirsk is a good idea because it would make for proper and easy verification, and inspire the confidence that is necessary if we are to proceed to the next step. Assuming that we can get this agreement, we cannot leave it there.

Indeed, as far as I can see, after the meeting of the political bureau of the Communist party of the Soviet Union Mr. Gorbachev did not want to leave it there. He said:

"As soon as an agreement on eliminating Soviet and United States medium-range missiles in Europe is signed, the Soviet Union will withdraw longer range theatre missiles from the German Democratic Republic and Czechoslovakia by agreement with the governments of those countries, the missiles which had been deployed there as measures in reply to the deployment of Pershing-II and cruise missiles in Western Europe."

That should be a subject of discussion between us and not solely between the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe. The question remains, what happens, where they go and how far.

Mr. Gorbachev continued by making a further proposal:

"As far as other theatre missiles are concerned, we are prepared to begin talks immediately with a view to reducing and fully eliminating them."

Both sides could reduce those theatre nuclear missiles. Whatever the disparity, there would be no disadvantage to us in doing so.

Above all, General Secretary Gorbachev stated:

"the Soviet Government still considers it highly important to reach agreement on substantial limitation and then elimination of strategic arms."

Elimination is a long way away but substantial limitation is possible.

I hope that when the Prime Minister goes to Moscow she will take the following line with General Secretary Gorbachev. If we get this agreement on intermediate-range nuclear missiles, which would be of great value in beginning to build an element of confidence in the relationship between the two sides, she should say, "We in the West would be willing to reduce our strategic missiles if you would do the same by at least 50 per cent." If both sides cut 50 per cent. off the level of their strategic nuclear missiles, we would both still be hopelessly over-insured and paying far too big a premium.

Whatever the economic and financial consequences of doing that, the confidence that would begin to emerge in other directions would transform the position of the West and the East. A 50 per cent. reduction would be worthwhile. Obviously, our strategic nuclear weapons will be included in that. We should not resist including them in the calculation of both sides. I could never understand why the Soviet Union should be expected to exclude from the total calculation all the French and British strategic nuclear missiles, which was a line we took at one time. They must be included. They should not have been included in the nuclear intermediate range because they are outside that. If I were Mr. Gorbachev, I would insist on including in the calculation of strategic nuclear missiles ranged against me, not only American missiles, but French and British missiles. The total number of missiles must be counted. However, that does not mean that we must discard them. It may mean that there must be some reduction.

The question whether we go ahead with Trident is a moot point. Everyone who considers this matter must be concerned, as I am, about the level of our conventional forces. I am particularly worried about the naval element. We must review this constantly. I would not take a fixed view on Trident for ever and I would not abandon it now. The situation may change. If there is an important stragetic agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union, we may want to consider where we fit into the picture. Certainly we should not give up Trident up for nothing. We must negotiate our way out of this.

My view is well known and I do not intend to develop it further. I strongly applaud the Labour party's attitude to building conventional forces. The way in which it has focused on that has been of value to the country and I hope it will continue to do so. I hope that all hon. Members, wherever we may sit, will continue to review the changing circumstances in defence as events occur. The position today is certainly not the position of four years ago and it is even less the position when I left office. No one should adopt a fixed position for ever and allow considerations on defence weapons to be turned into ideology. That would be absurd.

I am glad about what the Secretary of State said this afternoon. I hope we shall support the approach that has been made in Geneva by the United States. If so, the world will have made a turning for the better.

5.42 pm

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): The last words of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) are of the greatest importance and I am sure that his support for the initiative in Geneva will add great weight to those considerations.

As the Member for Parliament for Greenham common, and as one who has INF missiles in his constituency, it is hardly surprising that I welcome Mr. Gorbachev's positive response to the Western position over the zero option and the withdrawal of intermediate range nuclear missiles. It is the fulfilment of the West's declared policy which began at the start of this decade that no cruise or Pershing II missiles will be deployed in NATO if the Soviet Union dismantles its SS20 force. Clearly, although we have been forced to deploy cruise and Pershing II because of Soviet intransigence, now that it has seen the error of its ways, who can do other than applaud it?

From the speeches so far, there is a danger of us all being sure that in Mr. Gorbachev's statement about moving towards the dismantling of medium-range missiles his definition of those missiles is the same as it is in Western Europe. In his statement he used three different descriptions for nuclear missiles in Europe. He described medium-range missiles, enhanced-range operational-tactical missiles and operational-tactical missiles. The question of definition will play an important part in the considerations at Geneva. Clearly, it is vital that we and the Soviet Union think in exactly the same terms.

If to the Soviet Union the zero option simply means withdrawing SS20s in exchange for withdrawing cruise and Pershing IIs, but leaving SS12s, SS22s and SS23s in place — weapons which can strike deep into Western Europe as far as Great Britain—we must all think again about the possible benefits of the treaty that seem to be within our grasp.

Verification appears to be a thorny issue. Satellite reconnaissance can do so much, but only so much. Unless each side is willing to allow something more, I find it difficult to know how a treaty can be made to stick. It is possible to hide missiles out of sight of satellites, so something like on-the-spot verification will be crucial.

If I sound marginally sceptical, it is because I have my constituents in mind. They accepted cruise missiles, not because they wanted a new generation of missiles in their midst at Greenham common, but because the continued security of NATO seemed to demand the deployment of those weapons. They believed, as I believed, that multilateral disarmament was the only safe way to reduce the nuclear threat. The question to which we require an answer is whether the withdrawal of SS20s, cruise and Pershing IIs will leave Western Europe as secure in the future as it is at present, or whether other circumstances have been created which reduce the effect of the zero option.

One is bound to ask, what has happened to make the Soviets change their mind from their apparently intransigent stand at the beginning of this decade to their present position? Within that change of stance there is now a willingness to uncouple an arms agreement on INF weapons from a halt to the American strategic defence initiative to consider the zero option as a relevant proposition.

I do not rule out the obvious differences which Mr. Gorbachev has made to East-West relations, but the difference seems to lie in his perception of the cold war — something on which the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) touched. Clearly, Mr. Gorbachev does not believe that the peace movement, CND, the Greenham protesters, the Greens in West Germany or even the Opposition's policy are likely to have much effect on the West's policies for the defence of Western Europe. That suggests that he does not think that the Opposition will win the general election.

Mr. Gorbachev also knows that the present American Administration will not abandon the SDI. Therefore, he seems to have calculated that what is necessary for Soviet security is a reduction in the immediate interface between the nuclear forces of the United States of America and the USSR in Western Europe. Perhaps the limited flight time of Pershing IIs from West to East has created too great a threat in his mind for him to feel easy leaving those weapons in West Germany. Perhaps he is seeking to lower the nuclear threshold.

One of the inevitable results of the iron curtain since it fell across Europe 40 years ago has been to make Europe the most likely battlefield for world war three. Yet it would be a battlefield in which the inhabitants were not really the protagonists. The Warsaw pact without the Soviet Union poses no real threat to the Western European members of NATO, but once the Soviet Union and America are included in the groupings those countries become involved in a different way. While the Soviet Union dominates the Warsaw pact, who can think of any reduction in the American involvement in NATO, except with profound unease?

Perhaps Mr. Gorbachev believes that Europe would be more secure if the face-to-face confrontation of the superpowers was of a different order, or was of a kind which compelled the United States of America to retaliate with long-range missiles at a Soviet Union seeking to create a nuclear shield for itself. That is why I believe the Soviet unwillingness to bring its short-range nuclear missiles more into line with NATO's numbers—we have already heard that the disparity is about 9:1 in the Warsaw pact's advantage — is an acid test of Soviet good faith in negotiating over INF. Otherwise one will be tempted to believe that the INF proposal is an attempt to gain a different nuclear advantage for the Soviets which, taken with their advantage in conventional weapons, could give us all cause for renewed anxiety.

Those are my worries. They must sound like a half-hearted response to the most positive initiative of the superpowers that we have heard for at least a decade. When it comes to making a choice between peace and disarmament, I choose peace. The two are not necessarily synonymous.

The Geneva talks and the visit of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to Moscow at the end of the month are clearly crucial. A satisfactory outcome must be judged not just in terms of advantage to the superpowers but by reference to the peace and security of Europe. That is why I hope that our American allies will fully consult us— and, indeed, all members of NATO in Europe. I hope, too, that any agreement will not put the possibility of a conventional European war back on the agenda. Sometimes in our desire to be rid of nuclear weapons we lose sight of that possibility, but we must remember that the prospect of a winnable conventional war, far from allowing us to sleep more easily in our beds, would give us cause for the greatest concern.

We should be sceptical about all the proposals on the table. We must probe and define and we must be sure that the verification arrangements are such that the treaty, if it is signed, will last.

5.51 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson). Both he and I took part in some of the numerous debates before the arrival of cruise missiles at Greenham common. It is worth noting that, notwithstanding his caution and reticence, even he seems to accept in principle the case for making an agreement a reality in the context of the Gorbachev initiative and the American counter-proposal on long-range intermediate nuclear force missiles in Europe.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who opened the debate for the Opposition, spoke about the changes that are taking place in the Soviet Union. Any objective observer must believe that something potentially important is under way in the Soviet Union. It is too early to say how far that will develop, but an objective analysis of the attitudes of the United States and the Soviet Union over the past few years to the overriding issue of nuclear weapons cannot but lead many people in the West—including myself—to the view that the approach of the Soviet Union has been more positive and responsible than that of the United States.

I hope that we are moving into a phase in which both superpowers will be constructive and will make real progress towards cuts in their nuclear arsenals. I refer in particular to the historic proposals unveiled by Mr. Gorbachev on 15 January 1986. They involved three important stages in the removal of nuclear weapons, and included important concessions by the Soviet Union.

It was in that statement that Mr. Gorbachev first acknowledged that the Soviet Union was prepared to set on one side the existence of the French and British strategic nuclear weapons, provided that they were not expanded and that we did not replace Polaris with Trident. In Reykjavik, the Soviet Union was dropping any link between British and French nuclear weapons and INF. We are now discussing the removal from the Reykjavik package the proposal that involved the Soviet Union being allowed to keep 100 SS20 warheads in Asia and the Americans being allowed to keep 100 long-range INF missiles in the United States.

It is important to recognise that an agreement would not remove the threat of nuclear war overnight. However, it would be an important advance. I approach this subject from a standpoint very different from that of the Secretary of State. I want the removal of all nuclear weapons from Europe. I realise that that may take some time, and that the French nuclear weapons may be the last to go, but I am prepared to live with French weapons in Europe for an interim period. I believe that the world would be a safer place if nuclear weapons were confined to United States territory and Soviet territory—with China presumably keeping its weapons.

It is sad that the Government have not been prepared to take a positive approach in areas where we count and have influence. I refer especially to their failure to make real progress towards a comprehensive test ban treaty. That is a role that a British Government should play. They should remove all nuclear weapons and bases from British territory. They should campaign for the removal of nuclear weapons from Europe. Above all, they should use their influence throughout the world, and in the forums where they are still represented, to achieve real progress towards a comprehensive test ban treaty.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East said, the real danger in coming years is that there will be a nuclear exchange not in central Europe but in, for example, the middle east or in Pakistan, where a key figure has recently openly admitted that nuclear weapons have been developed.

Verification is a most important issue. One of the main arguments that we deployed against cruise missiles was that their numbers were exceedingly difficult to verify under an agreement. It is true that the location of bases in Europe is more or less common knowledge and that, therefore, it should not be too difficult to reassure the Soviet Union on the removal of Pershing II and cruise from Western Europe. Nevertheless, the challenge of verification may be one of great benefit to future agreements. As the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) said, we have to consider the wish of the Soviet Union to verify United States compliance with limitation of the deployment of the weapons on its own soil. I hope that the attitude of the British Government to verification in this area will be more convincing and more genuine than in their attitude to progress towards a comprehensive test ban treaty. Everyone accepts that an agreement on verification would have to include on-site inspection as well as satellite verification. But such an agreement will be important and may be of use in an agreement to cut the United States and USSR strategic arsenals by 50 per cent. I note that Mr. Shultz referred to that over the weekend.

Let us consider the issue of short-range INF weapons. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) said, the Soviet Union's position on that is very clear. It is the desire of Opposition Members that NATO—in this context, that means the United States—will not use that argument to prevent, or indeed sabotage, an agreement on intermediate-range nuclear weapons.

I suspect that the Secretary of State for Defence and the Foreign Secretary adopt a more reasonable, less war-like approach to these matters than the Prime Minister and that they genuinely wish an agreement to be reached. It must be remembered, too, that we are in the run-up to a general election. The chances are that the agreement will not be signed until next year. That seems to be common ground between the two sides, and that view has certainly been expressed by the United States Administration. However, it is to be hoped that talks will be under way and that real progress is made between the United States and the Soviet Union. It is their agreement; they are the parties directly involved. I hope that the Prime Minister—or any other European leader — will not manage to undermine progress, as some people fear. I hope that an important advance will be made, not because the removal of the missiles will suddenly transform Europe into a safer place, but because an agreement would help to build the world's confidence in the superpowers and, more important, confidence between East and West.

There are two ways to correct the conventional imbalance. One is for us to increase conventional forces in Western Europe. The other is to make real progress on mutual and balanced force reduction talks and negotiations on the conventional side. I have not conceded that there is the huge conventional imbalance about which Conservative Members like to speak. No matter how much confidence we have in the developments that may be taking place in the Soviet Union, it is common ground that we have to defend Western Europe. There is no suggestion that we should unilaterally reduce the defence of Western Europe against the Soviet Union. However, I approach these issues from a somewhat different stance. I want to see all nuclear weapons removed from Europe. If we can get an agreement, it will be a real step forward and I hope that the two superpowers will build on it in the future.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I go a long way with what the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said, except that I do not think that a comprehensive test ban treaty is on the cards until we have made significant improvements in verification. When the hon. Gentleman talked about the reduction of weapon systems in Europe, I assumed that he meant those on a multilateral basis, and that he was speaking in his personal capacity and not reflecting the attitude officially taken by his party.

Both the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) raised a point that goes to the root of our problem. We talk about disarmament and arms control, but we all know that it is not just a question of that. We would achieve far more if there were more confidence. I regard these talks not just as a test to see how far we can make progress technologically in reducing weaponry, but as a way to improve the confidence on both sides. That will enable us to take some step, however small, which we hope will lead to bigger steps that will have even greater significance than those that we are contemplating.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth made a speech which will be warmly welcomed not only on both sides of the House but by many outside.

Mr. James Callaghan: Do not make trouble.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I do not want to make trouble. The right hon. Gentleman's speech will be welcomed by many.

There are strong reasons for our adopting a positive approach — political, economic and environmental. In this respect, a positive approach must also be practical, if it is not to run into the sand. I see no distinction between the attitudes of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and of the my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who has rightly emphasised that, although it is important to take a positive approach, we must not delude ourselves into thinking that the going will be easy. On the contrary, we in Western Europe will have to be courageous in telling our electorate about the real choices that have to be made. In doing so, we shall need to be extremely careful not to arouse expectations that are too high.

It needs to be emphasised that the reality is that a non-nuclear world is not feasible, and will not be so for many years to come. The Soviet Union knows that one reason why it is recognised as a world power is its parity with the United States in advanced nuclear missiles. To base nuclear deterrence on aeroplanes and cruise missiles would put it at a distinct disadvantage because it knows that the United States is well ahead in these weapons. There is no sign that Gorbachev would dare risk the Soviet Union taking such a step, at least for some time.

Secondly, there is no reason for us to suppose that it is in our interests to take a leap in the dark without adequate verification procedures. Thirdly, we all know that it would be folly for the United States to renounce nuclear ballistic missiles while China retains hers and there is probably a nuclear capability in Pakistan and Israel. The British and French will be bound to retain their nuclear forces until such time as substantial progress is made in these factors.

We cannot expect the Soviet Union or the United States unilaterally to do without nuclear ballistic missiles as long as other countries do not make progress. Equally, we shall not make progress in the negotiating ring until we have solid substantial proof that the progress made by the two superpowers is genuine, enduring and verifiable. In that respect, I am sure that the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth will recognise that the Prime Minister has made it clear that if sufficient progress is made between the two superpowers, we in Britain will enter the negotiations and put Trident into the melting pot for future discussion.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most substantial points is on-site verification, and that we cannot rely on satellite?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Yes, I agree. In many instances, on-site verification will be the right step to take, but I am also aware that there have been considerable advances in electronic technology which may on some occasions make on-site verification not as necessary as once we thought. At the moment, they have to go together.

Another reason why we should not arouse expectations that are too high is that we all know that one of the side effects of relying less on a nuclear deterrent is that we have to build up conventional forces. I cannot see any electorate in Western Europe agreeing to huge expenditure on conventional forces at a time when disarmament and arms control talks are in the air and budgets are already large. There is a prospect of the United States expecting us to bear a heavier conventional burden in Western Europe, which in itself is bound to put additional financial strains on our budgets. Therefore, in terms both of cost and political timing, it would be unrealistic to suppose that we can, overnight, make up for the conventional imbalance between us and the Warsaw pact.

I am not talking about the central region, where there is more of a balance than one had hitherto recognised because of the improvements that we have made. Looking at the West's response to the Soviets, should there be a conventional attack, it is not the central region that we would have to consider. We would have to consider the northern flank as well as the Mediterranean. The danger is in thinking that somehow peace will break out and that we shall get defence on the cheap if we do without nuclear deterrents. These and other dangers were rightly emphasised by General Rogers in the aftermath of Reykjavik. Misgivings on military grounds were voiced when the zero option was first proposed in 1981. Those misgivings by military leaders were overcome by the political argument, which only goes to show how foolish it can be to subordinate defence imperatives to political theory.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth and other Members have told us why the zero option was put forward. We knew that it would not be accepted by the Soviet Union, but we still hoped for better deployment of cruise missiles, while it would help European electors to accept the presence of cruise missiles on their soil.

Six years have gone by and the mistake at Reykjavik to commit the West to appear to accept a zero option with so few and ineffective conditions had to be addressed. That is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was right. She spoke for all the European allies when at Camp David she insisted that a zero option on long-range INF must take into account constraints of short-range nuclear systems. I am not suggesting that it is a tidy, logical matter. It would be foolish to expect this or any other European

Government to go into such talks, or to persuade the Americans that it would be in our interest to surrender any of its INF and to expect us to defend ourselves. That would put us in the position of relying almost exclusively on theatre nuclear weapons systems, and conventional weapons, with the back-up of the strategic defence and nuclear defence forces of France. That is the wrong attitude, but it is one that many of the leaders have accepted, including the supreme allied commander.

Nevertheless, there are good reasons for seeking a way forward. A reduction or the elimination of a whole segment of nuclear missiles can enhance stability, provided that it is guided on the whole by the principle of parity.

I do not think that there is, yet, enough trust or confidence for either side to give away too much. The Russians suffer more than we do from mistrust and lack of confidence. They have had that lack of confidence since Tsarist days; it is one of their problems; it is why they have an iron curtain, and why they are so beastly to some of their people and have only recently begun to let a few more out.

We all want peace in the West and, increasingly, those in the Soviet Union who know the high cost of peace want peace and security at less cost. It must not be less security at less cost, because that is not the way to preserve peace but the way to encourage aggression. Many of us in this Chamber appreciate that because we belong to that generation but, increasingly, especially when it comes to the election, we shall be addressing a new generation—the post Vietnam generation, who do not remember that the second world war came about because we were so badly prepared. We gave the impression to totalitarian countries that we were not willing to stand up, not just for preserving the peace, but for the values that we held dear.

In the course of the coming election that will make the argument interesting and stimulating. That is why we have, yet again, to fight this intellectual battle for the retention of strong defence forces which are credible to preserve peace.

Many of us would like to see a shift from nuclear to conventional arms. That must take place under carefully controlled conditions. To suggest otherwise is not just to delude ourselves but to take us on the way to Armageddon.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) on his excellent speech. I wish to second many of the points that he made. This has been an interesting debate and I thought that the speech of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) was outstanding.

It is interesting that the alliance should have chosen this subject for debate. It certainly leads with its chin. In reality, the SDP would agree with the Conservative party and the Liberals would agree with the Labour party over this issue.

I attended the debate in the House on 24 January 1980 on nuclear weapons. On that occasion the Liberal party defence spokesman, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), said:

> In my party, as well as in the Labour party . . . there is a substantial body of opinion that is totally opposed to the staging of cruise missiles in the United Kingdom. I must put that on record tonight." — [Official Report, 24 January 1980; Vol. 977, c. 756.]

I took the trouble of looking at the vote after the debate. I do not think that my hon. Friend's will be surprised by the result. Some Liberal Members were in one Lobby, some were in another and the majority abstained.

When I was still a schoolboy the House of Commons staged another major debate on nuclear weapons. On that occasion, the Prime Minister, Sir Winston Churchill, opened the debate with a phrase that has remained with me. He said:

> "What ought we to do? Which way shall we turn to save our lives and the future of the world? It does not matter so much to old people; they are going soon anyway, but I find it poignant to look at youth in all its activity and ardour and, most of all, to watch little children playing their merry games, and wonder what would lie before them if God wearied of mankind." — [Official Report, 1 March 1955; Vol. 537, c. 1895.]

All of us who took an interest in defence realised the immense threat that was posed to this country by the build-up of the SS20s in Eastern Europe. They were a way of getting round the arms control talks which were under way at that time. We were concerned by the challenge that they presented to our democracy and the democracies of the Atlantic Alliance. Could politicians make unpopular decisions to protect the long-term interests of that Alliance? Britain and NATO came out of that crisis extremely well. It is ghastly for a Secretary of State to have to decide which region should have cruise missiles; which hon. Member should have these obliterating weapons of the nuclear age in his constituency. Full marks should go to the people of Newbury, who have been so robust and sensible in the way that they took on board that particular horror.

While that was occurring, the Opposition were spurning decisions that they had taken in government and spurning the approach that the Labour party had adopted to nuclear weapons since 1945. At the same time, a wave of Soviet propaganda was washing over these shores. Some succumbed as soon as they got their feet wet. Others —I include the Liberal party—rushed down the beach and dived into the waves.

We are faced with a surprising decision by Mr. Gorbachev—a U-turn. But perhaps it is not hard to see now why he made that U-turn. It is too early to say whether the changes inside the Soviet Union are changes of substance or style but, as in the United States, Mr. Gorbachev has his military industrial complex to think about and is in need of a diplomatic success. He has to show his countrymen that his change of style can bring home some bacon for the Soviet Union. Above all, he has to cut back on the cost of his military defence so that he has more money available for consumer affairs inside the Soviet Union.

Mr. Beith: Does the hon. Gentleman think that it is in the West's interests that Mr. Gorbachev should win that argument internally or lose it?

Mr. Townsend: Obviously it is in the interests of Mr. Gorbachev and of the West that progress should be made, and this is the subject to which I wish to turn.

The House will look foolish if it starts putting forward detailed negotiating positions. There are two major obstacles, which have been well covered today — the problems of short-range missiles and of verification. How does one tackle the verification problem? Are satellites sufficient? Should there be on-site inspections? Do we have to go into factories as well as aircraft hangars? This is not the occasion to go into all that. The Government are right to put forward a tough negotiating stance at this stage; it is in Britain's interests that they should. I detect no difference between the Foreign Office, the Ministry of Defence and No. 10 on this issue. As in the United States, there seems to be a broad measure of agreement as to how to proceed. In Europe, individual politicians will state their different positions. I detect, in general across the Western world, the feeling that something has changed; a new moment has arrived. The tide has come and we must take that tide. Hon. Members may say in a few weeks that I was being vastly over-optimistic and foolish, but this is the moment to look above the molehills, to look to the high ground and see if we can make the breakthrough that our constituents and the people in these islands so desperately want.

I end with a quote that is frequently wrenched from its moorings. It comes from a speech which was made by Lord Mountbatten in Strasbourg in May 1979. He said:

"To begin with we are most likely to preserve the peace if there is a military balance of strength between East and West. The real need is for both sides to replace the attempts to maintain a balance through ever-increasing and even more costly nuclear armaments by a balance based on mutual restraint. Better still, by reduction of nuclear armaments I believe it should be possible to achieve greater security at a lower level of military confrontation."

Since the debate in which Sir Winston Churchill took part, there has been a gradual escalation of the arms race. Perhaps we now have a chance to reduce some of the nuclear weapons on both sides.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): Like many of my hon. Friends, I am puzzled that the SDP should have chosen this subject to debate, particularly as for most of the afternoon the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) has been the only Member on the SDP Bench in support of her party's policy. I hope that she has listened attentively and learnt a lot, particularly from the speech of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan).

The Gorbachev proposals may have been seen as a heaven-sent gift to the Labour and Liberal parties in their headlong pursuit of votes, but I submit that it would be a sad misunderstanding of the situation if we moved too far too fast.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) seemed to be "praying in aid" a complete change of heart in the Soviet Union, of which country we are even hearing the words "emerging democracy", but I have no doubt that we must await implementation of the Helsinki final act before we can believe that there is a major change in the Soviet Union. We are a long way from that.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth that if we have achieved this beginning, it is only because of the unity of the West and our determination to stand firm when it was necessary to do so. His Administration took the first decision that, in the face of the threat from the Soviet Union, we should respond by stationing cruise missiles in this country. The Soviet Union did not believe that we would respond, but we did, and we have now reached a beginning in genuine disarmament.

However, it is no good arriving at a starting point unless we can be sure that the West will be united when it goes into negotiations. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) voiced the fear that the United States might be tempted to go for quick electoral gain, rushing into an agreement in the hope that the Goverment could regain some of the popularity that they have obviously lost. I do not believe that that will happen. On Friday and Saturday of last week I attended a meeting of the International Democratic Union in Munich, and the chairman of the United States Republican party made it clear that we would and should go forward in unity and that there would be full consultation all the way.

The Soviet Union clearly hopes to exploit divisions in the West, particularly in the United Kingdom. We do not need to waste time on the craven role in defence matters that has been chosen by so many people in the Labour party, but we need a clear and definitive statement on where the SDP and the Liberals stand on nuclear defence. The Liberal party conference went unilateralist last year, while the SDP supported a nuclear deterrent, provided that it did not involve the upgrading of Polaris to Trident. On television last week the leader of the SDP said that such an upgrading would represent a massive enhancement of our nuclear capacity, which he could not accept.

I was puzzled by that statement, because in the same interview the leader of the SDP said that he believed that there was a positive way forward in co-operation with the French. We all know that the French are upgrading their independent nuclear deterrent to achieve exactly what we shall achieve from Polaris and Trident. The French expect to complete their upgrading by 1990. It is an expensive operation and they would welcome support. There is, however, no question of the French giving up their nuclear deterrent. They will be the last ones to move. Does the leader of the SDP have the full-hearted support of the Liberal party and, in particular, the leader of that party for his French policy?

Where and when did detailed discussions about the joint venture take place? We know that there was a lunch and a dinner in Paris, but what further consultations have taken place? Has the cost been examined? I believe that it is a bogus cover-up by the Liberals in an attempt to paper over cracks to regain lost confidence and votes.

There is little division between the SDP and the Conservative party in defence matters, but none of us knows where the Liberals really stand. They were unilateralists in 1984, multilateralists in 1985 and unilateralists again in 1986.

Mr. Beith rose——

Mr. Spicer: I am not giving way, because of the shortage of time.

We are making just a beginning. The meeting of the International-Democratic Union in Munich last week was attended by Danes, Finns, Norwegians, Austrians, Americans, Japanese and others. They all agreed to send a letter of support to our Prime Minister, who is going to Moscow at the end of this month, not only with our best wishes, but with the best wishes of all those who truly hope for a just peace in the world. I delivered that letter, on their behalf, to No. 10 today.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The subject for the debate is all things to all men, in the typical alliance tradition. We, however, must ask ourselves whether removal of long-range intermediate nuclear forces from both sides of the iron curtain under the zero-zero option would enhance our security. It surprises me that so few people have addressed themselves to this fundamental issue.

In General Secretary Gorbachev, the West is confronted by a leader who is far more formidable and infinitely more dangerous than Mr. Chernenko and Mr. Brezhnev were. He has great propaganda skills, intense determination and great orthodoxy in his personal commitment and loyalty to Communist ideology. Furthermore, he knows how to play on Western public opinion, how to exploit divisions within NATO and how to play on wishful thinking in the West.

The initial dual track decision in 1979 was taken two years after SS20s were first deployed in the western military districts of the Soviet Union. We hoped that our decision would induce the Soviets to dismantle their systems, so that we would not have to modernise our intermediate-range nuclear forces. Of course, that did not happen and the Soviets' SS20 build-up continued inexorably.

In 1981, we persisted with the zero-zero option and suggested again that if the Soviets dismantled their SS20s we would not modernise our INF by the deployment of cruise and Pershing II missiles. Once again, the SS20 build-up continued.

From December 1983 we had to put in place our own modernised systems of ground-launched cruise missiles and Pershing II missiles. This was achieved only with very great political difficulty. There were mass demonstrations and critical votes in national Parliaments. We are proud of the decision taken by this House. We and the Federal Republic of Germany, two key countries in the Alliance, were the first to deploy the systems. Since then NATO has begun to deploy them in Italy and Belgium, and ultimately it is hoped that they will be deployed in the Netherlands.

What has transpired since that deployment? The answer is that the Soviets have undertaken another inexorable build-up of short-range systems — SS12s, SS22s and SS23s. They are ballistic missile systems with short flight times and, in common with the SS20s, but perhaps more so, they are a direct threat to Western Europe. They represent a counter-force capability that could knock out our air bases and destroy NATO's command and control facilities. Since the Soviets have a preponderance of short-range systems — 9:1 in their favour — the position vis-a-vis intermediate nuclear systems does not matter so much to them. The Soviets are aware that their short-range systems ensure that they have a capability of launching a pre-emptive strike to knock us out on the ground. Of course, in the process there is the risk that there would be a strategic nuclear response. However, a strategic nuclear response launched by the United States on our behalf is more likely to occur if intermediate-range systems are located on the soil of Western Europe. That crucial linkage was the raison d'etre of our INF modernisation in the first place. Chancellor Schimdt, in his lecture to the International Institute for Strategic Studies, emphasised the point.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and others have said that we have other options. We have dual-capable systems, such as the F111s. However, air-launched systems are vulnerable because their response time is slow. We also have quasi-strategic systems, such as the Poseidon boats. However, with regard to a submarine-launched strategic ballistic missile, one's adversary is not sure whether he is receiving a strategic response.

I believe that we should proceed with the negotiations, but we should seek a definite quid pro quo. It is crucial to emphasise to our American friends—as has been said by Mr. Giraud, the French Defence Minister and also by Mr. Wörner the German Defence Minister — that Western Europe should address the problem in its totality. That is, we must address it with regard to the conventional balance, the chemical balance and the imbalance with regard to short-range systems. If we are deliberately to pursue a policy that renders us vulnerable—by denying ourselves intermediate-range systems stationed on the soil of Western Europe — we must have a capability to defend Western Europe's retaliatory forces securely.

I have always argued that there is a need for strategic defence against short-range systems. The technology of strategic defence is more important than ever before. It is important for point defence—the protection of air bases and command and control centres. New technologies are emerging for this purpose. Furthermore, space-based systems are important because they would be able to intercept ballistic missiles even of a short-range nature, such as the SS22s and the SS23s, in the launch phase.

I am pleased that General Secretary Gorbachev has removed the linkage, imposed at Reykjavik, between the American development of SDI and INF arms control. Unless the West takes countervailing measures, it may be making itself more vulnerable militarily by pursuing the zero-zero option. However, I recognise the political benefits that may arise from such an agreement.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): I do not share the pride of the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood, (Mr. Wilkinson) at having cruise stationed in Europe. I do not share his hope that those countries that have not completed the stationing of such weapons will do so. There is neither reason for pride nor hope in such an argument, despite the fact that some may argue that there is necessity.

I wish to make some general comments as I do not normally participate in debates in the Chamber——

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): Oh!

Mr. Freeson: I do not believe that my observation was humorous. I do not normally join in the debates in the Chamber because I find most of them are devoted to the detailed minutiae that overlook some of the central issues that have faced Britain and people on both sides of the iron curtain for far too long. Indeed, they have been left untackled for too long. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway), who sniggered, may not be aware, unlike his hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood, that I am an active parliamentarian in the Western European Union parliamentary assembly. I have participated in its debates — agreeably or disagreeably, according to one's point of view.

It is conventional wisdom to point out that nuclear weapons have existed for 40 years during which time there has been no war in Europe—post hoc ergo propter hoc, this is taken as cause and effect. Thus both East and West justify their relentless stockpiling of nuclear weapons. The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood illustrated that in his speech. The Russians start storing certain types of equipment in Eastern Europe and so we start to stockpile other types of equipment. The Russians therefore start stockpiling further forms of equipment and we respond. This stupid, dangerous madness continues.

We are spending about $9·5 billion between the lot of us on building up all forms of offensive defence. We should start considering—that process can begin in the House — developing a non-offensive defence policy. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] It is possible to have a non-offensive defensive policy. It is long overdue. It would require a fundamental reshaping of our attitude towards so-called nuclear defence.

Wars have continued despite the so-called deterrent. They have continued on a massive scale throughout the world, beyond Europe. Some tens of millions of people have been killed or wounded. In many cases wars have been waged in the Third world by the superpowers—by proxy. Far too often this country — under whatever Government — has given support to one side in such proxy wars. Millions of people have suffered at the hands of offensive high technology. We have often sold such technology to other countries.

Today there are an estimated 50,000 nuclear weapons, with an explosive power equal to 1 billion Hiroshimas. I often wonder, having listened to some of the speeches this evening, if people have thought of the implications of providing so-called defence by overkill — if I may use that hackneyed word.

Apart from nuclear weapons, the arms race in conventional weapons, far from stabilising or reducing, has accelerated apace. Far from preventing potential wars this arms race has induced wars in many parts of the world. Directly, if not indirectly, either politically or through our massive arms trade, we are contributing to the death of thousands of people in other parts of the world by the sale of British offensive equipment. Whatever we think of past cause and effect, to behave as we have for the past 40 years will not guarantee peace or provide security in future. We must move from a position of threatened mutual suicide to one of common security. There is no route to world security other than by the progressive reduction and eventual abolition of all offensive weaponry and the introduction of replacement defensive weaponry.

The fundamental duty of politicians is to build the stepping stones, military and political, to that end. Both NATO and the Warsaw pact have missiles in position with flight times of six minutes to centres of command and government. As a result, both sides are moving towards the establishment of fire-on-warning systems that would respond automatically to any assumed missile attack. The dangers of war by accident, including computer error, are thus greatly increased. We need a system of defensive deterrence that is not provocative to others. Such a system should provide an effective and militarily credible defence. It should also reduce the risk in a crisis of pre-emptive attack or war by miscalculation. Those who talk about SDI as such a system are overlooking all the potential for war in space going well beyond the systems that are now proposed for research.

Defence positions should reduce pressure on the East-West arms race by, for example, removing the present possibility of one side reacting to the other side's deployment of new or additional weapons by deploying more of its own. Our defence policy should improve the atmosphere for detente instead of generating distrust. It should be affordable and acceptable to the public at large.

It is often argued that a defence-only policy would be ineffective and could not win—whatever that may mean in the nuclear age. It is generally agreed, however, that defence is stronger than attack. With the coming of modern technology, it is estimated that an attacker needs to have a superiority over the forces available to the defender of four or five to one. The superior strength of defensive tactics and forces that has been evident throughout the history of warfare is now being strengthened by modern technology. The tank and the capital naval ship may become technically obsolete in modern war with the advent of accurate homing missiles. If the Exocets fired by Argentina had had better fuses, the history of the Falklands war might well have been different. It is difficult to imagine a successful invasion by sea with the intelligent use of homing missiles aimed at the attackers.

It is possible to order military forces so that they can be seen to be entirely defensive and non-provacative, even though each weapon could be used offensively. A country's entire defence posture — its weapons, the training of its forces, its doctrine and its operational manuals — can show clearly whether its forces are for defence only. No one considering the defence forces of Sweden, Austria and Yugoslavia, for example, could assume that they were for any purpose other than defence. These countries do not heighten international tension by provoking anxiety among their neighbours.

Effective defence need not overburden an economy. It is necessary only to consider the relative costs of defence and offensive weapons. A modern battlefield tank costs $3 million while an anti-tank guided missile costs $30,000. A combat aircraft such as the Tornado costs $30 million and a sophisticated missile capable of destroying it, such as the Patriot, costs $1 million, or just over 3 per cent. of the cost of a Tornado.

Along with military steps towards non-aggressive defence policies we need also to work politically towards constructive and peaceful co-existence. We must move away from confrontation politics. The relaxation of tension that would accompany a non-provocative defence position would allow discussions on detente to take place in a much easier atmosphere, and this is not the concern of the superpowers alone. There are forums at which many countries can participate in discussions, as we do in Britain and at international assemblies. It makes the greatest sense to identify politically the issues in which both sides have a common interest. These include a common test ban agreement and moves towards a reduction in nuclear defence weaponry that we have been discussing this evening. There are many other initiatives along those lines.

I find it extremely disturbing that, after several years of paying lip service to the zero option, many parts of Western Europe, including Britain, should start running scared at the first sign of serious negotiations in that direction, and should start erecting all sorts of obstacles to such a move. If we were sincere in what we have been advocating, or claiming to advocate, since the early 1980s, we would put our actions and words where our statements have been in the past. That includes making more progress towards the removal of as many nuclear weapons in Europe as we can, and as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): The right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) has called for a non-offensive defence policy. He said that we must move from a position of threatened mutual suicide. I think that we would all agree with that. We would all read that as a good explanation of the need for a strategic defence initiative. As for the rest of his remarks, I refer him—I do not believe that he was in the Chamber at the time—to the important remarks of his colleague, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), on the history of the past 40 years, which the right hon. Member for Brent, East seeks to write down as a great aberration. However, peace has been preserved for the past 40 years. I recommend the right hon. Gentleman to consider what the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth, a former Prime Minister, had to say about Western determination having brought the Soviet Union back to the negotiating table. The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth speaks with important and significant experience on that issue.

We are debating a subject that is too important for the making of easy party political points. However, the difference between the parties on the Opposition Benches must be stressed. These are differences that the British public must understand when the forthcoming general election takes place. Nothing could have demonstrated more clearly the position of the Labour party than the contrast between the speeches of the right hon. Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth and for Brent, East.

We all become used to the performances of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), and I use "performances" advisedly. He is the living embodiment of that famous old cliché that if one is on a weak wicket, the best thing is to shout. In other words, the best form of defence is attack. According to the right hon. Gentleman, the leaders of the Western nations—I hope that I am not doing him an injustice by misquoting him — are running around like chickens with their heads chopped off. Anyone more like a headless chicken than the right hon. Gentleman, bearing in mind his principles and the things in which he has believed over decades, is hard to imagine. It would appear that his head has been chopped off and thrown into the wastepaper basket. That must be the position when he chooses to defend a policy that he knows is arrant nonsense. He made a ludicrous comparison. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East—I am sorry that he is not in his place now—knows that to be a fact.

We must consider the unfortunate position of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright).

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will think again about the way in which he attacked my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). It was unworthy of him. I hope that he will also note that, although my right hon. Friend is not present, neither is the Secretary of State for Defence. That is understandable because they both have other engagements. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will stop continuing to be a former diplomat and apologist for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Mr. Whitney: I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who was not here when his right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East spoke, has the courtesy to read what his right hon. Friend said. He will then understand the point about the headless chicken, which was the right hon. Gentleman's term for the leaders of western European nations.

Mr. Foulkes: I have heard what my right hon. Friend has said on previous occasions on this matter. I know exactly what he said—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman), screaming harridan that she is, will wait, I shall explain that I was not here precisely because I was representing my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East and the Leader of the Opposition at the Commonwealth day service in Westminster Abbey.

Mr. Whitney: I am delighted to have an explanation, which I was not seeking, for the absence of the hon. Gentleman. However, I repeat that if he is making assertions about his right hon. Friend's statement, he had better read it first and then he will learn a little.

Before I deal with SDI, an introduction to which was happily given me by the right hon. Member for Brent, East, I should like to mention the opening bat of the hon. Member for Woolwich on what was for him an extremely sticky wicket, to continue the metaphor. It seemed unkind to give him such a task. He who knows such a lot about NATO defence and understands and is a loyal supporter of NATO was driven into the position, when he was seeking to explain the extraordinary riding of two horses going in widely diverging directions, which is now his unhappy lot of having to say, "I am fortunately not responsible for the Liberals." I share his views on that but I hope that the electors of Truro note that too.

Everyone who has spoken, from both sides of the House, welcomes Mr. Gorbachev's initiative. It is significant that the words of praise for Mr. Gorbachev's initiative, which was described as an act of statesmanship, were not used when President Reagan made precisely the same proposal in 1981. It was then condemned by Opposition Members as a public relations exercise. Now that it comes from Mr. Gorbachev it is a marvellous new initiative. However, I shall cavil not at that.

As my right hon. and hon. Friends have explained, we need to be extremely careful about the problems of verification. We have to take extreme care on the problems of the shorter-range and aircraft missile systems. We have to take account of the imbalance in conventional forces, whatever the arithmetical arguments of those differences are, and we have to take account of the differences in chemical weapons. I have to say to the hon. Member for Woolwich—I am glad that he has now rejoined the debate—that to say that there has been no significant change in the position on chemical weapons since 1979 is to show a serious misunderstanding of the massive development in capability that the Soviet Union has manifested in the past seven or eight years. Nevertheless, the welcome is there and, subject to all those caveats, which any responsible leader of any Western Government must take into account—certainly my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will take them into account and I am confident that the American Government will take them into account—we must welcome the initiative and go forward.

The significant development is that the Gorbachev offer is no longer subject to the caveat about SDI. It was particularly significant that the offer came when it did. I shall quote The Sunday Times, not in terms of a particular attack on the newspaper, but because I take The Sunday Times editorial of 1 March as a typical example of a standard conventional view of the international negotiating relationship on nuclear weapons as it then obtained. It was unfortunate for the leader writer of The Sunday Times that the Gorbachev offer came just a few hours before his editorial was printed. Speaking of the Prime Minister's forthcoming visit to Moscow, he offered the view that

"she may be the one person who can persuade President Reagan to make the necessary compromise on star war testing, which is the one issue that stands in the way of the first-ever missile-cutting deal between the superpowers."

Clearly, The Sunday Times was wrong. The conventional views of what I would call the arms control establishment in London were wrong. That is not an objective and, therefore, we need to look again carefully at the relationship in terms of future arms control negotiations and the strategic defence initiative. I believe that the nation, the House and, indeed, my party too should step back and look again carefully.

The strategic defence initiative has been subjected to a linguistic propaganda war which is akin to what was suffered by the term "cold war" over a generation. The term "cold war" was picked up by the international Left so that anyone who pointed out any dangers or threats that came from the Soviet Union or Soviet policy was condemned as a cold war warrior. There is an unhappy correlation now between the glib phrase "star wars" and the strategic defence initiative. Of course, it is a defence initiative. It may or may not work but it is, to use the words of the right hon. Member for Brent, East, a non-offensive defence policy. It is a step back from what he described as a position of threatened mutual suicide.

One of the reasons why it became such an object of controversy was that it upset the Western arms control establishment. I speak as someone who was a co-founder of the Council for Arms Control and I am totally dedicated to arms control. However, I know also that there are people who have made a profession out of arms control—I make no complaint about that—but they are flat earthers. They are deeply unhappy about the concept that there is any possible alternative to what the right hon. Member for Brent, East suggested, mutually assured destruction, the all too sadly apposite acronym, MAD. MAD is precisely what President Reagan is seeking to get away from.

Another reason why SDI was such a fiercely attacked target was that it was linked with the general animosity which has been built up in so many quarters in the West against President Reagan. Of course, the concepts involved in SDI are 20 years and more old. For 20 years in the East and West there has been research and work on anti-satellite systems. The fact that in March 1983 it was gathered together by President Reagan and relaunched under the new umbrella of the strategic defence initiative was practically irrelevant. It was given a new thrust, but it was not anything new. It is research that the East and West have been in engaged in for two decades, in my view, quite rightly, too.

If there is a sensible and valid alternative to MAD, surely it must be right at least to explore the possibility. The arms control establishment, being, as I have said, inclined to flat earthism and conservatism, with an extremely small "c" said "No. This is destabilising. They will never do it. It will take too much money and it is technically impossible." I remind the House that just a few months before the atom bomb was dropped, well-known experts on the subject said that no atom bomb would ever be dropped, and a few months before a landing was made on the moon, well-known experts on the subject said that no landing would ever be made on the moon.

I do not know whether SDI will succeed. However, the arms control circles, which have strong influences on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence, have now been surprised by the technical progress that has been made. I do not believe that the Soviet Union has been surprised because it is engaged in the technology. The Soviets know the American capability and they believe that something can be achieved. That is the reason why they are so sensitive about it. But the next defence of the arms control establishment is that that cannot be an all-embracing, 100 per cent. technology. In fact, sadly, in March 1985 my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs was moved to compare it to a Maginot line mentality. It would be dangerous if that were the concept, but it is not. Among serious strategic thinkers in the United States the concept is developing of a combined defence of defence on the one hand and offence on the other. The technical possibilities are opening up.

Therefore, I urge my right hon. Friends in the Government to ensure that they take an extremely open-minded, not to say positive, view of the possibilities that SDI may offer—not just for the West, but for the Soviet Union. That must be regarded as a serious possibility.

In line with that, I urge my right hon. Friends to take a careful look at their attitudes on the anti-ballistic missile treaty. I have been disturbed by some of the nervousness that they have displayed about the reading of that treaty. The treaty is the jewel in the crown of the arms control process. My right hon. Friends must understand that when they receive submissions from their Departments—from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence — they are talking about the Holy Grail, about the only coconut that has dropped off the tree so far——

Mr. Foulkes: Stop mixing your metaphors. Get on with it.

Mr. Whitney: I will mix my metaphors. If the hon. Gentleman will listen, he will learn something.

The ABM treaty was signed by the Soviet Union only when it was clear that, were it not signed, President Nixon was ready to deploy anti-ballistic missiles himself. That is what brought the Soviet Union to sign that treaty in 1972.

On the interpretation of the treaty, there is now a great debate on whether there should be a narrow or broad definition. As we are not signatories of the treaty, we do not have a locus to take a definitive view. However, I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to look at article 13 of that treaty, which establishes a consultative committee between the contracting parties and which meets twice a year. As I understand it, there has never been a single report of a Soviet complaint about the American interpretation of the treaty.

Therefore, the interpretation of the ABM treaty is linked to the attitude on SDI. With the Gorbachev initiative of a week last Saturday, those two areas give a new impetus, and we must look to that in a positive spirit.

I remind the House that the approach that we seek is not, in its own right, to sign a treaty for arms control. That is a laudable objective. What we really seek are sensible and sound relations between East and West. That must be the final objective, and that is where we start. Therefore, in any rush or enthusiasm, which is understandable, to sign a piece of paper that is labelled "arms control", let us not lose sight of that final objective. As Moscow knows well, the desire for peace in Britain and in the West as a whole is absolute. It has only to respond and then we can make progress.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for interrupting the debate, which is already running late. The House is well accustomed to the intemperance with which it is often addressed by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), but even by his own standards and lack of control over his tongue, is it parliamentary that he should refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman)——

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Do not repeat it.

Viscount Cranborne: —in the way that he did while intervening in the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I am not sure that I heard the remark to which the hon. Gentleman refers. The hon. Lady is not complaining.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I am not complaining because I do not regard the hon. Member as a gentleman.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If something discourteous was said, the Chair did not hear it.

7.5 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I hope that I shall be forgiven for intruding on those private exchanges.

The hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), whose sitting down has been greeted with some enthusiasm in some quarters, took us away from the main subject of the debate into the issue of the strategic defence initiative. Of course, the debate is not about SDI, because Mr. Gorbachev has accepted at last that he will not link intermediate nuclear forces with SDI. That is the opportunity that has arisen and it is the basis for the debate. As the hon. Gentleman referred to that matter, let me say that I do not share his view. He said that it may or may not work. If it does not work, far from being a defensive, non-provocative nuclear system, it is in fact one of the most offensive systems that could be created. If it could work on the basis of President Reagan's initial dream, as the total defence, the impenetrable shield, it would be non-provocative defence, but I have yet to find anybody in the United States who any longer believes that that is within the capacity of the technology——

Mr. Whitney: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: No. The hon. Gentleman has just spoken.

I am sure that the Foreign Secretary does not share the hon. Gentleman's belief, because the most thorough analysis that I have seen of the SDI concept to which, to be fair, the hon. Gentleman referred is that made by the Foreign Secretary some time ago, which has 18 points of specific criticism of the SDI concept. I wish that the Government would refer to it more often.

My hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) made it clear that, whatever changes have taken place in the arms control scene since 1979, none has invalidated the case for acceptance of the zero-zero deal which we sought then. By "we", I mean hon. Members in all parts of the House. Not many have questioned that during this extremely valuable debate. The general tenor of the debate has been strongly to encourage the Government to go ahead and seek a deal now that the obstacle of linkage with the SDI programme has been removed.

We heard several helpful speeches during the debate. The hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) made a sensible speech. Comment has been made on both sides of the House about the speech by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), who would not want to give up NATO weapons without obtaining greater security for Europe in the process by getting something in exchange. He made that clear in a speech that found acceptance in many quarters, if not entirely on his own Benches.

I appreciate the speech by the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), who lives and works so close to the problems presented by cruise deployment and whose constituents have had to put up not just with cruise deployment but with some of its domestic consequences. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) spoke from a committed unilateralist position, which I do not share, but he entered into the spirit of the debate, which was to encourage the Government to move forward.

The hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) came closest in the debate to pouring cold water on the prospects for the INF discussions, but even he agreed, for example, that a stage had come when not only would the INF negotiations proceed but when we would put Trident into international arms negotiations. He finds himself in a similar position to that adopted by the alliance in being prepared to maintain a British nuclear capacity at its present level but with the intention of negotiating it away. There was an unhappy reference in the hon. Member for Wealden's phraseology to the "mistake" of Reykjavik, by which he was referring in particular to the zero option.

The hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend), who represents that part of Bexley that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) does not represent, spoke about attaining the high ground. That note must enter the discussions. The hon. Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) preferred to attack my right hon. and hon. Friends as out-and-out unilateralists. He has clearly not made the kind of detailed study of Liberal party conference resolutions which forms the unhappy lot of anyone who is the chairman of the policy committee in any political party. If he looks a little more closely, he will find amongst our recent conference resolutions that there are resolutions which freeze our existing cruise deployment, and resolutions which fully underscore our longstanding and unshaken commitment to maintain American nuclear bases on British soil as part of our commitment to the NATO deterrent. If the hon. Gentleman finds these things fascinating, he should devote more time to their study.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) rather worried me. He still wants cruise deployment in the Netherlands when we are open to the prospect of removing those weapons entirely from Europe. He is Ruislip's answer to Richard Perle, yet even Richard Perle is ready to seek a move forward on INF negotiations.

Mr. Wilkinson: If we gratuitously forgo deployment in the Netherlands, as many in the peace movement would wish in that country, it may subsequently prove a precedent which will be difficult for NATO if NATO at a later date seeks to enhance its short-range capability. That was the implication of my point, and that is a serious matter.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman has refined his point. It is not for us to decide whether the Dutch Government can or will accept deployment within the Netherlands. However, it can now be rendered unnecessary by success in the negotiations.

The discussions at Reykjavik caught the public imagination in the East and the West, and notably in the West where there is so much more opportunity for public feeling to be assessed and estimated. There is no doubt at all that that process caught the public imagination and that there was a great deal of public disappointment that the process seemed to come to a sudden end. Getting the Reykjavik process moving again, in the form of Mr. Gorbachev's new willingness to unlink the INF discussions, will again capture the imagination of the Western public and create expectations that the Government must make a major effort to satisfy.

Therefore, in the early stages of the debate we looked for some sign of where the British Government stand. The Secretary of State for Defence has apologised to me for having to return to his discussions in France. Perhaps he is trying to get the French out of their Maginot line complex.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: I intend to develop my argument. I gave way a moment ago; I will not give way now.

I hope that the Secretary of State will continue the process in which my hon. Friends and I engaged in trying to discuss with France the way in which their military capacity can be seen as part of a European defence and not as a solely French operation conceived on such narrow principles that it cannot provide a genuine defence for France——

Mr. Jim Spicer: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman because he flatly refused to give way to me.

In his opening remarks, the Secretary of State expressed surprise that there was no motion upon which the House could vote. He would not have been here for the vote in any case. However, the Order Papers are littered with motions that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I have tabled about the details of these matters. Is anyone seriously suggesting that we need a vote tonight so that some right hon. and hon. Members can go through the Division Lobby to oppose a deal on intermediate nuclear forces? This is one of the occasions when the House can surely express by common consent the need to see progress in this area.

The Secretary of State did not clarify whether there was a link in the Government's mind between intermediate and short-range nuclear forces. Instead, he devoted quite a lot of time to a partisan chronicling of events of the past few years. He tended to ignore those factors that led my right hon. and hon. Friends and I to criticise the absence of the dual key in cruise deployment and the fact that deployment took place while discussions in Geneva were still taking place. That was a matter of wide public concern at the time. Such feelings were strengthened by widespread British feelings that cruise was not sufficiently or at all under British control.

We wanted some sign from the Secretary of State during today's debate that there was no formal linkage between his legitimate concerns about short-range nuclear weapons and the prospects of an INF deal. Some of the phrases that the right hon. Gentleman used such as, "This is an essential condition of an INF agreement"—when talking about short-range nuclear forces — did not remove the doubt that the Government are trying to impose a linkage where neither the Americans nor the Soviet Union wish to impose any linkage at all upon these discussions.

The Secretary of State prayed in aid the draft treaty tabled by the United States at Geneva. However, the effect of the treaty is to freeze existing Soviet superiority in short-range nuclear forces. That is clearly an attempt to table and recognise the relevance of short-range nuclear forces for further progress and to the spirit in which an INF deal is struck. However, the treaty tabled by the United States does not remove that superiority. That is clearly a matter that we must consider after concluding an INF deal.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), in a characteristically entertaining and interesting speech, raised the important question of what is happening now in the Soviet Union. That is part of the background to these discussions. What is happening there and how should we respond to it?

Clearly fundamental changes are taking place in the Soviet Union giving rise to major pressures. We are in no position to rest at this moment on a judgment that the changes will continue in their present direction. That can only be a hope. Of course, the experience in China is a demonstration of how these things can go wrong and how there there can be major reversals. However, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, the Lord President of the Council, myself and others visited Moscow last summer, observed the beginnings of some of these changes and pressed on issues such as human rights for different attitudes from those which have been characteristic of the Soviet Union in recent years.

It was apparent to all of us—and this would not be a subject of disagreement between the different parties in that delegation — that the economic situation was a major driving force, along with the desire for greater stability, in Mr. Gorbachev's attitude to disarmament. That was underlined by my perception that it was not cruise or Pershing that concerned Mr. Gorbachev most; nor was it French and British nuclear forces that most concerned him. Indeed, he made increasingly clear his readiness to put that issue to one side. The strategic defence initiative and the major commitment that would be involved in continuing the existing Soviet work in that area to match that initiative was Mr. Gorbachev's main concern. Removing the SDI linkage was an important decision for Mr. Gorbachev to make. I believe that that decision was dictated by his belief that the process must be got rolling and that some agreement must be secured somewhere. Indeed, the hon. Member for Bexleyheath was right when he said that the Soviet leader must start to show results if he is to remain secure in his own political system.

In the course of our discussions in Moscow, I felt that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East appeared rather like an early and very genial Father Christmas, upending his sack on the Kremlin table so that everything tumbled out before Mr. Gorbachev could even get his note up the chimney. Almost anything that Mr. Gorbachev could have asked for was already on offer because the Labour party had already committed itself to having no NATO nuclear bases in the United Kingdom, no cruise deployment and no British nuclear forces.

There was no incentive to do more than produce decorative offers of re-targeting Soviet missiles and nominal reductions in their strength. I do not believe that that was a sensible strategy. Nor do I believe that Gorbachev was educated in the Santa Claus school of negotiation. He will drive a hard bargain or a hard series of bargains. He is prepared to drive bargains and he needs those bargains. It is in the interests of the West and of world peace to secure bargains which will enhance our security. We cannot do that in one single deal, as Gorbachev discovered when he went to Reykjavik.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who is to reply to the debate, referring to short-range nuclear forces in 1985, said:

"Such systems are not at present the subject of arms control negotiations. Priority is rightly being given by the United States and Soviet Union to reaching agreements on the strategic and long-range intermediate categories." —[Official Report, 20 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 209.]

The Minister stressed the distinctive nature of the various negotiations. We now have the opportunity to make progress on intermediate nuclear forces.

When the Prime Minister goes to Moscow, there are many issues that she can rightly raise. She can talk about short-range missiles and Soviet conventional forces. She can talk about human rights issues. All of those are important to the West and to the West's perception of Soviet intentions and to the West's assessment of Soviet good faith. But she must not stand in the way of a deal on intermediate nuclear forces by making it dependent on linkage with any or all of those issues.

We were prepared to bring this matter before the House. It would not otherwise have been debated before the Prime Minister's visit to the Soviet Union. It is entirely in line with our belief that we should maintain sound defence while actively promoting disarmament that we ask the Government to take what will be, in the view of millions of people, a small but very significant step forward for mankind if they enable the nations of the world to achieve the first major nuclear arms deal—that on intermediate nuclear forces. It is an opportunity that the Government must not throw away.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): I agree with the last words of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). This is an important debate, and I am grateful to the alliance for arranging it, although they may come to regret it because of the inconsistencies that it has shown in their position. It is important because it concerns the first substantial reductions in modern weapons. The debate contained thoughtful speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) and for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), among others, and from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang).

The one thing that the debate lacked was the sound of Opposition or alliance leaders eating their words. That would have been appropriate. I know that humble pie is not the favourite diet of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who prefers an extravagance of loose verbiage, but it would have been good if, on this occasion, he had echoed the words of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and accepted that his constant opposition to the deployment of cruise in Britain had been wrong.

The right hon. Gentleman said, "It was our determination to deploy cruise and Pershing that brought the Soviets back to the negotiating table." How right he was, yet we heard not a word of that from the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, who once again resorted to using ridiculous phrases such as the one about the Prime Minister reviving the psychosis of the cold war— [Interruption.] We heard good grunting noises from the right hon. Gentleman, but he would do well to remember the article that he wrote in The Observer of 13 February 1983. It was entitled "The Case against Cruise" and it contained gems such as the following:

"If Cruise is once deployed it will make an arms agreement enormously more difficult. It is certain that if the West deploys Cruise and Pershing the Russians will reciprocate. The balance of power will then become much less stable than it is today. For all these reasons, NATO must now abandon its decision of December 1979. The Labour Party is determined that Britain shall not accept Cruise missiles on her soil."

Instead, today the right hon. Gentleman was like one of the ugly sisters suddenly deciding that Cinderella was her best friend after all. He is trying to jump on the bandwagon——

Mr. Healey rose——

Mr. Renton: The right hon. Gentleman has had his chance. I will give way in a second. His hypocrisy in the way in which he talked about INF and the possibility of a zero-zero option will remain with him for many years.

Mr. Healey: I am glad that the Minister has given way. Every quotation that he made has been justified in the event. The Soviets did reciprocate the deployment of cruise and Pershing by putting missiles in East Germany and Czechoslovakia. Four years passed before we could resume arms negotiations. The position has become less favourable than it was, as the Prime Minister said last week. Every statement that I made has been proved right in the event.

Mr. Renton: I regret that I gave way to the right hon. Gentleman. I am reminded of the old phrase, "Success has many fathers, but failure is an orphan." That is what we have heard today, and the same is true of the alliance spokesmen. It would be wrong to leave them out of the calculations altogether.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) tried to make it clear that it was logical and consistent for the alliance to have backed the dual track decision but to have voted against the deployment of cruise. That is precisely what they did. He said, "That is an absolutely clear position." To me, it is as clear as mud. As the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth made abundantly clear, because of the deployment of cruise and because of the courage and steadfastness of the NATO Alliance in deploying cruise and Pershing, we reached the position that we are in today. Without that, we would not have been here.

Mr. Foulkes: It is facile.

Mr. Renton: No, it is not facile. The question is how many SS20 systems would have remained facing Europe if we had followed Labour or alliance policies. Would it have been 900, 600 or 300? One can choose any number one likes except zero. Only with the deployment of cruise, contrary to the policies of the Liberal party, the alliance and the Labour party, have we reached the position——

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): The Minister knows full well that the policies of the alliance have been consistent throughout—[Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) can keep his policies, but the SDP line has been consistent, as has been the alliance line. The leader of the Liberal party went to his conference and had enough courage to challenge the delegates and reject their policy. The fact is that he did not accept the Liberal assembly decision. It is about time that it was accepted that there is some honour in this House. The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) has consistently held the view that we should support the dual track decision. The policy of the alliance, as distinct from the policy of the Liberal party —[Interruption.]—has never shifted. It is the strength of the alliance that both parties have to agree to a policy before it becomes alliance policy. It is wrong to claim that that is not so.

Mr. Renton: The right hon. Gentleman has managed to bury the alliance defence policy once and for all. He has certainly buried any idea that there is unanimity or consistency in it. He said that the alliance had always supported the dual track position, yet in the House the alliance voted against the deployment of cruise. He did that, as did the leader of the Liberal party, and it is an intrinsic part of the dual track decision. Only that decision has brought us to the stage that we have reached today.

To get back to the main gist of the debate, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East suggested that the Government had been half-hearted in welcoming Mr. Gorbachev's suggestion. But my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary emphatically welcomed the Soviet statement for three clear reasons. First, it accepted the idea of an INF agreement based on the zero option that the NATO Alliance first put forward in 1981. Secondly, the Soviet leadership has broken the link between an INF agreement and SDI which we and our NATO allies have repeatedly urged the Soviet Union to do. My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) pointed out the importance of this. Thirdly, the Soviet statement made no reference to the British and French independent nuclear deterrent, a third good reason for supporting the statement, thus confirming our long insistence on the exclusion of the British and French deterrents from any INF negotiations.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East will remember that in the SDI debate in February 1986 he said:

"The major obstacle to accepting the Soviet proposals for the zero option of intermediate nuclear forces is the British Government's determination to go ahead with the Trident programme."—[Official Report, 19 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 33.]

However, last October Mr. Gorbachev said of the British and French independent deterrent forces, "Let them be increased and further improved." I ask the House and the right hon. Gentleman whose advice I should take, his or the general secretary's? Certainly, the general secretary's advice is a great deal more helpful and useful for the defence of this country than that of the right hon. Gentleman.

Like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, I am cautiously optimistic about the outcome of the negotiations. Those involved in arms control matters have by nature to be cautious and, as many of my hon. Friends have said in the debate, the going will not be easy. However, the events of the past week or so give one reason to think that real progress may be possible. The ground has already been covered in some detail in exchanges between the two parties, most notably during the Reykjavik meeting last October, and the Americans moved with promptness in tabling a draft treaty.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East, the hon. Members for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) and some of my hon. Friends asked about the position of SRINF in the current treaty negotiations. Part of the West's negotiating position since 1981 has been that an LRINF deal must contain constraints on SRINF. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said earlier, the draft treaty contains articles constraining those shorter range weapons which might be used to bypass an LRINF agreement. NATO will require follow-on negotiations to address the Soviet imbalance in these and other shorter range systems.

At present we do not know precisely what the Soviet Union is prepared to offer on SRINF. The Soviets must address the imbalance, explain why they need these systems which have no direct equivalent on the NATO side, and say why they continue to deny the United States the right to match. Similarly, the question of conventional weapons was raised frequently in the debate. The Prime Minister agreed with President Reagan at Camp David that steps to eliminate conventional disparities would become more important as nuclear weapons were reduced.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud, in his thoughtful speech, and the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth asked about on-site verification as well as the use of national technical means such as satellites and said that this will have to be looked at very carefully in arriving at a final treaty. I agree with those hon. Members, including, I think, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East, who said that the verification arrangements made in this treaty could be a useful precedent. One will look to see how they are worked out and if they could be built on in other fora.

I realise how important this issue is to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury because Greenham common is in his constituency and he has often spoken wisely on the subject in the House. He asked what had happened to make the Soviets change their minds. That point was also made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East. I suggest several possibilities such as economic questions in the Soviet Union; a wish among the Soviets not to invest huge sums of money in new defence technologies; a wish on the part of the new leadership to show members of its bureaucracy and the party that it is making progress in these negotiations; and, above all, the resolution of NATO itself.

Over the years the Soviet Union has been shown that cruise and Pershing missiles were being deployed in Western Europe and that the only way to remove them was for the Soviets to remove the SS20s. That must be regarded as a great success for the steadfastness of NATO.

We should not be carried away too much by thoughts about a transformation in Soviet society. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer). It is easy to be excited when we read in the newspapers about all that has happened. However, only in the last two weeks we have had two instances of the Soviets refusing entry visas to an all-party group of Members of Parliament and, at the end of last week, a group of parliamentary wives who wanted to go to the Soviet Union for tourism and to meet friends, including a number of Soviet Jews who have been denied exit visas for 10 or 15 years. It is inconceivable that in the Soviet Union, which is moving towards more openness and towards restructuring, such retrogressive steps should still be taken because they appear to be clearly contrary to the obligations that the Soviets entered into under the Helsinki final act.

Where does this leave us? Over the last few years the opposition parties would have had us scuttling off to Moscow at every new twist in the Soviet strategy for wearing down the West. The negotiating brief of the Opposition parties, and especially that of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, would have been a deal at any price — cruise, Pershing, Trident, everything must go. Instead of that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will visit Moscow later this month and in her agenda will be discussions with the Soviet leader on genuine arms control. Those discussions will be on the basis of real and balanced cuts in nuclear arsenals which will not leave us defenceless in the face of a Soviet threat.

Recent developments have proved for all to see that we were right to go ahead with cruise deployment and right to resist the numerous offers for freezes or partial reductions which Moscow presented in the years before deployment and which Labour and Liberal parties found so attractive. They also prove that we were right to refuse to allow the British nuclear deterrent to be included in INF negotiations, and right to hold out for the genuine and balanced arms control agreements that we may now be in sight of achieving. The whole country will remember that at the next election.

Question put and negatived.

Regional Employment Opportunities

7.38 pm

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the increasing disparity of opportunities among and within the constituent nations and regions of the United Kingdom, characterised by high unemployment rates, low job vacancy figures, and poor infrastructure and housing in the deprived areas, in contrast with lower unemployment, skill shortages, and congestion as well as high housing and living costs in the more advantaged areas; and calls for a strong regional policy spearheaded by regional development agencies aimed at making the United Kingdom a multi-centred society where every nation, region and travel-to-work area has an equal opportunity to invest in its own enterprise and provide training and job opportunities for its people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I must tell the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Howells: Under this Government, Britain is fast becoming a bitter and divided nation. Far from creating one nation, under their present leadership the Tories have achieved small islands of affluence in a huge sea of disadvantage. Never have the haves and have nots been more widely spread and never has one part of Britain—the south-east—been so much the major recipient of the limited benefit of a monetarist policy, while other regions suffer unemployment, scarcity of resources and a declining economy.

The economies of Britain's regions have undergone more change in the last 10 years than in the whole of the last 30. In some communities, the painful change caused by the decline in the traditional manufacturing industries — some 30 per cent. of the manufacturing jobs have been lost since 1979—has been offset by new jobs in the service sector, but for a great many others, that has not been the case.

A third of all travel-to-work areas are now experiencing unemployment rates of 15 per cent. or more. A recent EEC survey showed that nine of the 15 cities in the Community with the lowest income, highest unemployment and greatest isolation in terms of business and tourist contacts were in Britain. Palermo in Sicily is now far better off than Liverpool, Manchester or Sunderland.

By contrast with other European countries, power in the British economy has been increasingly concentrated in London. France and Germany have a number of centres which can compete with their capitals, but in Britain only Edinburgh has avoided satellite status. Birmingham, Leeds, Manchester, Liverpool, Newcastle and Bristol used to be major independent centres, with their own economic power and cultural influence. The recent southern increase in inequality precipitated by the Government follows a longer, slower misguided pressure to centralise — most notably in transport policy.

The Government have refused to face up to the scale of the regional disparity in rates of growth and economic prospects. Once the differences between the communities exist, it becomes very difficult to reverse them. Local employment and output decline and it becomes less attractive to start new businesses. Workers have less opportunity or incentive to develop skills and qualifications. Young people emigrate, and potential new employers face problems recruiting qualified manpower.

[Mr. Howells]

The local housing market follows employment into decline. The disparity in house prices creates its own problems. The average price for a pre-war semi-detached house in 1986 in was £75,000 in the south-east, compared with £29,000 in the north. Average house prices have increased by over 50 per cent. since 1983 in the south-east, compared with 26 per cent. in the north-west and 27 per cent. in Wales.

That difference prevents population mobility, because even home owners cannot afford to move to the south-east. But it also creates congestion in London and the south-east, because people are unwilling to take jobs elsewhere for fear of jeopardising their investment. High prices in the south-east also create homelessness in the region.

Turning to unemployment——

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Indeed, higher house prices in the south-east may deter people from the the north and perhaps from Wales from moving to London, but what is wrong with moving jobs to Wales and the north-west, moving to that part of the world the sort of people who would create jobs — for example, the Civil Service? Surely the lower house prices there should attract people into the areas rather than lead to their leaving.

Mr. Howells: There is no point in trying to attract people from the south-east to Wales, Scotland or the north if they cannot find work. There is no work in those areas, as the figures that I will give later will show.

Other changes in the economy are likely to reinforce regional decline. Increases in service industry employment and a continuing shift to the south-east combine with an estimated further decline in manufacturing industry. Warwick university forecasts that 500,000 more jobs will be lost by 1990.

The problem of regional disparity is often seen as one of the north versus the south, but in reality that is extremely misleading, since many of the worst problems are located in the south-west, which has lower per capita GDP than some areas in the north. Even in the prosperous south-east there are some black spots, notably in Greater London—such as Newham, Lambeth and Bermondsey.

A glance at the unemployment rates in the 10 worst hit travel-to-work areas reveals that the worst is Newquay in Cornwall, with 27·8 per cent., and the eighth is Penzance and St. Ives, with 23·7 per cent. The best areas, and still rising, are Winchester and Eastleigh, with 5 per cent.; Cleethorpes, 5 per cent.; Clitheroe, 5 per cent.; Aylesbury and Wycombe, 5·9 per cent.; Cambridge, 6 per cent.; Tunbridge Wells, 6 per cent.; Slough, 6·5 per cent.; and Newbury, 6·6 per cent. But on the other side of the table, as I said, the worst of the lot and still rising is Newquay in Cornwall with 27·8 per cent. Cumnock and Sanquhar, in Scotland, has 26·9 per cent. Cardigan — in my constituency — has 26·1 per cent. South Tyneside has 25·7 per cent.; Skye and Western Ross, 25·3 per cent.; Skegness, 25 per cent.; Lampeter and Aberaeron—also in my constituency—24·8 per cent.; Penzance and St. Ives, 23·7 per cent.

There are also disparities within regions. For example, the south-west saw an increase in unemployment of only 2 per cent. between June 1979 and June 1986, but that concealed a total economic collapse in some areas within the region. The situation in Newquay may be contrasted with that in Exeter, where unemployment is under 9 per cent.

May I mention Cornwall, two days before the by-election? The main problem with regional development in Cornwall is that assisted area status was removed from Truro and St. Austell in 1984. That presents difficulities when trying to attract business to the region. Why go to Truro when Camborne down the road has assisted area status? The largest employer in Truro — Furniss, which makes biscuits — is in the process of leaving the city because it is not an assisted area.

The alliance would create a regional development agency based in the area to combat this problem.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): May I refer the hon. Gentleman to the most recent research notes on unemployment rates by constituency, a copy of which is in the Library? That shows that the unemployment rate in Truro is 14·1 per cent, which seems somewhat adrift from the figure that he gave for Newquay.

Mr. Howells: There are a few miles between Truro and Newquay, but I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention.

Cornwall has a housing problem because it has the highest new dwelling prices in the country outside London and the south-east. House prices have been forced up by the second dwelling and holiday home market. The alliance wants to establish regional development agencies on the Scottish and Welsh models to help relieve the problems of the English regions. It is well known that many Conservative Members opposed the establishment of the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales, the Scottish Development Agency and the Highlands and Islands Development Board.

My constituency is in mid-Wales, and I recognise that the Development Board for Rural Wales has done excellent work to stem depopulation. The WDA is also doing excellent work in north and south Wales. I hope that the Government, in their wisdom, if they decide to use it, create similar agencies for the various parts of England.

We believe that people in the regions are best placed to understand and solve their problems.

Mr. Favell: Is the hon. Gentleman proposing the establishment of a regional development agency for every English region outside the south-east? If not, which regions would be excluded?

Mr. Howells: I want the Government to accept the principle, just as we do. After consultations with local authorities, we might decide to have agencies for the north-east, the north-west, central England, the south-east and the south-west. There is nothing wrong with such a proposal.

The agencies' role would be to attract companies from outside Britain, but their main objective would be to enable new industries to develop and existing ones to diversify. They would help indigenous industries and local enterprise rather than footloose large companies.

Whitehall-directed regional policy has clearly failed. It has also been costly. Each manufacturing job has cost £40,000 to create and sustain. The alliance work search project has demonstrated the low cost of creating jobs through local enterprise boards and agencies such as Lancashire Enterprise Ltd. which creates and sustains jobs for just £2,400 each. These local agencies would work in partnership with regional development agencies and help Britain to become a multi-centred society with prosperous regions again.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the hon. Gentleman explain the Liberal or Social Democratic party policy for a decentralised incomes policy? Does it set pay rates according to local conditions and does the local labour market affect the public sector as well as the private sector?

Mr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman is straying a little and getting worried about the effect that our policies would have on the nation. I am sure that the people will decide when the general election is called.

We also want a programme of investment in human resources among school leavers and young adults to raise skills and training. Universities and polytechnics should develop major new roles in the education and training of young adults so that we can compete with other countries in Europe which place skill training at a higher premium than this misguided Government.

The Employment Institute's report of last week says that unemployment in the north has increased from 10·4 per cent. to 18·9 per cent. during the 1980s. It insists that the Government should increase regional development grants to improve productive capacity. It also calls for more inter-agency co-ordination between Europe, the Government and development agencies.

The report joins the chorus of bodies which are demanding regional development agencies for depressed areas. It says:

"They should have wide-ranging powers to stimulate investment and employment along the lines of those already existing in Scotland and Wales.

The allocation of funds between regions would have to be carefully controlled in order to provide the greatest stimulus to those regions with the most severe problems."

Turning to farming, the sudden introduction of milk quotas in 1984 demolished confidence among farmers overnight. Confidence is now at a low ebb. Farmers have lost faith in the Tories and will not forgive them for their uncaring attitude during the past year.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the policy of two-tier pricing, which is said to be that of the Liberal party, will be advantageous to British farmers, bearing in mind the fact that farms in Europe are infinitely smaller?

Mr. Howells: I am sure that the hon. Lady has read the farming press during the past few weeks. It is very gratifying that leading agriculturists now suggest that the National Farmers Union, other organisations and the Minister should consider the possibility of a two-tier system. If the hon. Lady has a better alternative, I am quite willing to listen.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: The hon. Gentleman must know that the system would apply throughout Europe and that a small farm in Britain is considered relatively large in Europe, so we would catch the worst cold and the rest of Europe would benefit.

Mr. Howells: With respect, I am afraid that the hon. Lady has got it wrong again. Bearing in mind her background, I am sure that she agrees that the local farmer is important to the community. It is our duty and that of the Government to look after small and intermediate farmers, not just the cereal barons. That is the only way to ensure that small farmers survive into the 1990s.

We should consider having a Minister of State for Agriculture for Scotland and for Wales. Both countries have been neglected over the years. The Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales have not been to Brussels for many years. They are duty-bound to go.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): On occasion, especially on fisheries matters, I accompany the Ministers responsible for these matters to Brussels, and when important agriculture issues are dealt with in Brussels, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State accompanies the Minister.

Mr. Howells: I am grateful to the Minister for that intervention. I am sure that he is aware that the Secretary of State for Wales has not been there once during the past six years. I take the Minister at his word, but there are many Scottish farmers who are interested in beef and sheep farming—as well as fishing.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Like me, the hon. Gentleman is concerned about farmers in Wales. From his profound interest in and knowledge of these matters, he will know that Wales is three times self-sufficient in sheep, beef and dairy products. It is often argued on behalf of British farmers that we should not take cuts because the United Kingdom as a whole is not self-sufficient whereas other countries are more than self-sufficient. How does the hon. Gentleman think agriculture in Wales would fare if he had his way and we had a separate Minister arguing for Wales?

Mr. Howells: It would do a power of good for farmers in Wales. We need somebody to represent us in Brussels. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that many farmers have criticised the Secretary of State for Wales for not going to Brussels and speaking and standing up on behalf of the farmers of Wales. The Government should persuade our friends in Europe to have a beef scheme similar to our sheepmeat regime.

I turn now to the cheap credit facilities that now prevail in Europe. There is a great deal of unfair competition in the Community because farmers in France and Germany get cheap credit rates. We should introduce an optional scheme for our farmers. At present, there are capital grant schemes for farmers here whereas in France there is a cheap credit scheme. That should be made optional, and it would help many farmers who are in financial difficulties at the present time.

We must improve our marketing within the Community. I blame the many Europeans who are in charge of marketing our surpluses. Something is radically wrong with a system of storing butter in intervention for four years. I am delighted that at last the Community is moving to rid itself of surpluses.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): A moment ago, did not the hon. Gentleman complain about the cut back in milk subsidies, yet now he is saying how marvellous it is that the butter mountain is being dealt with?

Mr. Howells: I never mentioned milk surpluses. With respect, the hon. Gentleman has got it wrong again. I do not know what has come over Conservative Members tonight.

[Mr. Howells]

This is a short but important debate. Finally, I turn to decentralisation. It is the only way in which the regions of England will survive. The nations of Wales and Scotland want their own Government and regional assemblies in England to make sure that the voice of our peoples are heard at local level and not only at this central level, which has proved misguided. Unfortunately, the people of Wales and Scotland and of various regions in England have not been properly governed during the past few years.

8.2 pm

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'notes that the United Kingdom has benefited from six years of uninterrupted growth; that over the last six months United Kingdom unemployment has fallen by 100,000; that employment has increased substantially since 1983; and that vacancies are at their highest level this decade; commends the efforts of the Government to develop a modern economy which is offering new types of opportunity; recognises in particular its work in launching the most extensive training programme in the country's history, and welcomes its commitment to the regions, underlined by carefully targeted investment and assistance; and further calls on the Government to continue with its present policy of seeking to spread throughout the country the economic conditions that bring prosperity and jobs.'.

When I considered the selection of this debate, I was reminded that there is nothing like the onset of a Budget or by-election to provoke the Opposition parties, including the alliance, into trying to make clear again their employment and regional policies, no doubt on this occasion with half an eye to Truro and half to the forthcoming Budget. Given the Opposition parties have redefined their regional and employment policies on several occasions, it is always interesting to see what version will be forthcoming from the spokesman of those parties.

The motion on the Order Paper seemed to have the especially endearing quality that sometimes comes from the alliance, especially the part that was carried away on the question of regional policy and decentralisation, on which the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) has commented. The motion ends with the words

"calls for a strong regional policy spearheaded by regional development agencies aimed at making the United Kingdom a multi-centred society where every nation, region and travel-to-work area has an equal opportunity to invest in its own enterprise and provide training and job opportunities for its people."

I have never heard that degree of local autonomy in investment and employment policy advocated before. As there are 334 travel-to-work areas, what is being advocated is a degree of Government decentralisation which has not hit England since the time of the Norman conquest. It seems incredible that that has been put forward by the alliance now.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North did not touch in quite so much detail on the employment policies with which the alliance parties would tackle the problems that he described. I realise that he is holding some of his party's fire for tomorrow morning's press conference, at which his hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and his colleagues will unveil an alliance plan for jobs and poverty. I refer to the press release that will be put out tomorrow by the alliance, because it is only there that one can find exactly what they advocate to tackle the problems that the hon. Gentleman has just described. The press release states

"The alliance package shows that unemployment can be reduced substantially without increasing inflation by means of a sustained incomes policy which reduces incomes growth by an average of one per cent. per year.

It proposes a prudent and targeted rise in public spending in line with growth in the economy. In the first year gross public spending would be increased by £4·9 billion and the PSBR by £2·1 billion."

The hon. Gentleman does not seem to have been let in to the secrets of the incomes policy, to which the alliance keep referring, because he was unable to answer a question about it fired at him from the Labour Benches.

So far as the second part of the alliance release is concerned, the increased public spending and increased PSBR are just the policies that led John Horam to leave the alliance recently because it has a mere pale shadow of the policies on public spending, taxation and borrowing that are so frequently put forward by the Labour party.

Opposition parties may try to redefine their policies, but there are some aspects of the motion upon which we can all agree. Nobody has ever denied that there is "disparity of opportunity" in different parts of the country. All parties share concern about what are regional differences or what are, as the hon. Gentleman has said, more localised differences in the levels of unemployment, investment and economic growth in this country. However, I do not agree that they are new or that they are increasing. There have been similar debates about regional disparities in the country at various times in this century, and similar things have been said. However, during this Government's period of office, the proportion of unemployment in the north as a proportion of the whole has fallen slightly and there has been a proportionate increase in total unemployment in the south.

However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that depressed towns and inner city areas are to be found across the country and that the analysis that is often put forward turns all that into a crude north-south divide and is thoroughly misleading. One can find pockets of prosperity and poverty all over the country. I have no doubt that the onset of the Truro by-election is causing everybody suddenly to discover that those problems are not entirely confined to the north of England, as a few had complained only a few weeks ago.

Given that these disparities exist, we must tackle them realistically and practically. My first proposition on the Government's behalf is to assert that now that the national economy is performing so much better, the total level of employment in the economy is steadily growing and the level of unemployment is declining, the Government are obviously creating the conditions within which it is easier to tackle the problems of disparity than it has been for a long time. When one considers how those problems might be tackled, I have to say to the Opposition parties, having heard a speech from a Liberal Member and looking forward to a speech from a Labour Member in a few moments, that I suspect that their approach to the problem, which is not new, is that they go back to the old regional policies of the past few decades.

My limited experience of politics has made me steadily ever more sceptical of the old type of broad-brush regional policy and the prospects of it ever producing the result that we want. Years ago, in my reckless youth, I was the principal author of a Bow Group pamphlet entitled "New Hope for the Regions" in which I advocated regional government of the type that the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North has propounded. However, all my experiences since then of the growing expense and difficulty of the various tiers of local government that we have had have completely converted me. I do not believe that any of the regions would benefit from expensive new tiers of government, interposed in the present difficult relationships between national and local government. If regional development agencies are really being advocated by the Liberal party for each and every part of the United Kingdom, that would be self-defeating, especially when it comes to attracting inward investment from overseas, when no doubt the regions would act in competition with each other for overseas visitors.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: In the book that my right hon. and learned Friend and I wrote together — [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] We were co-authors of it — we advocated beefing up small firms — now a successful policy under this Government.

Mr. Clarke: We authors remember all our accounts. I was referring to an earlier essay — [Laughter.] Neither my hon. Friend nor I advocated regional government in the pamphlet that we both produced on regional policy in Europe shortly before the general election. Surprisingly, there are a few unsold copies of it on the book stalls and I commend it to all hon. Members. We advocated a policy aimed at encouraging small businesses in particular and we rejected the broad-brush policies which have not worked in the past.

I agree with one feature in a booklet put out by Mr. Nicholas Bosanquet on behalf of the alliance and its work search theories. It is called, "Turning the Tide of Decline in the Regions" and was published in March 1987. Indeed, the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North quoted it extensively without attribution, but he was quoting an ally. Mr. Bosanquet comes to the conclusion that regional aid on the old pattern has failed. That is where we should start from, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) and I did, when criticising the regional policies of the Labour Government.

Since then new ideas on regional policy and local employment have come from the present Government. It will be a pity if our entire discussion about regional employment turns on the simple issue of the level of regional grants and where the map is drawn, giving various areas assisted area status. We had a touch of it in the hon. Gentleman's speech. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman touched on that in his comments about Truro and Camborne. Too often that point is made by north country Labour Members who reduce the whole matter to an argument about broad-brush grants which largely do not work.

I return to the position from which I started in the pamphlet to which I have referred. The policy to rectify local differences in employment opportunities must be based on the need to help people in the regions to make their towns and cities more attractive to investment and jobs of the type that emerge in a modern economy. The Government's policies have concentrated on helping people in the regions to help themselves. We believe that that is best achieved by producing a partnership of effort between the public and private sectors, involving the Government, private industry, private developers and local government, where local government is prepared to participate. However, as we all know, the experience of the Government and the private sector is that in many inner-city areas Left-wing local authorities go more out of their way to drive away investment, work experience and training than to encourage them.

Hon. Members must appreciate that when that partnership gets under way the employment that we shall seek to attract will be different from that which many areas experienced in the past. The growth in employment will not be in the old, traditional industries with large factories producing traditional goods and owned by paternalistic employers. Obviously, we protect them where we can: the multi-fibre arrangement protects the textile industry, which is now becoming successful; and the Government stepped in to protect Rio Tinto-Zinc and its subsidiary in Cornwall to help the tin mines during a period when the market was unstable. We are looking for growth in new start-ups, small businesses that will expand and in service industries, as well as in manufacturing industries. We are also looking to encourage self-employment so that we can support people who work on their own. I am glad to say that that has happened to a considerable extent during the Government's period of office.

It is interesting to visit a town such as Sunderland. Most people there are aware that the flagship of redevelopment is to be found in Washington new town where Nissan has opened a large new car plant which it proposes to expand. What is often not appreciated by the local people is that, although the Nissan investment is welcome and has created many new jobs, twice as many new jobs have been created locally by the Government's enterprise allowance scheme, subsidising previously unemployed people who go into business on their own account. Self-employment has been expanding everywhere, but it has been expanding most rapidly in Yorkshire and Humberside which has experienced the greatest percentage increase in self-employment since 1979. Self-employment has increased there by no less than 78 per cent. That is only a whisker ahead of the south-west where the number of self-employed has increased hugely—by 77 per cent. between 1979 and now. Obviously, we must build on that and speed it up.

Some areas are still not sufficiently attractive to the new types of investment and employment that we need to draw in. Our answer, working on the local partnership principle that I described, is to continue to make them more attractive so that new investment and new jobs can be spread more evenly. Obviously, it is difficult. At present some areas are naturally more attractive than others. To use a rather fanciful illustration, at present it is easier to attract new investment and jobs to Bracknell than to Gateshead. The answer to that is not simply to complain about it; it is not unrealistic to see what can be done in Gateshead, not to make it identical to Bracknell—that is many years ahead—but to make it acquire more of the attractions that are drawing enterprise, investment and jobs to Bracknell. It involves changing Gateshead so that it will receive more investment.

Mr. Geraint Howells: If the Minister believes that the Government policy for England at present is the best, has he any plans to abolish the Welsh and Scottish Development Agencies?

Mr. Clarke: I did not say that. I was pointing out that the creation of English development agencies to cover practically the whole of England, which the hon. Gentleman proposed, would greatly diminish the value of the Welsh and Scottish Development Agencies to Wales and Scotland. It would produce a confusion of agencies, using public funds to compete with each other for investment and that would cause confusion to the people whom we are trying to attract from abroad.

Mr. Gordon Brown: If the problem is the absence of sufficient spending on the infrastructure and inadequate levels of investment in the north and other areas, what sense does it make to cut rate support grant and regional development grant? If the Minister will not support a development agency for the whole of England, which is certainly not Labour party policy, but wants to give local people the chance to help themselves, why has he resisted the demands from the north for a northern development agency?

Mr. Clarke: I did not say that the problem was a problem of infrastructure generally. The road map of England is bluest around Merseyside and the north-east where motorways abound, but in themselves they do not bring new investment to those areas. The idea that more public funds through rate support grant should support the high spending activities of Left-wing councils will not lead to the regeneration of their areas. We are tackling the physical problems that exist in many areas directly and more selectively, for example by creating urban development corporations. At present we have two—one in the docklands of London, which I recommend any hon. Member to visit as it is a spectacular example of the transformation of a derelict area into a thriving, prosperous centre of activity——

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not give way. The Liberal spokesman took 25 minutes moving his motion, which he was entitled to do. If both the hon. Gentleman and I take half an hour each, we shall move to the replies without any Back-Bench speeches.

I was commending the London Docklands Development Corporation. The South Liverpool Urban Development Corporation is equally successful. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has announced urban development corporations for Trafford Park, Teesside, the Black Country and Tyne and Wear. Their purpose is to speed up decision making, to attract private investment into derelict areas which with grant can be made usable, and to target infrastructure spending as is required. It is not true that broad-brush infrastructure spending everywhere necessarily attracts new jobs.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment also has the system of urban development grant, developed by this Government. A 75 per cent. grant goes to those local authorities that will work with private developers to secure investment in inner-city sites. Since 1983, 228 projects have been approved, at a cost of £106 million to the taxpayer. That money has levered £440 million of private investment in factories, shops, offices and houses in inner-city areas. My right hon. Friend is now preparing his proposals for urban regeneration grant to take that further.

In those and other ways, we are tackling the physical problems of deprived areas. However, in many locations, the main problem is raising the skills, employability and motivation of people who live either in towns that are deprived because of declining traditional industry or in the inner-city areas of a thriving city, where the prosperity does not reflect on unfavoured districts.

The main agent for Government policy is the Manpower Services Commission, which, as every hon. Member knows, is engaged on the huge task of delivering the Government's jobs and training programmes, in which we continue to innovate in a whole number of exciting ways. This is not the debate for me to continue to describe to the House what we are achieving under the restart programme, calling for advice about people who have been unemployed for more than six months, and steering them towards a job. Other initiatives include the many schemes in the Action for Jobs package, and the innovation of the two-year YTS, which guarantees two years good quality training to every 16 and 17-year-old who is unemployed after Easter this year. There is the new job training scheme which we are introducing and which I announced to this House recently.

However, it is relevant to point out that we are concentrating the whole package of employment and training programmes heavily on those regions where they are needed most. We are putting a strong regional emphasis into the work of the MSC. To illustrate that, I shall quote the figures spent on the MSC's programmes in the financial year 1986-87. In the south-east of England, the MSC spent £59 per head of the total work force; in the south-west, £121 per head—more than twice the south-eastern figure—in Scotland, as much as £143 per head; in Wales £161 per head; and in the northern region £179 per head on our employment and training measures. That last figure is three times as much per head of the labour force compared to what is spent in the south-east. People do not appreciate how much the extremely ambitious programme of employment and training measures that we have announced is targeted on the more disadvantaged regions.

All over the country, not just in the regions, we are giving high priority to the inner-city areas. The centre of Bristol, which is a prosperous city, the centre of London, which is a wealthy city, the centre of Birmingham, and other inner-city areas pose a whole range of social, employment and other problems. Inner-city areas have been made priority areas for our employment and training programme places. In the inner-city partnership areas alone, my Department and the MSC expect to spend £175 million in 1986-87 on employment and training measures.

In the same inner-city partnership areas, the enterprise allowance scheme, which supports self-employment, is expected to attract 4,500 people in 1986-87. We are still working at improving the delivery of training programmes for inner-city residents. We have discussed this problem with the MSC from time to time, and the chairman agrees with me that we should try to target the MSC's efforts increasingly on inner-city unemployed people.

In particular, we try to target more of the best employer-based YTS schemes on inner-city youngsters and ethnic minority youngsters. We are also seeking to tackle the higher rates of refusal to join YTS and early leaving, which are sometimes experienced in inner-city areas. We must tackle that now that we can guarantee a two-year YTS for all young people.

We are planning to have a drive to generate good quality work placements that will improve the motivation of youngsters in inner-city areas over the next year. We shall probably open more drop-in centres for YTS entrants, and we shall make sure that the best quality of the Government's employment training schemes are delivered in the inner-city areas as well as elsewhere.

We are concentrating all the efforts of the Government in an innovative way, particularly in the eight task force areas designated under the inner-city initiative. These areas are pockets of deprivation, and we concentrate all the efforts of Government through the urban aid programme, the MSC programmes and the work of the Departments of Trade and Industry and of Education and Science and of the Home Office to see what can be done by bringing them together more closely and targeting them on the gravest problems in those eight areas. On top of that, we are spending a small sum of money, £8 million, to forward particular projects in line with the Government's overall policies. We are beginning to tackle, in a much more forceful way than has been attempted for many years, the problem of the imbalance of opportunities within our cities and regions.

We are also tackling the problems of those places where large numbers of people have been displaced from the older traditional industries as a result of change. It is obviously necessary to target effort and money on those. Our policy is not to pretend that the coal mines will reopen, that the steel industry will employ thousands more people or shipbuilding will again be a massive employer. We seek to provide training for the redundant and support the new business that is being attracted to areas most affected.

For example, we have backed British Steel Industry, which had £50 million until it became self-supporting. In the past six months alone, it has assisted in 4,600 job opportunites. British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd. was set up with £6·3 million-worth of public moneys, and I am told that, as of 23 January 1982, of the 2,412 people made redundant when the company was set up, some 710 people have found new jobs, 522 have applied for training courses — 254 of those are training — 16 have opened new businesses, 165 more applications have been received by the company for assistance to start up new businesses, and 240 people have opted to retire.

British Coal Enterprise Ltd. had had £40 million of public money by July 1986. Some £20·8 million had been committed by the end of December 1986, and that stimulated £106 million of investment from other sources. The job opportunities involved so far amount to 13,077.

Recently, we made a contribution to the Northern Development Company, set up to stimulate inward investment in the north. A total of more than £1 million has been put into that very encouraging example of co-operation between private business and local government, including contributions from the City Action team.

I hope that I have shown that the Government are producing more new ideas on the problem that the debate addresses than we have seen for many years. It has been successful. Over the country as a whole, unemployment is down by over 100,000 in the past six months, which is the biggest six-monthly fall since 1973. Over the past 12 months, unemployment has fallen fastest in the northern region of England, in the north-west, in the west midlands and in Wales. The growth in total employment since March 1983 has taken place in every region of England.

The Government accept the reality of the problem, and are putting forward the most practical and realistic ways to tackle it. I contrast that with the attempts of all the Opposition parties to produce a credible policy of their own. Every time that they return to employment policies, all that happens is another attempt to produce new Mickey Mouse figures to which a veneer of policy is attached to try to make them appear credible.

8.29 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): The purpose of the debate is not merely to illustrate the problems of the regions and the inner cities, but to demonstrate how a solution to the problems of the regions and the inner cities is in the interests of the shires, the suburbs and the south-east. Further, it is to make the case for regional policy, not as a response to the social problems of the north, but as a response to the economic problems of the whole country. It makes no sense to any hon. Member representing any constituency that we have, in parts of the south, the shires and the suburbs, congestion, overheating, escalating house prices, skill shortages and pressures on the green belt, yet in the north we have wasted infrastructure, unused resources, record unemployment, urban deprivation, forced migration and depopulation in many areas.

It cannot be right that unemployment affects 1,500 men and women in some of the constituencies of the shires and suburbs—that is bad enough—but 15,000 in some areas in the industrial regions. It cannot be right that unemployment is 3 to 4 per cent. in some of the constituencies that Conservative Members represent, but over 30 per cent. in some of the constituencies that Opposition Members represent. It cannot be right that house prices are now twice as high in the south-east as they are in many parts of the north, that the population of the northern region will fall below 3 million by the year 2000, Scotland's population will fall below 5 million soon after that, and yet there are enormous problems with population congestion in the south.

Therefore, we advocate policies for investment in training—not the old-style regional policies to which the Minister was referring. They are not just policies for the provision of grants, sites, investment in education and training in the inner cities and regions; they are policies for locating research and development in some of the hardest-hit areas of the country and for investment in infrastructure—not just the physical infrastructure, but the technological infrastructure of the regions. We are saying that our policies for the north will not be at the expense of the south. Our policy is for balanced industrial development in the interests of the north and south.

Mr. Favell rose——

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington) rose——

Mr. Brown: I shall give way in a moment.

We heard from the Liberal spokesman for Wales, the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), about the Liberal party's commitment to Scotland, Wales, the north, the south-west, the rural areas and just about every other part of the country. The Liberal party regrets the drift from north to south.

The commitment of the SDP to the north might be taken a bit more seriously if we had not seen so many of its leading figures desert the north for the south. The president of the SDP, Mrs. Shirley Williams, has deserted Crosby in the north to stand for Cambridge in the south. The party's vice president, Mr. Bill Rodgers, who was a stalwart at one time in Stockton-on-Tees, is now after a seat in Milton Keynes, which he hopes to win.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): What about Willie Hamilton?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) is putting up a valiant fight and will be given all our support, but I would have advised him to stay next door to me in Fife, Central.

One of the SDP's founding members, Mr. Mike Thomas, is making the trip from Newcastle, East down to Exeter. The man who has travelled furthest of all, Mr. John Horam, the former hon. Member for Gateshead, has moved straight from the alliance to the Conservative party and, I understand, is looking for a safe seat in the south of England with the Conservative party.

I used to think that the initials "SDP" stood for "Still Divided on Polaris", and perhaps that is true, but I am reliably informed that it now means the "Southwardly-Drifting Party", and that is how it looks to many of us in the north.

We welcome the alliance's new-found enthusiasm for addressing the problems of the region. Although we are delighted to have it as a convert to our cause, I think that I should direct the attention of the House — [Interruption.] I think that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) may be silent in a minute. I think that I should draw the attention of the House to two policy statements that have been issued by the SDP and Liberal party over the last few months. The first was issued in July 1986, entitled "Partnership for Progress," and the second document was issued in January 1987, which was also called "Partnership for Progress" but with a new title that was bought from the advertising men, "The Time Has Come." The first policy document mentioned policies for the 1990s. It said:

> "Much of what the alliance wants to achieve in the field of social reform and public provision depends critically on our success in turning the course of the British economy. We are facing two formidable challenges. The first is how to put the unemployed back to work. The second is how to improve the long-term performance of the economy."

That was in July 1986.

In the meantime, we have had the publication of the Government's submission to the European regional development fund. We have had some controversy over the north-south divide. We have had the publication of the census of employment figures, and what do we find in the document "Partnership for Progress", which was published in January and is almost exactly the same document as the previous one, but with one major change? The first sentence about policies for the 1990s is the same, but instead of "facing two formidable challenges," it is now three formidable challenges. The alliance policy document says:

> "The third challenge is to reverse the economic polarisation of our nation."

Whilst I welcome the conversion of the alliance to a commitment to do something about the problems of the regions, it is tragic that such a commitment was underplayed and barely mentioned in the policy document of last July. It is typical of a party that reacts to every twitch of the electoral swingometer.

Mr. Favell: A little earlier the hon. Gentleman was bemoaning the difference in house prices between the north and south. He said that in the south-east house prices were twice as much as in the north. They are probably three or four times higher than in my constituency. However, should not the hon. Gentleman be encouraging trade unions to take advantage of the lower house prices and cost of living in the north to negotiate on a local basis so that wage rates reflect those lower house prices and cost of living and to attract investment in those areas of high unemployment?

Mr. Brown: I do not know whether the Government or the hon. Gentleman want to deal with the consequences of the Government's policy—rising house prices in one area and declining house prices or stable house prices in another—or whether he wants to deal with the causes of the problem, to which I shall come in a minute. The hon. Gentleman has a common cause with the alliance on this matter.

The Paymaster General made a fairly controversial speech a few days ago, which he followed on Friday with an explanation or elaboration of what he said a few days before.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North was reticent when I asked him about the alliance's policy on regional wage differentials. In this excellently printed alliance policy document—not excellent in what it says—we are told:

> "We support an independent pay and review board for all the public sector which would, amongst other things, take into account conditions in local labour markets."

I wonder whether that means that the alliance is committed to a policy of regional wage differentials in the public sector, or whether it wants it in the public and private sector. I am reminded that the Liberal conference, in September 1985, came to exactly the same conclusion, except that it proposed an arbitrator when dealing with regional pay differentials. The arbitrators, it says,

> "would be free to approve higher settlements in the south of England than Scotland provided they were not inflationary and were likely to generate jobs."

That alliance policy suggests that there should be regional wage differentials imposed under an incomes strategy. We know that regional wage differentials exist at the moment, and I shall come to that when I talk about the Minister's policy, but the alliance is saying that wage rates should be set under its centralised incomes strategy with a view to achieving differentials and settlements between different parts of the country. The alliance will have to tell the voters in Scotland, the north, Wales and other parts of the country precisely what the difference will be in the wages that people can expect to earn under this decentralised incomes policy.

The Paymaster General has been sent in to bridge the regional divide. Unfortunately, his only solution seems to widen the regional divide by a policy of differential wage settlements which would certainly discriminate against the north. We had from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the familiar litany of statistics about employment, unemployment, grants and public spending, but he invariably concentrates on the silver lining and ignores the dark clouds on our economic horizon.

For example, the Paymaster General told us that employment was rising everywhere, and he gave us the impression that things were booming in Yorkshire and Humberside because of an increase in the number of self-employed people. He did not tell us that the only verifiable estimates of the number of self-employed people come from the 1981 census and that he will not be able to give us another absolutely accurate figure before the 1991 census. His figures are based on a sample of less than 1 per cent. of the labour force survey. If the self-employed people to whom the Minister referred actually exist, they are so enterprising that they appear to be unknown either to the Inland Revenue or the Department of Health and Social Security which should be collecting national insurance from them. We must examine carefully and question the figures produced by the Minister.

If the Paymaster General looked at the more reliable figures for the increase in the number of employees since 1983, and even if I discounted, for the purpose of the argument, the number of people in second jobs, and the fact that there is an element of statistical projection in the figures, which allows the Minister to forecast the number of employees six and 12 months from now, and if we ignored the fact that many new jobs have been created by splitting existing jobs into two, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would find that 80 per cent. of the additional employees since the last general election are in the south-east, the south-west and East Anglia. There is a clear regional divide.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: If we read carefully through all the qualifying phrases upon qualifying phrases that the hon. Gentleman used before coming to his amazing conclusion, we find that he left out the self-employed and is apparently denying any assertions of an increase in the number of self-employed people. That enables him to come to his ridiculous conclusion.

Does the hon. Gentleman accept that we are expecting about 300,000 people to take part in the enterprise allowance scheme and to receive advice and support in their new ventures as they go into business on their own? Does he think that they do not count? Does he join some of his hon. Friends in dismissing those people as being on a skivvy scheme? Does he accept that 300,000 people are being helped by the Government, in addition to the reliable estimates to which I referred earlier?

Mr. Brown: No one denies the existence of the enterprise allowance scheme, but I suggest that the Minister's overall figures for the number of self-employed people are based on a form of statistical projection and on a sample from the labour force survey that is so small that nobody could take it seriously.

If the Minister looks at the figures for the number of employees—the figures in the Employment Gazette—he will find that more than 80 per cent. of the additional number since June 1983 come from the three regions of the south, and that in Yorkshire and Humberside, in the north-west and in Scotland and Wales the numbers of employees have fallen since June 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: If the hon. Gentleman rejects the evidence drawn by professional, independent statisticians from the labour force survey, what evidence does he have for his assertion that there has been no increase in the number of self-employed people over the past few years? Is there any evidence to support that extraordinary proposition?

Mr. Brown: I am questioning the Minister's figures. He and Lord Young spend a great deal of time on television telling us that more than 1 million jobs have been created since June 1983. They do not give us the qualifications that ought to be made about, for example, second jobs. Many people are counted twice in the statistics, and the Minister never mentions that fact. If we were given all the qualifications, the country could see clearly whether the Government's policies are working.

If the Minister holds to his view that there is a recovery, will he look at manufacturing output and investment figures, because the fate of our industrial regions and of many of our inner cities depends on those figures?

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Is my hon. Friend aware that between 1979, when the Government came to power, and 1984 investment in manufacturing industry in the northern region fell by 42 per cent.?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I hope that the Minister will explain why no other manufacturing country has seen such a huge fall in manufacturing investment since 1979. Will he explain why in the five years after 1979 for which figures are available manufacturing investment fell by about 17 per cent. in Great Britain as a whole, but by 30 to 40 per cent. in Scotland, the north, Wales and the north-west?

If the Minister looks at the real economy instead of at the economy that he has invented for us, he will find that manufacturing output has risen in every other industrial country in Europe and in every other industrial country of a comparable size to Britain, but manufacturing output here is still below the 1979 level. Manufacturing output is down by 4 or 5 per cent. in Britain as a whole, but by 10 or 12 per cent. in some of our most important industrial regions.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The debate has been running for one hour and eight minutes and we have another one hour and 14 minutes, of which I understand 25 minutes will be taken for the wind-up. Not a single Back Bencher has yet spoken. Could you use your good offices to ensure that there is adequate Back-Bench time in the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am afraid that I have no power to do that, but I appeal to the House, and particularly to Front-Bench speakers, to remember that this is a very short debate and many hon. Members are hoping to take part.

Mr. Brown: You will find, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that while the Government and the alliance parties will seek to make two Front-Bench speeches each, the official Opposition will make only one Front Bench speech.

I want to examine the problem of infrastructure and investment in the regions and inner cities. If the Minister is right when he says that there is a recovery, why is investment so low? Why is output still below the 1979 level?

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that productivity has grown enormously recently and has grown 6 per cent. more in this country than in the other European countries to which he referred? It will continue to grow at about 6 per cent. over the next year.

Mr. Brown: I think that the hon. Gentleman misunderstands the problem that I have been outlining. When manufacturing output is declining, as it has declined throughout the past seven years, increases in productivity mean only that less is being produced by a lot fewer people. They do not mean that manufacturing output is rising or that the economy is doing a great deal better and, as we have seen from the figures, they certainly do not mean that manufacturing investment is encouraged to rise.

The Minister talked about a number of infrastructure problems in various parts of the country, but, when asked about them, he gave the impression that there were excellent roads in the north-west—as if there were no other problems to be faced. Has he looked at the Government's submission to the European regional development fund and at what was said in the name of Ministers? Does he realise that in that submission the Government said about Greater Manchester that roads, sewers, the water supply, railways and building stock were "in a state of decay, resulting in a serious situation in which some aspects of the infrastructure are in a state of collapse."? The submission also mentions frequent sewer collapses and dangers from pollution. The volume for Greater Merseyside deals with infrastructure problems and says that "the scale of dereliction will increase and serve to reduce yet further the potential for regeneration."

With regard to the west midlands, it says that "the cumulative effect of under investment in apprenticeships and in modern plant machinery will affect the ability of the region to take advantage of any increase in demand."

That is the position in the regions. I could give the Minister quotations from the reports referring to the inner cities.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North mentioned the problems of the south-west. He should know that in the submission to the European regional development fund it was stated that 50,000 jobs must be created in the south-west. It also said:

"Vital improvements in water supply, sewerage and sewage treatment infrastructure in Devon and Cornwall are essential if new industries are to be encouraged and tourist facilities improved."

The report also mentioned the lack of serviced industrial land.

The reports were written not by me, the Labour party or the parties of the alliance. If the reports are correct—we believe that they are—what are the Government doing about the problems of under-investment and infrastructure? They must be dealt with before our inner cities and industrial regions are regenerated.

If the Minister will not listen to me, will he at least listen to some of his colleagues who have made similar points and who have urged the right hon. and learned Gentleman to act? He should listen to his right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) whose book was published today. He clearly states:

"We must not allow present inaction to continue. A look around our major cities and town centres should be enough to convince us that this Government can no longer stand by on the other side."

The right hon. Gentleman describes the danger of "a physical and social collapse"

in Britain. He continues:

"There is no case to justify underprivileged parts of England sliding into further despair apparently supposed to fight their corner unarmed against the forces of industrial decline."

If the Minister refuses to listen to the right hon. Member for Henley, perhaps he will listen to the right hon. Gentleman's arch rival the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan). He has made a plea similar to that made by the right hon. Member for Henley:

"The gulf between the different parts of the country is unjust and divisive. I believe that we can and that the Government should do more to help."

The right hon. and learned Gentleman calls for a comprehensive review of regional policy and for the creation of development agencies in important areas of the country.

Perhaps the Minister will be more influenced by the Tory Reform Group. I notice that the Minister remains a patron of the group. Despite what the Minister has said this evening, in its statement on the Budget, published only a few days ago, the group states:

"The job census recently published by the Department of Employment demonstrates afresh how wide is the difference between the prosperous areas of the country and the rest—a deepening north-south divide with unpredictable electoral consequences."

Does the Minister agree with that? If so, will he support the proposal that it put to him and to members of the Cabinet that, if they have £5 billion to spend—we know that they have—that money should be invested in housing, infrastructure, the urban programme, proper training and a decent regional policy?

We have enormous and rising unemployment in Scotland and huge unemployment problems in the rest of the country and in Wales. What sense does it make for the Government to halve regional aid and regional development grants since 1979? Indeed, they propose to halve them again.

In the past few months the Government have given us an exercise in blame shifting. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has suggested that the problems of the north are self-inflicted. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security has said that the problems in the north are caused by ignorance, not poverty. That claim was made just at the time when a submission had been made to Europe stating that the Health Service in the north was grossly underfunded and that that was causing many of the health problems in the region. The Secretary of State for the Environment has suggested that the problems are due to Labour councils.

Mr. Marlow rose—

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman will get his chance, and I think that he should listen to what has been said by some of his Ministers.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman has had 26 minutes.

Mr. Brown: The Minister spoke for as long as that. If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I will finish my remarks in just a few moments.

Over the past seven years the Government's solution to the north-south divide has been to allow it to widen and then to deny that it exists. When figures have been produced from a whole series of reports, the Government's response has been to blame the inhabitants. That has been illustrated clearly by the Paymaster General's attempt to blame the workers in the north for the problems of industry in that region. He has suggested that, in some way, wages must be reduced. Which employers and which companies have told him that if wages were reduced in the north they would move there?

Previous Tory Governments have at least been concerned about the regional problem. Some Conservative Prime Ministers have sought to do something about it. Until this Government, no Government have sought to deny the existence of the regional problem and to respond to that problem by cutting available aid and trying to blame the inhabitants.

The country knows that there can be no true prosperity if 4 million people are paid to produce absolutely nothing in the regions and inner cities of this country. The country is also aware that there can be no proper recovery for the entire country unless there is a recovery in traditional industrial regions and the inner cities. It is upon that issue that the Labour party will win the next election.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): I must protest most vigorously at the grotesque abuse practised by the Front Benches in this short debate. They have hogged no less than 1 hour 40 minutes and have left just 40 minutes for all the Back Benchers to participate.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has been fulsome in discussing the alliance and Government policies for regional development but, understandably, was most reticent about letting us have sight of Socialist policies. Much has been made about the north-south divide. It is a reality. It must be addressed, but it must not be exaggerated. Speaking from experience, I must say that I have never known any Government to tackle the problems of the north-west of England with more vigour or more success than the present Government. It is easy to dwell on difficulties but I prefer to address the positive side, and there are many.

In relation to the north-west, present trends are moving firmly in the right direction. By September last year 32,000 more jobs—over and above everything that had been lost—had been created since June 1983. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General has said, unemployment is falling faster in the north than in the south.

I have had the privilege of representing a large part of Trafford Park, which remains the greatest industrial complex in the United Kingdom, for the past 17 years. Throughout those 17 years we have never had a Government who have done so much or acted so effectively to regenerate Trafford Park and to assure its future as the one who are now in office. We do not need lectures from Socialists on regional policy. Their policies were an unmitigated disaster for the area that I have the honour to represent and for all the established industrial areas of the north. Their policies encouraged industry to move to greenfield sites and to abandon the traditional industrial areas. This represented a flagrant waste of resources and had the effect of blighting established industrial areas. It was the epitome of a counter-productive regional policy.

Under the first Wilson Government, more than 15,000 jobs were lost in Trafford Park, including 8,000 at GEC alone. Under the second Wilson Government, that trend continued. A further 5,000 jobs were lost just across the Manchester ship canal at the Irlam steelworks when that plant closed, but the then Labour Government, supported and kept in office by the Liberal party, pursued a policy of unremitting hostility towards Trafford Park and Manchester. This was carried out with the ruthless gerrymandering of industrial development certificates by Ministers.

I shall cite only one instance. Kelloggg, in my constituency, wanted to expand its production facilities in Trafford Park. It was told by the Socialist Government that it could not do so in Trafford Park, even though there were vast areas that were devastated in which jobs had been lost on a colossal scale. Kellog asked "Where should we go?" The Government replied, "Why don't you go to a place called Huyton?" I wonder whose constituency that was.

The Socialist Government, and the Liberals who propped them up in office, have done nowt for Trafford Park or the people of Manchester over any of the years that I have been in this place. On the other hand, the present Government have granted the area assisted area status. Secondly, they have established an enterprise zone, which has attracted many hundreds of jobs into the area. Thirdly, they have designated Trafford Park, the Salford docks and Irlam to be an urban development corporation, an area of about 3,000 acres. It is estimated that the £160 million that the Government are earmarking for the regeneration of the area could lead to the creation of 15,000 new jobs. I should like to thank my right hon. and hon. Friends and the Government as a whole for what they are doing to regenerate a crucial part of Britain's industrial heartland.

It is not only Trafford Park that has benefited. Whereas Socialists operated a restrictive policy towards Manchester International airport, the Conservative Government have been liberal. They have encouraged the expansion of the airport, which is now the fastest-growing major airport anywhere in Western Europe. Last year it handled 7·6 million passengers, an increase over the previous year of no less than 24 per cent. Manchester is now served by scheduled airlines to twice as many destinations as two years ago, since when El Al now flies to Tel-Aviv, Singapore Airlines to the far east, American Airlines to Chicago, Air Canada to Toronto and British Airways to Hong Kong and a host of European destinations. No fewer than 20 new scheduled destinations were added last year alone.

There is a need to sustain the momentum of expansion and we need Government assistance to do so. My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General can relax because what I am about to ask for does not require any additional money. Under the Bermuda II agreement, which was negotiated by the Lib-Lab Government in 1977, Manchester was excluded as a United Kingdom gateway airport while Heathrow, Gatwick and Prestwick were so designated. Thus a United States airline wishing to route through Manchester is discouraged by the United States authorities from even applying for the route because they have been led to believe that the British Department of Transport will demand reciprocity of concession from the United States. I understand that two major airlines—Pan American and North-west Orient—have expressed firm intent to come to Manchester, but unless the Government take a positive and enlightened attitude, as they have in previous months, towards the expansion of Manchester International airport in line with the Government's 1985 airports policy White Paper, the discussions will come to nothing and an important opportunity will be lost. I recognise that it might not be the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend, but I hope that he will convey the message to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

The success of Manchester International airport is a key factor in the success of the north-west generally. The development areas of Barrow, Runcorn, Warrington and Trafford Park — all points of expansion in the north-west — make great play in their publicity material in attracting overseas developers by drawing attention to the excellent air services that are provided by the airport. I have no doubt that those services represent a key factor in the situation whereby at present no fewer than seven major new hotels are being built or are in the pipeline in Manchester.

British Aerospace at Woodford only last week secured important new orders for the 146 airliner, safeguarding 3,000 jobs at Woodford, a further 3,000 at Chadderton and creating 200 new jobs at the Woodford facility.

All is not gloom and doom in the north-west and those who suggest that it is do no service to the region they represent. Today in the north-west we are seeing tangible signs of progress towards a brighter future.

9.5 pm

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): To assess the full damage that the Government have done and continue to do to our country it is necessary for the House to consider each of the two nations that the Government have deliberately created and that are persisting. The first of the two nations is suffering from desperate congestion, appalling pressure on its public services, vast waiting lists for urgent hospital treatment, bad transport services due to the congestion, and all the other symptoms of overheating. The other nation is suffering, as the House knows so well, from unemployment, which is not falling by anything like the extent the Government claim and which last month increased. It is also suffering from deprivation, low earnings and all the symptoms of a decadent economy.

The result of those two nations is to present those who are trying to preside over the economy of the country with an appalling problem, which is simply a recurrence of the problem that Labour Governments equally failed to face, namely, measures that would revive and expand industry in the deprived areas seriously overheat parts of the south-east of England and those areas where there is virtually full employment.

We have heard nothing from the Government tonight, in spite of the invitation we gave them in our motion, to suggest how they are to deal with the intractable problem of two separate nations drifting further and further apart. The problem is not tackled at all by the Paymaster General, the number two Minister at the Department of Employment, coming to the House to flagellate himself for his juvenile indiscretions and to talk about the errors of previous Governments in their absurd broad-brush treatment, as if the alliance had been in government recently. Some of us have been condemning broad-brush treatment of the regions since first coming to the House. The reason why we insist that the regions and the local areas must have more say in measures to regenerate themselves is the poor record under both Governments of the twin parties of centralist power.

In Labour's case one shocking waste of resources was the appalling white elephant, the Humber bridge, which goes from nowhere to nowhere. It is our contention that if the project had been debated in a Yorkshire and Humberside assembly, the sensible people of that region would have said, "No Humber bridge at this stage. Let us have instead a dozen new hospitals or 50 new schools." The Tories were the begetters of another of northern England's greatest white elephants, the Kielder dam. It was constructed at enormous public expense and the devastation of beautiful countryside, and what is it worth now? The water is not needed for any part of this country and the latest ploy to try to make some use of that Tory white elephant is to start selling water to Hamburg. That is a manifest symbol of an economy which is mismanaged and which is, in some respects, out of control.

The Paymaster General performed as an identikit Minister. No one would have known which of the twin parties he belongs to. He stood there trying to justify the whole thing by explaining at great length how much money the Government are throwing at the problems of deprivation, as if the mere spending of money is any advance in dealing with the problems. He had the cheek to do that although the Audit Commission has just condemned the profligate way in which the Manpower Services Commission has been spending some of the taxpayers' money, in the great propaganda exercise of merely throwing millions of pounds at problems without solving them.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was careful to say virtually nothing about the Labour party's approach to these problems. The alliance is bitterly disappointed at Labour's approach to the problem of mass unemployment, especially long-term unemployment, which is manifest. An all-party Select Committee, in two reports, unanimously said that to deal with long-term unemployment it is essential that the measures should be specifically targeted on the long-term unemployed. The Labour party shrinks from doing that. We can only speculate about the reasons for that—the pressures on it from outside the House. But it is a fact that when a draft Bill was carefully prepared to give effect to the recommendation of the Select Committee on Employment that measures should be specifically targeted on the long-term unemployed to give each a guarantee of 12 months' work, the Labour Front Bench attitude was distinctly cool and negative.

The alliance wholly supports, and has done in the House over recent months, the suggestion by the all-party Select Committee on Employment that every person who has been unemployed continuously for a long time should be offered a guarantee of a 12-month job or a serious training place. We regard with contempt the fact that the Paymaster General and his master the Secretary of State in the other place provide only one in five of the long-term unemployed with a place on all their highly expensive special schemes. How can that be justified when we have this appalling army of so many hundreds of thousands of people who have been continuously out of work, losing morale, skill, health and often hope?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman keeps pouring scorn on the expense of our programme. How can he equate that with the proposals that will be presented tomorrow by the alliance, that "We will make sure that public spending creates jobs through exports and investment"?

That is not the method that the hon. Gentleman described. The alliance proposes that "In the first year gross public spending would be increased by £4·9 billion".

What is that but throwing money at the problem?

Mr. Wainwright: Not at all. We are careful to point out that the net cost of our proposals would be relatively small because we would put people back into genuine jobs, where they would earn full wages. They would pay income tax and more VAT because their households would be able to purchase more, so they would begin to make a contribution to the economy.

I should like the Paymaster General to face up to the example of Sweden, where long-term unemployment virtually ceases to exist because anybody who is continuously out of work for more than 300 days is immediately offered either a job or a serious place on a long-term training scheme. I cannot for the life of me discover why the Government neglect to learn from countries that have found a better solution to the problems than they have.

One of the consequences of the two-nation approach is that there are neglected opportunities in the regions where unemployment is so high. As a contrast, let us consider people waiting for urgent hospital treatment—I stress urgent treatment; not elective surgery, but a condition in which the GP has said that the patient must have treatment as a matter of urgency. The congestion that the Government have created in the south-east is such that health authorities such as West Surrey and North-East Hampshire, Riverside in the North West Thames area, and West Lambeth all have a very high percentage of people needing urgent treatment who have been kept waiting more than one month. Indeed, nearly 90 per cent of those waiting for urgent treatment in those areas have been waiting for more than one month. However, in the areas of neglected opportunities, the areas in which the Government do so very little, beds are standing empty and there are easy opportunities for receiving immediate treatment. Early treatment for an urgent condition can be found in such places as Scarborough, the Wirral, Durham and Bolton.

If I may switch from health to transport, the Paymaster General was eloquent about the superb installation of motorways spurring off the M62. That is fine, but there are so few goods vehicles using those motorways. [Interruption.] I can assure the House that I am a frequent user of those motorways and I deplore the fact that they run through a desert at the moment, due to the recession.

It is the alliance plea that the splendid infrastructure which was provided by wiser Governments than this should be put to use, and proper use should be made of what the taxpayer has provided in the past.

I want briefly to consider the effect on earnings. Nowhere is the problem of the two nations more clearly demonstrated than in the stark contrast between the level of earnings in some parts of London, especially the City, and the depressed earnings only a mile or two away in what the London chamber of commerce has aptly described as the "huge crescent of deprivation" in parts of north, east and south London.

We cannot expect to have a united country if such disparities in income persist and grow worse by the week within a very few miles of each other. That is a recipe for dividing the country which would make wiser past leaders of the Conservative party pale with horror at seeing the country which they had worked so hard to unite being deliberately divided by misguided economic policies.

I believe that the alliance motion tonight is more than fully justified. I am sorry that it has been treated so flippantly by the Paymaster General. I hope at least that the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry will have some constructive comments to make on our proposals when he replies.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): We have heard a great deal about the divided nation, in particular the north-south divide, this evening and for many months. For someone like me, who before 1983 rarely ventured south of Derby, there are clearly divisions. In much of the south there is a bustle that is sadly missing from parts of the north—although not all of the north. There is a gap which must be closed. The question is how.

The Labour party has suggested that that gap can be closed through more Government spending, more town hall spending, more council houses, more strategic planning—in fact, a great deal more interference and a lot more Socialism. The alliance suggests more Government spending, more town hall spending, more infrastructure—the alliance does not like to talk about council houses any more—more regional planning as opposed to strategic planning; in fact a great deal more interference and, it would appear to Conservative Members, a great deal more Socialism as well.

Let us consider what made the north great in the first place; how northern Britain became the industrial workshop of the world. That was not planned from Westminster and we did not rely on Brighton, Bournemouth or Bristol.

Liverpool achieved greatness through the entrepreneurial spirit of the Liverpudlians; Manchester achieved greatness through the business acumen of the Mancunians; and Glasgow achieved it through the industry of Glaswegians. That greatness certainly did not come from municipal socialism—that had not been heard of in those days—and it did not occur through state charity. Throwing money at that problem is not the answer. Surely we have learnt the lesson of Liverpool, where more aid has been spent per head of population than anywhere else in the country. State charity is not the answer.

The north needs a return to the industrial ethos upon which its greatness was founded. First, we must ban all talk of the post-industrial society. Those words should be forgotten. No matter how smart the City of London is or how great the attractions of Britain are to the overseas tourist, we shall always depend on industry to pay for the things that we want and need. The Opposition, who glory in gloom, would have the world believe that the north is industrial dereliction. Far from it. Of course, areas which put all their eggs in one basket, such as shipbuilding, need Government support to set out their stall to attract new enterprise. But many areas have diversified and look forward to the future with confidence.

Stockport is a northern industrial town where unemployment is not just less than the regional average; it is less than the national average. We have many successful industrial firms. We have Ferranti Computers, supplying fine computers and radar systems, which was recently awarded a large contract by the Ministry of Defence. Williams Fairey Engineering does important work for the nuclear power industry and, incidentally, was this year's national brass band champions. United Biscuits is a large employer exporting favourites such as digestive biscuits, Penguins and jaffa cakes not only throughout Europe but the world. Simon is an engineering group employing 16,000 people worldwide whose shareholders recently followed the example of the shareholders of Pilkington and rejected an unwelcome takeover bid from a City consortium. As my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) said earlier, at British Aerospace in Woodford—also in Stockport—200 jobs have been created to produce the HS146. I remind the House that that company delivered the Nimrod AEW airframes on time. The failure of the south-east led to the cancellation of the Nimrod programme.

[Mr. Tony Favell]

Let us have no more talk of the northern industrial spirit being extinguished.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Is my hon. Friend aware of a report, published today, entitled, "It is not really like that", commissioned—perhaps surprisingly—by the BBC and written by a quasi-academic called Fred Robinson, which contrasts with the worthy remarks that my hon. Friend has just made and is a diatribe in despair and an exercise in uncontrollable pessimism without a single constructive suggestion? Does he agree that such a catalogue of gloom is exactly what we do not need if we are to attract investment, industry and jobs to the north and the other deprived regions? Instead, we should sell all the good points of those regions.

Mr. Favell: I can only think that this man is a Socialist. The Socialists of the north have done nothing but whinge and whine for the past 10 years and have repeatedly sold the north short.

We need a few things from the Government, and here is my shopping list. First, we need cheap energy. The Government have done much for coal, but they must not flinch from ensuring that we have our share of nuclear energy. Apart from anything else, British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. employs 16,000 people in the north, and last year the nuclear industry placed contracts worth £300 million with companies in the north-west.

Secondly, people must be made aware that if—God forbid—we had another Labour Government, trade union militancy would reawaken. Thanks to the Prime Minister, much has been done to restore industrial peace, but it could easily be lost. We have all seen what the militant trade unions did to the Liverpool docks, but things are much better now, even in Liverpool. Recently, I visited Ford's Halewood plant in Liverpool with the Stockport chamber of commerce. The plant manager told us that, five years ago, we would have had a hostile reception from the labour force, but now the reverse is the case. People came up to us and told us how much better industrial relations were and how proud they were of their product and of what was being achieved. At Halewood the workers are making a fine product at a keen price with a reputation for reliability. No wonder Ford is now our largest home car producer.

While we are on the subject of trade unions, could my right hon. and learned Friend please sort out the Civil Service unions? They are hogging the secretarial and clerical work in the south. Where is the justice, let alone the sense, in paying more for poorly-qualified typists in London when there are lots of lasses in the north who could do the job twice as well at greatly reduced cost? What has happened to the programme that was introduced in the 1970s to disperse the Civil Service to the regions? By now we should have 16,000 Civil Service jobs relocated to the regions but so far I think that we have no more than 6,000 dispersed.

Will the Government continue to put down the argument that there is something demeaning in training or retraining? To persuade an unskilled youngster to go on the dole rather than to train is irresponsible, if not wicked. Two years on, what chance has that young person at an interview if he is up against another youngster who has completed a two-year YTS?

Finally, and most important of all, will the Government take an axe to the crackpot councils of the Left? We cannot afford to leave it to chance or, for that matter, to the Leader of the Opposition. Nothing does more harm to the north than such councils in those Victorian town halls which were once monuments to hard work and success but are now citadels of Socialism and despair. That axe is the master key to the north-south divide.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the speediest way to resolve the problem to which he has rightly drawn attention is to introduce proportional representation in local government? That would ensure that extremism of the type that he mentions is wiped from the face of the map.

Mr. Favell: I shall give the answer in a moment, but it is certainly not proportional representation. Local government in these northern strongholds is no longer under the control of those who pay for it. That is the problem. Over half the house owners in Manchester receive housing benefit. What interest do they have in controlling town hall spending? Making people pay at least 20 per cent. of their rates will help, but that is not enough. We need people to pay 100 per cent. of their rates, and then we must adjust welfare benefits to reflect the national average of the cost of local government.

There is no point in local government knowing that its voters will be reimbursed for the whole of local government overspending. It would bring the Militant chickens home to roost if they were answerable to the whole of their electorate and not just to a part of it. Some local authorities would not then spend money on equal opportunity officers for lesbians, guides for children on how to deal with the police, and the setting up of nuclear-free zones, as is happening in Manchester. What sort of image of that once proud city does that present to the world? Who will rush to invest in a place that indulges in nonsense like that?

The good, sound sense of the northerners has not deserted them, but they need help to rid themselves of Left-wing extremists who, with their high-rating policy, have done so much to knock the stuffing out of industry, and who paint such a poor picture of what for me is the best place in the world. My constituency is the neighbour of Manchester but is free of Marxist domination. In my constituency young couples can buy a two-bedroom terrace house in a nice district for £17,000 or £18,000, yet their rates are two thirds of the rates charged in neighbouring Manchester, where it takes twice as many people to empty the dustbins.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Before the hon. Gentleman finishes his speech, will he comment on the speech made by the president of Manchester chamber of commerce who said about local government, "We in the business community are making a far better job of partnership with local government than Westminster seems to be able to do"?

Mr. Favell: The president of Manchester chamber of commerce should be ashamed of himself. I agree entirely with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the Prime Minister who gave the president of that chamber a real trouncing following that speech—which was what he deserved.

Every Friday I cannot wait to get back to the north, with its friendly people, its humour, its sport, its open countryside, its great musical tradition and, of course, its beer. With a little help to rid ourselves of the Marxists, the militants and the Trotskyists, once again we will be the envy of the overcrowded, overwrought, over-priced south.

9.30 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell).

Traditionally, this debate is about the north-south divide. I wonder how many people realise that the gross domestic product for a person in Cheshire is higher than it is for someone in Kent or Hampshire; that unemployment in our northernmost English constituency —Berwick—is lower than the national average; that it is lower in Halifax than it is in Hastings; that in northern industrial Barrow-in-Furness it is lower than in soft and privileged Brighton; and that in Northampton itself, unemployment is lower than it is in Southampton. More sophisticated attenders to this debate say that it is now an east-west divide, but if they look across at the growing prosperity in south Wales they will feel that that is wrong also.

On closer analysis, the problems of poverty, the material, economic and social problems in this country, are worse where Socialism is strongest. The paradox is that, where there are Socialist councils, there are higher levels of local expenditure and that where there are higher levels of local expenditure there are higher levels of unemployment and higher levels of crime.

There is a simple connection between Socialism and deprivation. Where Socialism is rampant, business confidence is low. I understand that the Leader of the Opposition is trying to do something about the loony Left. Why does he not do something about it where his own home is and there the council intends to raise his rates by £21 a week? In those three London boroughs that changed hands at the last local elections, business ratepayers face an increase in business rates of about 60 per cent. How are they supposed to provide jobs in those circumstances?

Behind this motion are implications that we should have a regional policy, more regional expenditure. The implications are that the problems are in the distant provinces — but that is not the case at all. We need analysis before we can come to a solution.

The major economic problems are in London, in our capital city. Six of the 14 constituencies with the highest levels of unemployment are in London—Bethnal Green, Hackney, South and North, Peckham, Bermondsey and Vauxhall. The average in those constituencies is that a third of the men are unemployed and drawing benefit. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Scandalous."] Yes, and I will tell the hon. Gentleman why it is scandalous. I draw his attention to the definitive Audit Commission report on London and the problems of Socialism. It sets out eight rotten boroughs in London controlled by the new Left, the shock troops of Socialism, the pioneers of perverted politics, run by the clones of those who, after the next election, will form the majority of the parliamentary Labour party, small though it may be in this House.

That report compares those eight rotten boroughs with eight similar boroughs controlled by less lunatic Socialists and leavened with three Conservative councils with similar profiles and problems. Within London, compared with the control boroughs, those rotten boroughs spend 50 per cent. more per head of the population—£7 per week per household. They employ 35 per cent. more staff. Between 1980 and 1986, their central staff increased by 18 per cent., while others went down by 14 per cent. Staff vacancies —a measure of an efficient, well-run organisation—are three times as great in the rotten boroughs. All this and inferior services—Socialism in action.

Comparing the rotten boroughs with the metropolitan authorities, the cost per child in care is over twice as great. The cost of local authority services is three times as great. The management cost per dwelling is twice as great. The arrears of rent are three times as great. One in five rents are not paid in those inner London areas. They are concerned about homelessness, yet it takes them twice as long to relet their houses as it takes anybody else. Those are shocking statistics.

In Brent in the last three years, over three quarters of the senior staff have left their posts. Eight pounds in every £100 of inner London rates is uncollected. While the real costs of local government over the last three years have decreased, in the rotten boroughs they have risen by 20 per cent. London is prosperous, yet in these Socialist areas there are massive problems.

As for unemployment, after massive expenditure on education, ILEA spends almost twice the national average, yet side by side with wealth and job opportunities. Why? In some part, the devastation is caused by the effects of Socialism on business and commerce, but that is not the whole story. If one sows the seeds of Socialism, if one heavily fertilises the ground with public money, if one waters it with publicly financed propaganda, a crop will grow—a crop of grudge and dependence.

If we set up a race relations industry and make people feel that they are discriminated against, they will feel racially discriminated against. If we set up anti-police committees to tell people that the police are against them, they will be anti-police and crime will rise. If people are told that they are entitled to certain standards whatever their own efforts, endeavours and abilities, we will bring dissatisfaction and grudge.

We all recognise in our constituencies the neighbouring households as we go canvassing. One is spruce and immaculate and another dingy and in disrepair. The one is welcoming and the other disgruntled. As often as not, the second household has been infected by Socialism.

There is a musical in London called "Les Miserables", a line of which runs:

"At the end of the day you get nothing for nothing."

[Mr. Tony Marlow]

The tragedy is that Socialism preaches that one can have paradise without effort and that if one is not provided for, it is someone else's fault. Socialism breeds dependence. It tells people to sit on their backsides and complain. The tragedy is that we do not have a north-south divide. Many of our people's lives are destroyed because, in this Conservative country, they are living under the yoke of Socialism. I tell my hon. Friends, with the local elections coming up, they should get that message across loud and clear because our people depend on us.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The speech of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) was another rendition of Marlow's theorem of the correlation between Socialism and deprivation, but I suggest that Conservatism and neglect also go hand in hand. The hon. Gentleman has not contributed to the debate.

No Conservative Member has said what should be done about the problem. The Paymaster General, probably wisely, did not refer to the Government amendment. He probably felt embarrassed reading out as his introduction to a debate on deprivation. He would not want us to draw attention to the fact that manufacturing output is 4 per cent. below what it was when the Government came to power.

"that the United Kingdom has benefited from six years of uninterrupted growth"

We hear from Conservative Members a repetition of selective statistics which ignore the problem. The Paymaster General, I suspect deliberately, misunderstood the alliance stance. He suggested that we want to return to old-style regional policy. We want nothing of the kind. We believe that there is a need to recognise the problems. That is our first obstacle with the Government — they refuse to acknowledge the seriousness of the problem.

I shall not quote the unemployment figures, as we all know them, but I should like to pick out a few other statistics which demonstrate the scale of the problem. In the south-east, there have been 20 manufacturing job redundancies per thousand. The equivalent figures for the north and Scotland are 69 and 58 respectively. For all sectors, there have been eight jobs per thousand lost in the south-east, 28 in the north and 21 in Scotland. That is a serious discrepancy.

My hon. Friends the Members for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) and for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) mentioned house prices. The average house price in Yorkshire and Humberside, at £25,989, should be compared with the average in Greater London of £57,816. That too shows a serious discrepancy.

Since 1976, defaults and arrears among private home buyers have increased eight times and the number of homeless people has gone up to more than 100,000. That is an indictment of the Government, but they do not acknowledge the deprivation.

The Cambridge university department of land economy has estimated that, out of the 900,000 jobs that are likely to be created in the private sector during the next 10 years, at least 420,000 will be in the south-east of England. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) referred to the fact that the forecast population in Scotland will drop below 5 million by the end of the century, while the population of the southern half of England will increase by 1·5 million.

The Government's remedy, as articulated by the Paymaster General, is that people should move out and accept lower pay. The first problem with that is that the Paymaster General is talking nonsense about the disparity in wage rates. Anybody who considers the figures knows that the reality is that average earnings in the regions and provinces are lower than in the south-east. In Greater London, for example, average earnings for men are £255 a week, compared with £191 in the east midlands and £193 in the south-west.

The differences in house prices, land costs and wages exist, but all that has happened is that London is still sucking in the talent, while the regions are failing to cope with the problem. The selective statistics given by various hon. Members representing constituencies in the north of England do not disprove that point.

We also acknowledge that, within the broad division between London and the south-east and the rest of the country, there are divisions within each region. We can all list areas of low unemployment in the north and of high unemployment in the south. In London there is a clearly identified crescent of deprivation. Within walking distance of the Bank of England, for example, are the boroughs of Tower Hamlets, Islington and Southwark, including Bermondsey, which have between 25 and 30 per cent. unemployment.

The analysis of those real problems shows that London and the south-east are creating jobs and sucking the brightest and best talents out of Scotland, Wales and the regions, but that they are failing to provide the jobs that the local people of London need. The Government are totally failing and refusing to address that problem.

The United Kingdom needs to get away from its one-centre economy and the black hole down which the city of London sucks everything, because of which other parts of the country simply cannot get the backing and the resources that they need to focus on their own enterprise.

Why can companies such as NCR, formerly National Cash Register, operate its worldwide headquarters from Dayton, Ohio, Wang computers from Lowell, Massachusetts, and cities such as Houston and Dallas, and Alburquerque in New Mexico experience the growth of corporate headquarters, whereas in this country the idea of establishing corporate headquarters in Aberdeen, Newcastle, Cardiff or Manchester is regarded as being off the map and out of touch? That is the sort of attitude that we must get away from. The attitude of our American competitors is the one that we need.

The Government simply sit back and say that they are prepared to let the market operate in the way in which it does and that if they were re-elected and continued their policies, the problem would somehow resolve itself. The answer is that it most certainly will not. The Paymaster General and, to the extent that he spoke about policy, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East seemed to imply that central direction was the right answer. The Paymaster General stated that central Government would decide what was good for people in the regions and for investment outside, or indeed inside, London. The excuse given by Conservative Members was a catalogue of attack on Left-wing Socialist authorities. I agree with Conservative Members that Left-wing Socialist local authorities drive out enterprise and cannot face up to the problems. However, we in the alliance are prepared to do something about it and to reform the system so that those people cannot get control.

Mr. Favell rose——

Mr. Bruce: No, I shall not give way. I do not have the time.

The Paymaster General and the Government are not prepared to introduce the necessary reforms — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bruce: I am sorry that I cannot give way to the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell), but I have very little time.

We in the alliance are prepared to face up to those problems because we believe in the people of this country; we believe that the people of Newcastle, Manchester and Bristol, as well as of the rural areas, are capable of making their own decisions and that they better know what they can do in their own areas, if they are given the backing, resources and freedom to make their own decisions. That is something that the big brothers in the Labour and Conservative parties will not allow them to do.

We propose the establishment of regional development agencies to make the decisions that are at present being made by central Government. [AN HON. MEMBER: "In the south-east?"] Certainly in the south-east. All regions should have an opportunity to focus their enterprise and to back their decisions, rather than have Whitehall telling them what is good for them. I find it extraordinary that Conservative Members say that the system is unworkable. It has helped other countries to be more successful. We are not talking simply about moving jobs and wealth, but saying that if we adopt this system, we shall help to stimulate more growth, enterprise and jobs — the sum total will be greater for the whole of the United Kingdom. There is plenty of evidence to show that that can be the case.

Recently, the Financial Times carried a review of regional development and venture capital. It pointed out that, too often, enterprises in the regions did not receive backing because no one in the City has enough local knowledge to give them backing. If we had people on the ground with that knowledge who could draw the funds and back the enterprises, we could get a great deal more for the United Kingdom. There is evidence to support that in the operation of enterprise agencies and regional development corporations. More should be done to back such enterprises and to ensure the development of new opportunities in the regions.

We agree with the Government that small businesses and the self-employed have been an important source of new employment; although the figures are not clear, we believe that they will be important in future. However, we question whether the enterprise allowance scheme is the best way of ensuring that. There is no check on how many schemes survive and on the extent to which they draw from others. We need agencies to follow those matters through. We notice that the lion's share of the BES is going to the south-east. Clearly, regions do not receive their share of the finance available.

When the Government choose to attack the alliance, they would do well to consider that, after seven years, the Government have reached a plateau of 3 million unemployed plus 1 million people on the type of schemes that they greatly disparaged at the start of their period in office. There is no sign that they have any strategy for reducing that total figure or for ensuring that deprived areas have resources and backing to deal with their problems.

Tonight we heard precious little from the Labour party, despite the 28-minute speech from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. One and a half minutes of that one speech from the Labour party related to Labour's policy, but that was probably one and a half minutes too long. Neither of the hon. Members who are apparently co-ordinating the policy has yet managed to agree on what it is and we are not sure whether there will be a strategy. Clearly, the argument within the Labour party is about which state sector should provide the jobs.

We in the alliance are prepared to back enterprise and we recognise that development corporations and enterprise agencies have a significant role to play. However, we are also prepared to recognise the discrepancy that exists, not just between different regions and nations, but within them. That is why we propose, first, to give a job guarantee to the long-term unemployed; and, secondly, to provide a selective cut in employers' national insurance charge for unemployment black spots and travel-to-work areas and to provide in those same areas incentives for recruitment of the long-term unemployed. Those specific measures would help to tackle the imbalance and we commend them to the Government.

The Government will live to rue the day when they decided not to trust people on the ground in their communities to make decisions which affect their enterprise. The Government have chosen to pull power to the centre and to set up central Government agencies to determine centrally who should get what.

I should have thought that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) might have been present. In our last debate on this issue, he made an extraordinary proposal, which boiled down to the establishment of a series of regional district commissioners on the old Indian imperial model, who were to be appointed by central Government. Though his book sales may be great, he is not prepared to get to grips with the problem, any more than any other member of the Conservative party.

I commend the alliance motion to the House. The other two parties have shown themselves shamefully out of touch with the problems of the regions in terms not only of their analysis but of their solution. The people know that they have to look elsewhere for a solution. They cannot trust the Labour party, and the Government have said that they have no policy.

9.50 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Giles Shaw): I hope that the alliance has enjoyed the second of the two debates that it has elected to have today. It is appropriate that it should be discussing an issue which, as we have seen it unfold over the past couple of hours, has shown the great fragmentation in the alliance. It is appropriate for a fissiparous group such as the alliance that it should have selected this debate. No discussion about regional policy is free from the claims for special attention for this or that region or problem, for this or that reason. In most speeches there was an understandable special pleading.

[Mr. Giles Shaw]

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) drew attention to the important disparities between affluence and unemployment, between major cities and decline, and so on. His proposals and the motion show that the alliance would like to see development agencies set up in each of the regions. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) also referred to that. Development agencies are one of the points that have been widely debated.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House would be wise to contemplate what a development agency is. It is not, as suggested by the hon. Member for Gordon, a coming together of individuals in the region concerned to try to preside over a development policy of their own. A development agency is set up under an Act and has central Government power, taking away much of the development arrangements in the regions. It meets entirely on its own, without any particular regional element. It is an agent of Government and operates in that way in the Scottish Office under the aegis of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, and in the Welsh Office under the aegis of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. That is what gives development agencies their power and prestige abroad. To suggest that all 334 travel-to-work areas or other regions should operate on a statutorily based system is a recipe for chaos and confusion, and the alliance must recongise that before it does anything else.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), in his substantial address to relatively few shareholders, spoke about what the Labour party would like to do. Clearly, he was convinced that the main problem was dealing with manufacturing investment. He made special reference to the ERDF proposals in Brussels, in which he is well versed. He has read the 17 volumes and knows all about them. He will recognise that, with his remarks about Merseyside and Manchester, he was quoting the words of the Labour councillors for Manchester and the Labour, or not-so-Labour, councillors of Liverpool. That provides him with a reasonable opportunity to say that the Government are talking with forked tongue. He knows that the Government have to assemble, collate and present, or none of the proposals would be allowed to get ERDF funds.

Mr. Gordon Brown rose——

Mr. Shaw: I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman spoke for 28 minutes.

The important feature of our debate since then was the eloquent testimony of my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), who rightly showed what can be done when a region gets assistance through urban development corporations and structures to enable the regeneration of industrial activity. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell), in his brief speech, rightly called for something positive, such as cheap energy supply, and he will no doubt be delighted with the CEGB's recent reduction by 6 per cent. of its tariff to bulk users. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) correctly put the whole problem into perspective. Where Socialism has been rampant, one will not find much chance of industrial energy and development or enterprise. [Interruption.] If that is the case, the hon. Gentleman probably has a cure for the ills of regional disparity.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) surprised me. He was clearly confused about the values of infrastructure. On the one hand, he took to task the Humber bridge. I can understand that, because I well remember Mrs. Barbara Castle making a rash promise in the midst of a by-election at Kingston upon Hull, North, and the Humber bridge duly appeared. The hon. Gentleman took to task the Kielder dam which, as he should have known, was primarily developed to secure opportunities for industrial development in Teeside and Tyneside, admittedly at a time when the oil price had not collapsed and when the plastics and chemical industries were at a high degree of employment. The concept was right—to serve the regional dependence on high water-using industry.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley was worried about motorways. Clearly he has not been on the M62 recently. Perhaps, since he is retiring at the next election, he does not use the M62 very much, and need not worry about the lorries. However, those of us who do are a bit choked up by what we find on the M62.

The central issue, turning back to manufacturing investment—which the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East raised—is the economic activity of the country. If the Government pursue policies which create economic activity and which believe in growth and enterprise, the consequences will steadily improve. Following the traumatic years of decline, after 1973 we had structural decline and rampant inflation. The lack of competitiveness of British industry and its products was pricing them out of markets worldwide and there was a substantial area of structural decline.

That has changed since 1983. Manufacturing investment has risen in real terms on average by more than 20 per cent. In the regions manufacturing investment has risen by 28 per cent. in the north—that includes the north-east, north-west, Yorkshire and Humberside—in Wales by 28 per cent., the west midlands by 35 per cent., the east midlands by 18 per cent. and by 22 per cent in Scotland. Since 1983, we have seen a substantial increase in manufacturing investment. That has happened as a result of the Government's determination to ensure that the economy is receptive to industrial growth and development. Manufacturers and investors are looking for a stable economic policy and a Conservative Government who will provide policies that are conducive to industrial development and growth, and to see that the policies of previous Labour Governments have been swept away with all the central intervention, controls, restraints on capital and, above all, diktat by trade unions, which determined, more or less, what wage rates would be in the light of the threat of major industrial disruption.

The investment climate today is infinitely better for regions to benefit from the economy. I accept that it is slow and that there has not been a sufficient replacement of structural industries—shipbuilding, steel, coal or many of the other aspects of heavy engineering which have been centred in some of our regions. The Government are determined to speed up that process. It is because we have restricted development areas and assisted areas of the regions in the greatest need, and because the percentage of the work force being covered in the north is now 70 per cent. of people who live in assisted areas, that regional policy is beginning to work.

We have, by changing the policy from capital-based to job-based, made a significant difference to its effectiveness. That is the way in which we must ensure that regional policy develops. It will be slow, but it will be steady. Ultimately, that depends on having an economy which responds to the needs of industry and provides a stable context in which there can be growth without inflation, encouragement to develop, wages which are determined by market rates and consumer satisfaction based on the quality and competitiveness of British products.

If we are able to achieve that—we shall do that by a third term in government—we will have demonstrated beyond doubt that the only thing that stands between regional disadvantage and the nation is a Conservative Government who are dedicated to making Britain great again.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Question on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes that the United Kingdom has benefited from six years of uninterrupted growth; that over the last six months United Kingdom unemployment has fallen by 100,000; that employment has increased substantially since 1983; and that vacancies are at their highest level this decade; commends the efforts of the Government to develop a modern economy which is offering new types of opportunity; recognises in particular its work in launching the most extensive training programme in the country's history, and welcomes its commitment to the regions, underlined by carefully targeted investment and assistance; and further calls on the Government to continue with its present policy of seeking to spread throughout the country the economic conditions that bring prosperity and jobs.

Representation of the People

10.11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I beg to move,

That the draft Parliamentary Constituencies (England) (Miscellaneous Changes) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 23rd February, be approved.

This draft Order in Council gives effect to the final recommendations of the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England following an interim review of 40 parliamentary constituencies in England. If the draft is approved by both Houses, it will be submitted to Her Majesty in Council for promulgation.

I turn to the form of the order. Articles 2 to 12 substitute the constituencies in the schedule for the constituencies that presently exist. Article 1(3) provides for the order to come into force 14 days after it is made. The changes to the constituencies will take effect at the next general election. Any by-elections in the meantime will be held on the existing boundaries.

The review which gave rise to the draft order was the third interim review to be conducted by the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England since it completed its general review of constituencies in 1983. Since that general review there have been a number of changes to local government boundaries which have resulted in the county, district or ward boundaries following a different line from the constituency boundary. The commission decided therefore to conduct a number of interim reviews to remove these anomalies.

Though the House is considering 40 constituencies, the commission reviewed 42. When the proposals were published in September 1986 there were objections to the proposals for the constituencies of Reading, East and Wokingham. These have been the subject of an inquiry and will feature in a separate report. With two other exceptions the remaining proposals did not attract any opposition. The exceptions were two objections to the proposals for Warrington, South and Halton, which were subsequently withdrawn. The commission therefore decided to confirm its draft proposals as its final proposals, and these are given effect in the order. In all instances the changes proposed are the minimum necessary to realign the constituency boundary with the altered local government boundary.

One measure of the extent of the changes effected by the proposals is the number of electors involved. The largest number of electors affected is nearly 4,000, who will move from Horsham to Crawley. Other relatively large-scale changes are the transfer of about 1,300 voters from Arundel to Shoreham, and around 1,900 voters from Warrington, South to Halton. The remaining changes affect between one and 400 electors. In some instances, including my own constituency of Grantham, no elector is affected directly. I hope that the House will approve the order.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I thank the Minister for the brisk and informative way in which he dealt with the substance of the order. Perhaps the House would permit me to say that I have a special interest in the order because it includes the Hertfordshire, West constituency. When I had the honour to become the first Labour Member of Parliament for the former Hemel Hempstead constituency, which is part of the Hertfordshire, West constituency, I wrote on occasion to the boundary commissioners urging upon them the sense of changing the name of the constituency to Hertfordshire, West. It was not until I came second, which is not as much fun as coming first, that the boundaries were altered and the commissioners saw the good sense of the proposal. I am sure that it was right because it was quite wrong, even in those days, to impose the name of the new town of Hemel Hempstead upon the small towns and villages which helped to make up part of the constituency.

I could, but I will not, wax lyrical about my fond memories of Aldbury and Wigginton, Ashridge and Cupid Green — there is many a story or poem in that — as wards of the Hertfordshire, West constituency. However, I shall content myself by agreeing with the Minister that the changes that the Boundary Commission has come up with, as far as I am aware, make sense because, as best as the commission is able, it is right that the boundaries of the local authority should be contiguous with the boundaries of the parliamentary constituency.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): I should like to direct my remarks to part IX of the order, particularly to the constituencies of Mid-Bedfordshire and South-West Bedfordshire. These two constituencies border my constituency of Milton Keynes, and my constituents are unanimous in their admiration of the way in which the Members of Parliament for those two constituencies conduct themselves in dealing with the interests of their constituents. They are also impressed by the speed with which the Boundary Commission has dealt with the particular changes.

My constituency is the fastest growing in the United Kingdom. In the 1983 election it had just over 70,000 electors and it now has 98,000, an increase per annum of 5,000. I remind my hon. Friend that when the last division of the constituencies took place the base year was 1976, and the final answer was brought in in 1982. If those circumstances continue in the future I shall be representing 150,000 constituents before the next division takes place. I do not worry about that but my constituents ask me whether there is something wrong with the procedure that we adopt in revising constituencies, or whether Members of Parliament should be paid proportionate to the amount of people they represent. There would be no increase in Government expenditure because it would be an average, some of us would get more and some less.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): I simply want to welcome the order because it brings local government boundaries and the parliamentary constituencies into line. In the case of the boundary between Hertfordshire, West and Hertfordshire, South West, the electors in the portion due to be transferred have, for the past two years, been transferred for local authority reasons but not for parliamentary reasons. It has been thoroughly confusing to them at election time and when writing to their councillor or Member of Parliament.

Although the delays have been brief in some ways, despite the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon), it seems curious that the changes can come into effect for local government purposes in April 1985 but two years later for parliamentary purposes. I wonder whether the Minister can look into that to see whether there is any way in which procedures can be speeded up. I welcome the nearly 200 extra constituents who will come into Hertfordshire, West because they will enjoy, in common with the other people of that area represented in the past by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), a sense of community and of pride in the area's achievements, economic and cultural.

I realise that my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes was a sympathiser for proportional representation, but I always thought that that was to do with the way that people vote. Now that I know that it is to do with the way that Members of Parliament should be paid, I am sure that there will be a rising tide in favour of proportional representation in the future.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I support the principle of the order because it is right that, wherever possible, when there is a minimal change in a district or borough boundary, the parliamentary constituency boundaries should be changed so that they are conterminous with that boundary.

Like the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones), I am concerned about the delays in the changes that sometimes occur. I have a vested interest in changes that do not come under this order. I hope that the Minister will say what other orders will come before us, which will take similar action to deal with similar situations. For example, there are some changes in the county of Lancashire, and my borough is affected. I hope that that order will be put before the House before the general election. If not, during the next Parliament I would represent a small number of people living in a different borough from the other 99 per cent. It is easier for the people if they know that the boundary is the same for the parliamentary constituency as for the borough. Thus confusion can be avoided.

While I support the proposal, I hope that the Minister will give us an idea of when the expects to lay further orders before the House.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I lend my support to that of other hon. Members who have spoken in this short debate for the proposal that is before the House, but I should like to follow what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) and invite the Home Office Minister to respond to what he said and what I should like to add.

A report from the Select Committee on Home Affairs on the redistribution of seats has been laid before the House. It would be for the benefit of all of us if, instead of debating late at night these small and straightforward orders, we had the opportunity to discuss the much more important issues of how to overcome the problems of great inconsistencies between the sizes of constituencies. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, I have a constituency that is growing extremely rapidly. While none of my constituents has, as yet, offered me the option of extra pay to deal with the extra problems—nor would I want to accept it—they are being under-represented in the county of Wiltshire, and other counties such as Hampshire are similarly affected.

The Select Committee came forward with some thoughts but no recommendations. If it were given the opportunity, the House would like to follow those thoughts and perhaps add some recommendations of its own. I therefore ask my hon. Friend the Minister to respond to that point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Not tonight.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I want to thank the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and my hon. Friends for the support that they have given to the draft order. With regard to delays, the review into the boundary recommendations that we are considering tonight was announced in February 1986. As you will see Mr. Deputy Speaker, it has taken about a year to get to this final stage.

The hon. Member for Burnley asked what other reviews are being undertaken. On 23 December last year the Boundary Commission for England gave notice of its intention to review 55 parliamentary constituencies and the Welsh commission gave notice of its intention to review 21 constituencies in February 1986. A number of inquiries are currently being undertaken.

You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, said that it would not be right for me to comment on a possible response to the Select Committee on Home Affairs report. However, might I say that it was a very valuable report and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary would wish to make a response in the near future.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Parliamentary Constituencies (England) (Miscellaneous Changes) Order 1987, which was laid before the House on 23rd February, be approved.

Grammar Schools (Warwickshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

10.26 pm

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): It might be helpful if I mention that my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) will be using some of my time to make a contribution to this debate. I have previously advised my hon. Friend the Minister, who is to reply, of that fact.

I am concerned about the future of grammar schools in Warwickshire, and specifically in Rugby. It will help my hon. Friend the Minister if I tell him that the Labour and alliance-controlled Warwickshire county council has set up a working party to examine secondary education in the eastern and southern areas of Warwickshire. My hon. Friend will recall that it is now official Opposition and alliance policy to phase out grammar schools and it is certainly the intention of the Labour party to phase out grammar schools within two years.

I put it to my hon. Friend that that does not augur well for a fair decision in Warwickshire based on an impartial assessment of the facts presented to the working party. My hon. Friend will recall that Mrs. Shirley Williams, in the days when she was known as "Shirl the pearl," was responsible for the infamous Education Act 1976 which sought to destroy the grammar schools. That lady has now moved to another party, but it is significant that she has taken her philosophy with her and that the Labour party and the alliance remain committed to the destruction of the grammar schools. I find it most disappointing that those two parties are now hell-bent on destroying part of Britain's heritage.

You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there are about 150 grammar schools in England and Wales. They cater for about 100,000 pupils. The quality of education in those schools is frequently not equalled elsewhere. It is particularly interesting to reflect on the fact that in philosophies as divergent as China and Germany, in France and the United States, selective education has been retained.

I want now to turn to Warwickshire and specifically Rugby. In the mid-1970s, the then area education officer in Rugby surveyed parents, seeking their opinion on the desirability of change. About 65 per cent. of parents then expressed the view that the present system of grammar and high schools should be maintained. I am unaware of any major change in public opinion since that survey was carried out. The only change of which I am aware is in the political control of Shire hall at Warwick.

The driving force, therefore, for change in Rugby's secondary schools is not educational; it is blatently political, and that is a poor reason for destroying proven schools.

In that connection, my hon. Friend will have noticed an early-day motion which states:

"That this House calls upon Her Majesty's Government to take fully into account the strength of local support for grammar schools when any proposals for their abolition are submitted; recognises their influence on educational standards; and recalls that the much praised education system in Germany consists of the equivalent of grammar, technical and secondary modern schools."

So far, more than 60 hon. Members have signed that early-day motion.

In a speech in his constituency on 7 December 1985, my hon. Friend the Minister—the speech makes excellent reading—said:

"In an article by Professor Anthony Flew, New Society, 17th November 1983, we can see quite clearly that, measured in terms of university entrants, working class children are actually worse off under the comprehensive system than they were under the old selective system, and worse off even than they were in the 1920s."

Again, I quote from the same excellent speech:

"The National Council for Education Standards concludes from their study of the 1981 and 1982 results that better examination results are associated with the selective system of schools, whether it be a fully selective system of grammar and secondary moderns, or a mixture of selective and comprehensive schools . . . The proportion of school leavers achieving 5 or more 'O' levels and one or more 'A' levels in England rose during the 1950s and the 1960s, but then levelled off and only in the last few years has risen slowly again. But if I look more closely still, I find that it is the results of the independent schools that brought about that rising pattern."

The Minister's comments and the NCES findings are borne out by the figures from the Warwickshire county council. It is significant, if we compare the percentage of pupils obtaining five higher grade results at O-level in each of the four education areas of Warwickshire from 1979 to 1985, that the eastern and southern areas come out best. Those are the areas which have maintained selective education. That is not a coincidence. I must stress that those are overall figures which include all secondary education in each of the areas. The inescapable conclusion is that, using examination results as a bench-mark, the present system benefits more pupils than does a single comprehensive system.

It has been suggested that the difference in examination results between Rugby and, for example, the central area of Warwickshire is caused by the fact that more pupils in Rugby are entered for examinations. If that is the case, it suggests that children in Rugby, with its combination of high schools and grammar schools, have better education and examination opportunities than those in the neighbouring comprehensive system.

That is not an argument for change. The majority of parents have confidence in the present schools. Parents know that grammar schools provide a ladder of opportunity for those from less well-off backgrounds. In addition, in the high schools of the eastern area, there is a safety net that ensures that pupils can transfer at the age of 16 to grammar schools or to the college of further education to take their A-levels. A clear safety net exists which enables pupils to leave the high schools and to take A-levels.

It is extraordinary that, at a time of some financial constraint, Warwickshire county council can contemplate such a major change for so little reason. If funding is available, it should be used to improve existing schools for the benefit of our children.

It is sometimes argued that there are good social engineering reasons for introducing comprehensive education. Social engineering does not rate highly on the lists or agendas of most parents, and in any case the social mix which occurs within a grammar school is one of the keys to its success. That must be contrasted with the situation in many areas where parents vote with their feet and decide to move to make sure that their children are within the catchment area of a comprehensive school considered to be better than its neighbours. That seems to be a social engineering at its worst.

[Mr. J. F. Pawsey]

The Coventry Evening Telegraph is one of our excellent local newspapers. In this evening's issue there is a report of a visit by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government to Stratford-on-Avon. The report says:

"Dr. Boyson said people from many backgrounds had gone through grammar schools.

Not only is the grammar school serving them but it's also serving the community.

People had the opportunity to come through to the highest standards".

That is the opinion of my hon. Friend and I certainly subscribe to that view. I suspect that my hon. Friends the Members for Stratford-on-Avon and for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) also subscribe to that opinion. It is important, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will give clear weight to it when he replies to the debate.

I should now like to draw attention to a significant local publication. The fact that it came out only once should not reduce its importance. The publication, "Rugby Labour Herald", is dated January 1983. I suspect that this is both a first and last edition. There might be some significance in its date, because at that time the Labour party was in opposition on Warwickshire county council. Now it is in an unholy alliance with the SDP and the Liberals and is in control. The headline in that publication is "Education —what a mess!", and it reads:

"Proposals to phase out the grammar stream provision at Dunsmore and to close Fareham will not only mop up the surplus places, but will lower standards and cut options."

It seems that at least in 1983 the Labour party was equating the phasing out of a grammar stream with a lowering of standards. Clearly, that is different from the dogma that is currently being preached, not just in Warwickshire but in the rest of the country.

I should now like to quote from the National Education Association newsletter. Under the heading, "Views of a young member," it says:

"For the past three years I have been an active member of the Labour Party (and the Socialist Education Association). While my interest in education has increased over this period, so has my disillusion with the Labour party's attitude to the subject. This year I have not rejoined, partly as a result of the local Party's education policy, which you may find interesting. I am not opposed to all the comprehensives and 6th Form colleges—we already have comprehensives and a non-advanced further education college on the Wirral which cater for particular needs, and appear to do so adequately. But I am strongly opposed (like a majority of people in the affected area) to the abolition of all school sixth forms, coupled with an end to selection in an area where (i) people want it (ii) it works well, proved not least by examination results. Furthermore, as an active member at all levels in the Labour Party, it is clear to me that the decisions have been reached on purely political grounds, with little consideration for standards. The local Labour Party is experimenting with the futures of children for the sake of ideology!"

One cannot help but believe that that young Socialist member speaks with the voice of experience, and I cannot help but agree with what he says. Change for the sake of change should be rejected.

I speak principally as a consumer of education. I have six sons, five of whom were educated at one of our grammar schools. I am familiar with both the excellence and the quality of education at Lawrence Sheriff school. I am anxious that other boys should benefit from that school, as mine have, and I oppose the wilful destruction of proven schools for doctrinaire reasons. I maintain that change for no other reason than political dogma is wrong.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) has a passionate concern for education standards which is as well known in Warwickshire as it is in the House. We should be grateful to him for introducing tonight's debate.

As my hon. Friend said, the threat to the future of grammar schools in Warwickshire is the product of ideological prejudice on the part of the Labour, Liberal and SDP parties in Warwickshire. My hon. Friend demonstrated that ideological attitude of the Labour party. But the Liberal party is also in this up to the eyeballs. The commitment to abolish selective education was in its manifesto for the last county council elections. Since then the Liberals have held the balance of power in Warwickshire. The schemes are being advanced against that political background. The Liberal spokesman is on record in last week's edition of the Evesham Journal as saying that the alliance is set to support the comprehensive scheme. That is of a piece with its faddish and ideologically prejudiced approach to education which can be seen in a range of ways.

We have witnessed the introduction of peace studies, the appointment of racism awareness advisers and now the movement towards the abolition of selective education in Warwickshire. This makes no sense. It certainly cannot be justified by an argument about falling school rolls. School rolls are falling in Warwickshire and all who are concerned about the education of children in Warwickshire recognise that there must be a constructive response. However, the comprehensive scheme proposed by the Labour/alliance coalition would result in comprehensive schools which are so small that, by reference to their own theory, the protagonists of the comprehensive system must find them inadequate. The argument about falling school roles certainly cannot apply in Stratford-upon-Avon where the population is growing.

If the Labour and alliance parties have their way, we shall have a botched-up scheme. Existing buildings will be adapted to unsuitable purposes, split-site schools will be introduced and schools will be split by arbitrary choice in terms of age range. It is not clear whether we shall have 11 to 16 federations with a separate sixth form, or whether we shall have a middle school where children who arrive at the age of 11 years, having established themselves, are expected to move to other premises at 13 years of age.

Whatever the variety of botch, it is certain that the cost will be massive. The ratepayers of Warwickshire are well disposed to paying to improve existing schools. They favour spending money to get rid of temporary classrooms and to ensure that there are enough books and equipment. There are some valid objects for expenditure in Warwickshire, but the ratepayers are not in the least interested in subsidising the ideological fantasies of local politicians.

We do not know the cost of the scheme, because no figures have been produced. The options paper was circulated a year ago—in April 1986—yet the detailed costings have not yet been produced.

Those of us who are inclined to be of a suspicious turn of mind are becoming increasingly convinced that the figures will not add up. Every time the figures are due to be vouchsafed, the meeting is deferred. We were led to expect that the figures would be produced in December, and then again in January. Now we are told that there will be a meeting at the end of April, at which all will be revealed.

The costs are uncertain, but what is certain is that the proponents of comprehensivisation in Warwickshire are ignoring the excellence of the schools that they intend to abolish.

More that 75 per cent. of girls at Shottery girls grammar school, in Stratford, go on to higher education. Last year, the record of A-level passes was 89 per cent. and of O-level passes 88 per cent.

The school has an outstanding reputation and record of achievement in mathematics and physics. In mathematics, at O-level last year, of 64 candidates, 63 passed. There were 24 A grades and 30 B grades. Now, in the first year sixth, 25 girls are embarking on A-level mathematics courses and a significant number of them are interested in becoming engineers. In physics, at O-level, of the 64 girls who took O-levels last year, 59 opted for physics and 52 passed, 16 with an A grade and 20 with a B grade. This impressive record is not a flash in the pan.

Britain is not so well endowed with competent mathematicians and physicists that we can afford to jettison a school such as Shottery, which is a centre of excellence that recruits girls from all over Warwickshire. Yet the proposal being put forward by the education committee of the county council is that the school should become part of a split-site comprehensive where 11 to 12 year-olds should be catered for.

King Edward VI school in Stratford has an impressive record of achievement. More than 75 per cent. of the boys go on to higher education and the A-level pass rate is 89 per cent. The average pass at A-level is in 3·5 subjects and at O-level in eight subjects. Last year, five boys, and the year before, seven boys, went on to Oxbridge.

The school has recently raised £350,000 to build a new technology block. It has been achieved on the basis of strong local support and benefactions from old boys. It has been at no cost to the local authority. The school is voluntary aided and it has the option, if the comprehensivisation scheme is persisted with, to go into the private sector, but the governors and all concerned would be deeply reluctant to do that. It would be an act of educational vandalism on the part of the education authority to pitch out of the state sector a school with such resources, standards and traditions.

My hon. Friend mentioned the element of tradition to which we should have regard. King Edward VI school was the school at which Shakespeare was educated. It should be preserved as part of our heritage, and certainly not treated as the plaything of wanton, arrogant latter-day educational ideologues.

I am sorry to have to say that there is a third grammar school in my constituency which is under threat. It is the Alcester grammar school, which dates from 1600 and which continues to attract boys and girls from a wide area. In 1980, there were only 95 pupils in the sixth form. There are now 164, which is testimony to the popularity of the school. Once again, there are examination pass rates of 80 to 85 per cent. at O and A-level, and some 80 per cent. of the sixth form go on to degree courses at university or polytechnic. It is being proposed to destroy the school to create a split-site school, with all the teacher stress and administrative difficulty that that would involve.

The proposals that are being hatched by the education committee of Warwickshire county council ignore the wishes of parents, pupils, teachers and governors. The consultation process that has been proceeding fitfully is widely regarded as a charade and it has been the source of considerable bitterness. The councillors in question are ignoring the preferences of families.

Those who send children to Shottery and King Edward VI happen to be prefer single-sex schools. Those families happen to prefer smaller schools for their children, because they see the merits of a school in which the children are known and they see that in smaller schools discipline can be easier to maintain. Those families prefer an arrangement whereby the sixth form is contained within the school. They see that the older children benefit from the continuity of teaching, benefit socially from the opportunity to take a degree of personal responsibility for the younger children in the school and benefit from a more formal structure than a sixth form college would allow.

Those parents are not putting forward arguments for the preservation of their cherished grammar schools, without any regard for other children in the county. I hear no defence of the 11-plus as such. I believe that the schools in question would welcome a different system of assessment and more flexible transfer arrangements. Those schools have an honourable record of being willing to help others, especially in terms of sixth-form provision.

Although the parents, whose children are threatened by the proposed development have full consideration for the educational prospects of less able children in the county, they are absolutely rightly concerned for the future of their children. They believe that bright children equally have educational needs that should be considered. They happen to believe that the future of their children is best secured in a selective system, which provides a certain concentration of ability and the stimulus of the peer group, enabling the children to move on and achieve their potential.

The education committee in Warwickshire is in danger of destroying good schools that parents want, in the name of a theory experience of which in our country provides, to say the least, no evidence that it is in the pupils' best interests.

In conclusion, I cannot do better than to refer to comments made to me by Mrs. Janet Purves, chairman of the King Edward VI support group. As she put it, Warwickshire county council cannot solve the problem of falling rolls in schools by abolishing schools of proven worth. The council should set out to improve standards in all schools and allow the grammar schools to continue to provide the education which the parents so obviously desire for their children.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on his success in obtaining this Adjournment debate on the future of grammar schools in Warwickshire. I congratulate both him and my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) on the way in which they presented their case this evening.

As my hon. Friends know, when a local education authority wishes to establish, discontinue or make a significant change in character or significant enlargement of the premises of a school, or to change the organisation or pattern of provision of its schools, it must first publish proposals under section 12 of the Education Act 1980, explaining its intentions. There then follows a two-month period during which statutory objections to the proposals may be submitted to the authority. A statutory objection is defined as one made by any 10 or more local government electors for the area or the governors of any voluntary school affected by the proposals or by any other local education authority concerned.

The authority has a further month in which to submit the objections it has received to the Secretary of State, together with its comments on the objections. If such objections are made, or if the Secretary of State has given appropriate notice to the local education authority, or if the school concerned is a voluntary school, the proposals fall to be decided by the Secretary of State and may not be implemented without his approval. The Secretary of State may approve the proposals, with or without modification, or reject them.

When the Secretary of State is considering proposals that have fallen to him to decide, he must judge each proposal or set of proposals on its merits, taking into account both the case of those making the proposals and the views of those objecting to them.

My hon. Friends will, I am sure, appreciate that it is important for the Secretary of State to avoid prejudging the issues where such proposals are concerned. They will understand, therefore, that I am unable to say anything about the future of the schools which are the subject of this debate. I can, however, assure them that I have listened carefully to what has been said tonight, and that their points will be taken into account, along with any other representations which we may receive, before a decision is reached on any proposals which may come before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Finally—and again I have to say "without prejudice" to this case—I wish to assure my hon. Friends that the Government are determined to preserve quality in education wherever and whenever it is to be found. As they know, I have said that on numerous occasions before, and I gladly say it again.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Eleven o'clock.

SOCIAL SERVICES

North Western Regional Health Authority

1. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about funding and staff shortages in the North Western regional health authority.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): A number of hon. Members have made representations on financial and staffing resources in the region. I am glad to be able to announce today that we have agreed the region's proposed allocation of additional funds for 1987-88 from the special fund announced by my right hon. Friend last November. This will give an additional £435,000 to north Manchester, £290,000 to central Manchester, £73,000 to south Manchester, £246,000 to Salford and £11,000 to Tameside and Glossop. In that part of the north-west covered by Mersey health region, there will be £400,000 extra for Liverpool, £200,000 for St. Helens and Knowsley, and £200,000 for south Sefton.

Mr. Lloyd: Is the Minister aware that, at a recent meeting of the north-west regional community health councils, each body complained about under-funding and staff shortages? Will the Minister admit that, even with the moneys that he announced today, central Manchester region is still talking about cutting one ward out of existence and that south Manchester still has a nursing shortage that has been described as dangerous? Will the Minister come clean with the House and say that not enough money is going into the Health Service in the north-west region and that we need more money, or will he admit that the Government's priorities are tax cuts and not ill people?

Mr. Newton: One of the Government's priorities has been to ensure the fairer distribution of NHS resources around the country. The north-west region and, indeed, the Mersey region have significantly gained from the Government's policies. The additional money that I announced today has been designed to help and will help transitional problems.

Mr. Silvester: May I stress that not all hon. Members wish to carp at the Minister's announcement, but that some sincerely thank him for it? It is in addition to a substantial capital increase in the north-west, which is several percentage points above the level of the nation as a whole.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Within the last six months, since I have been Minister, I have laid the foundation stone for a £35 million development at the Manchester royal infirmary, and last week I announced a project costing nearly £20 million for a new North Manchester general hospital.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister explain how the money that he announced today — which is obviously welcome — will help Manchester children's hospital? A substantial number of children await bone marrow transplant operations, which they cannot have because of a lack of nursing staff. Will the extra money mean that nurses are available to ensure that such essential work can be carried out?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that not all the problems are financial but that there is also a nursing shortage. We are examining that problem. We have looked at the problem in some parts of the north-west with a view to trying to determine appropriate action.

Mr. Hind: I congratulate my hon. Friend on providing treatment for an extra 22,000 patients in the north-west as a consequence of his announcement. May I impress upon him that my constituents in west Lancashire are grateful for the £118,000 that will provide 300 additional hip replacements in the next 12 months. It will tackle one of the major problems in our part of the world—that is, hip replacement surgery.

Mr. Newton: Yes, indeed. I emphasise that the allocations that I announced today are separate from the waiting list allocations, which will also do a great deal to help throughout the north-west.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Minister confirm that, by the criteria laid down by his predecessor in a parliamentary answer, compared with 1979-80 the north western region is now cumulatively £31 million short of what it should have received? Will he also confirm that the unpublished waiting list figures held by the north western region show an increase and that the Preston health authority now has the fourth longest waiting list in the country? Finally, will he confirm the rumour that at Stepping Hill hospital in Stockport on the evening of Tuesday of last week six emergency operations had to be delayed because no nurses were available to work in the theatre?

Mr. Newton: I can confirm that I am tired of hearing this kind of stuff from one of the hon. Members whose Government left the longest waiting lists in history.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Will my hon. Friend confirm that spending on the National Health Service in the north-west is higher than it has ever been before? If it is cuts that people are interested in, will he point out to Opposition Members the figures for 1977, when the Labour Government inflicted the worst cuts known in the history of the National Health Service?

Mr. Newton: Yes, indeed, and I can certainly confirm that the steady increase in the money made available to the north-west makes the spending there the highest in history.

Severe Disability Premium

2. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he has recently taken concerning the severe disability premium; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. John Major): I had a constructive meeting with the disablement organisations on 21 January. They put to me alternative proposals for the treatment of the most severely disabled people under income support which, without commitment, we are currently considering. Officials will be carrying this discussion further later this week.

Mr. Wainwright: When the Minister considers these powerful representations, will he bear in mind that the present conditions that he has laid down are intolerably restrictive, limiting this premium to a handful of people who persist in living alone, despite requiring almost constant attendance? Does he realise that this makes a mockery of the presumptuous title "severe disability premium"?

Mr. Major: I do not accept that only a handful of people are involved. Our estimate is that about 8,000 people will receive the premium. The severe disability premium will be paid on top of the normal disability premium, and it will be a fairly substantial sum.

Mr. Hannam: When considering the problem of the severely disabled who at present receive an accumulation of additional allowances and payments that exceed the new disability premium and the other premium, has my hon. Friend considered the idea put forward by DHSS local managers for operation of the social fund in a flexible way to make sure that severely disabled people get the right amount of money that they need?

Mr. Major: I am considering a variety of alternative methods. In the case of those severely disabled people who are receiving a large number of additional requirement payments, the transitional protection will secure their cash position, but in respect of those who are receiving large amounts of domestic assistance addition, that transitional protection will itself be protected against inflation.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that the most severely disabled people, many of whom are practically paralysed, cannot live alone because they must have someone to care for them, yet they are the very people whom the Government say cannot receive the severe disability premium, just because they are receiving an attendance allowance? That is absolute nonsense. Will the Minister therefore accept the simple and logical proposition that the most severely disabled people should receive the severe disability premium?

Mr. Major: The severe disability premium is intended for the most severely disabled. The right hon. Gentleman commented on the particular circumstances in which the premium will be payable. These matters are under discussion at present with the disability organisations.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Is the Minister aware that the voluntary organisations have again expressed this week their deep and continuing concern about the most severely disabled people trying to live alone when the domestic care addition disappears? As he knows, it is new applicants who cause the greatest concern. They face loss of independence without the domestic care addition. Is there anything further that the Minister can say today about their plight?

Mr. Major: There is nothing further that I can say today, except to acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that of particular concern are the future disabled people who would have received domestic assistance allowance and the large number of additional requirements. It is precisely that rather narrow body of people whom we are most concerned to protect, and who are the subject of my present conversations with the disability allowance group and others.

Ministerial Responsibilities

3. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to review the responsibilities within his Department of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie); and if he will make a statment.

15. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to review the responsibility within his Department of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie.)

16. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will re-allocate the responsibilies currently exercised within his Department by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie).

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): No, Sir.

Mr. Winnick: This is meant to be helpful — [Interruption.] Have not some of the comments by the hon. Lady since becoming the junior Minister in his Department been quite extraordinary? Did the Prime Minister have some sort of grudge against the Secretary of State and decide to punish him by putting that somewhat publicity-crazed person into his Department?

Mr. Fowler: The real position is that a successful politican such as my hon. Friend, says what everybody is thinking, while an unsuccessful politican, such as the hon. Gentleman, says what nobody is thinking, or would ever think.

Mr. Lofthouse: Considering the many foolish utterances by the hon. Lady, can the Secretary of State tell the House why she is so popular among her Tory colleagues?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is popular among her colleagues, and up and down the country.

Dame Jill Knight: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that in tabling such questions, Opposition Members are suffering from an excess of sour grapes? One must have just a little sympathy with them because there is no one on the Opposition Front Bench who has the energy, clarity and ability to hit the headlines like my hon. Friend.

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As for the criticism of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, given what the Prime Minister has had to put up with from Opposition Members, it goes considerably further than sour grapes.

Sir George Young: Is it not typical of the sexist attitudes of many Opposition Members that they gun for one of the few women Ministers in the Government?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is right. I know of his interest in health education and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has put that firmly on the map.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Is the Secretary of State aware that I applaud the statement made by his junior Minister that smoking is dirty and smelly? In the light of that and because it appears to be the view of the entire Department, will the Secretary of State take the time to persuade his colleagues in the Department of the Environment that the only way to deal with smoking is to stop advertising it, and to allow people to make a choice and not to influence them in all their activities by advertising campaigns? Lastly— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is clearly about the Minister and not about her statement.

Mr. Fowler: I think that I answered that question from the hon. Gentleman the last time that we had social security questions. The fact is that we have a voluntary code on advertising in this country. That has applied under this and the previous Government and it is the most effective way of dealing with the problems.

North-East Thames Health Region (Waiting List Fund)

4. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on the allocation of the waiting list fund within the north-east Thames health region.

Mr. Newton: The north-east Thames regional health authority will receive £2·07 million from the first year's allocation of the fund. That will enable hospitals in the region to treat an additional 7,000 waiting list cases through at least 25 separate projects.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Is the Minister aware that because of local and staff anxiety about the future of St. Margaret's hospital in Epping, the money that is being made available is much appreciated? Does he agree that that will result in a considerable cut in waiting time for operations, notably in oral surgery and ear, nose and throat cases?

Mr. Newton: Yes, the £92,000 that is being made available for west Essex will finance three projects and will enable over 1,000 cases to be treated. In addition, the district is planning improvements within its existing resources, including a 41 per cent. reduction in the children's ear, nose and throat waiting list by September of this year. That is a considerable prospect of progress.

Mr. Squire: The people of Havering will welcome my hon. Friend's statement because they too will benefit within that region. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is unacceptable for people to have to wait up to two years for orthopaedic operations, as some must do? Will he join me in hoping that there will be a substantial reduction in the waiting list as a result of the announcement?

Mr. Newton: Indeed, I would expect that reduction. Barking, Havering and Brentwood are receiving over £450,000 from the allocation which will finance six projects, enabling the treatment of more than 2,000 extra in-patient cases in orthopaedics and ENT. That is in addition to improvements in existing resources, including the treatment of up to 1,600 additional cases in orthopaedics and general surgery.

Diabetics

5. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received regarding the care and treatment of diabetics.

Mr. Newton: Representations have been received from the British Diabetic Association, right hon. and hon. Members and members of the public about provision on general practitioner prescription of disposable syringes and blood glucose monitoring strips for diabetics. I announced last Tuesday that we have decided to make disposable syringes available on prescription from general practitioners.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply and as the parent of a diabetic child may I say how much I welcomed last week's announcement? However, may I emphasize to him the importance of diabetics' maintaining effective control over their blood glucose level? In view of that can he hold out any hope that blood glucose monitoring strips may one day be available on prescription?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful for the first half of my hon. Friend's remarks and I pay tribute to the part that he has played in the campaign that has contributed to this decision. Last Tuesday I said that we would like to make blood glucose monitoring strips available on prescription when the resources become available, but at this moment I cannot give an absolute undertaking when that will be.

Mr. Beith: While I warmly welcomed the Minister's decision, may I say that some diabetics resented the impression that was given the following day that their syringes alone necessitated the increase in prescription charges? Will he seek to dispel that impression and to make it clear that diabetics are as entitled as other disadvantaged groups to benefit from the Health Service and his welcome decision?

Mr. Newton: Yes, I certainly wish to dispel that impression. There is no gainsaying the fact that the resources that enable us to undertake welcome developments must be found somewhere. Obviously, part of those resources are the yield from prescription charges.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Does my hon. Friend agree that adequate funding for biochemistry departments in hospitals is absolutely essential to ensure that diabetic testing is freely available and that prompt results can be reported to general practitioners for the benefit of patients? Furthermore, is he aware that for some of the newer techniques expensive re-agents are necessary and are used to help test unstable sugar levels in the blood of patients? They are expensive, but considered to be vital in the treatment of diabetics by general practitioners. Will my hon. Friend encourage their use?

Mr. Newton: As I have said, we are always sympathetic and we have shown that clearly and practically in the past week in the development of services for diabetics. I certainly take note of what my hon. Friend has said.

Bed and Breakfast Accommodation (Ealing)

6. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much his Department is spending on bed and breakfast accommodation in the London borough of Ealing; what was the comparable figure at the beginning of May 1986; how many people and families are involved in each figure; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Nicholas Lyell): Information in the precise form requested is not held centrally. However,

I can tell my hon. Friend that the number of families housed in bed and breakfast accommodation in the London borough of Ealing rose from 53 at the end of March 1986 to 375 at the end of September 1986.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that the new Ealing Labour-controlled council has abolished residence points for people born and bred in Ealing and for those who have lived there for two years? It has forced up the bed and breakfast list from 30, costing £300 a year when the council came to office in May 1986, to an estimated 1,000 costing £5 million in April 1988. The council has created a spurious housing list, drawing people from all over the country on to it. Even if every blade of grass in Ealing were built on, that list could never be met. Will my hon. and learned Friend sympathise with the people of Ealing who face a 65 per cent. rate increase? All council services, including essential services, are at a standstill because the council has quarrelled with its work force—which is on strike—and is threatening to put virtually everyone on the street.

Mr. Lyell: The costly and inappropriate policies of the London borough of Ealing are becoming well known. The code of guidance, which is issued by the Department of the Environment, emphasises that bed and breakfast accommodation should be used as a last resort and for as short a period as possible.

Mr. Dobson: Can the Minister confirm that there has been an increase in the number of people accepted as homeless by the London borough of Ealing since the change in control of the council? Will he confirm that no Minister challenges the decisions of the London borough of Ealing and that those people have been properly accepted as homeless under the terms of the legislation, which is binding upon the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues just as much as it is on the London borough of Ealing?

Mr. Lyell: I can confirm that the use of bed and breakfast accommodation for families with children is both costly and unsuitable. The guidance that is issued by the Department is that it should be used only as a last resort.

AIDS

7. Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the progress of the campaign to limit the spread of AIDS.

Mr. Fowler: Our objectives are to ensure that the public are given the facts about AIDS, the threat that it poses, how infection is transmitted and how the spread can be prevented. The results of the latest Gallup survey, which was commissioned by the Department, show encouraging progress towards these objectives. We are currently considering our strategy for the next stages of the campaign.

Mr. Townend: Will my right hon. Friend accept that there is public concern that his campaign has been even-handed between homosexual and hetrosexual activity, although the spread of AIDS has come, principally, through the homosexual community? Will he tell the House what proportion of those who, unfortunately, have died from the disease have been homosexuals? Does he agree that the time has come to ban homosexual propaganda in schools, on television, in newspapers and in other forms of the media?

Mr. Fowler: As to schools, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. With regard to his major question, he is quite correct that the disease and the number of deaths have, predominately been among homosexuals. On the other hand, we must take account of the cases among drug users sharing needles and heterosexuals. We know that the AIDS virus can spread heterosexually, and therefore it is right that we should be prudent about the information that we give to the public on how we can prevent that.

Mrs. Renée Short: Is the Secretary of State aware that thus far the Select Committee on Social Services has identified certain sectors where much more help will be needed? Does he agree that there is an urgent need for many more clinical medical posts; an urgent need for many more counsellors to counsel patients; that there will shortly be an acute need for more hospice places and that there is an urgent need for the proper education of children in schools about how to avoid the AIDS disease?

Mr. Fowler: The Government look forward to the report of the Select Committee on Social Services. The Government have shown, by the resources that they have devoted to public education and research, the importance that they place on fighting the spread of this virus.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, even though the heterosexual community is at risk of AIDS contamination, the time has come for the Government to make it clear that by far the greatest degree of risk is posed by drug abusers and sexual perverts? Is it not about time that we concentrated on pointing out where the responsibility lies for the spread of this disease?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is correct in that the responsibility is an individual responsibility and, clearly, what he says about homosexuals and drug users is right. The next stages of the campaign will be directed specifically to those areas, as will advertising.

Mr. Duffy: Does the Secretary of State believe that exhortation, determent or even terror will be adequate? Those measures are not sufficing in the United States, where nearly 1·5 million people are infected, quite apart from the dead and dying. Does he not think that in the next stage of his campaign he should point out, without preaching, that there are moral choices available on behalf of the family and the community?

Mr. Fowler: Indeed. In the campaign we have always made it clear that it is not just safer but best to rely on a faithful, loving relationship and I have sought to make that clear at every stage. However, we need to say something more than that and to give direct and straightforward health education messages. I hope that, in addition to the Government's public education campaign, the churches will conduct their own campaigns. Those campaigns would be complementary and there is a need for them.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Will my right hon. Friend say a little more about his talks with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science about the best way to get the moral and the educational messages across, particularly to younger children?

Mr. Fowler: Just before the weekend, my right hon. Friend issued a new leaflet on AIDS for teachers, and he will also be providing video information for schools. Both he and I are absolutely determined that the dangers of the spread of AIDS are made known in a responsible way in the schools.

Doddington Hospital

8. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received on the future of Doddington hospital; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I have received one letter from a member of the public. The Peterborough area will soon see the opening of a second new district general hospital at a cost of £13 million providing nearly 300 extra beds. As a result, the hospital authorities are now looking at plans which may involve a change of use for the county hospital at Doddington. That hospital currently provides acute services, but may in future become a community hospital, providing much-needed services for psychiatric and psychogeriatric patients in the area.

Mr. Freud: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but will she confirm that consultant cover will continue at Doddington hospital, as it is much appreciated by local doctors? Will she also bear in mind that my population of 65-year-olds is rising by 15 per cent. and that of 75-year-olds by 18 per cent. and consequently ensure that hospital facilities are available for people close to their homes? Will she also give her help to the primary health care teams that are desperately needed in a place with so little public transport?

Mrs. Currie: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can confirm that the out-patient services, which cover several of the types of specialties which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, such as general surgery, gynaecology, trauma orthopaedics, and so on, will continue and consultant cover will continue for them. I can also confirm that the figures for the growth in the elderly population in that neighbourhood are correct, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will confirm his interest in that matter as I believe that within the next 10 years he will be joining that group and therefore, like many of us, wishes to see services for the elderly improve.

Severe Weather Payments

9. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Social Service how many claims have been made for exceptionally severe weather payments; and what percentage of those eligible have so far made a claim.

12. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many payments for exceptionally severe weather heating costs have been made in the current winter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Information on the total number of claims is not available, but by 3 February approximately 1·4 million £5 payments had been made. Some claimants will have received two of more payments. It is not possible to estimate take-up since full returns have not yet been received.

Mr. Eadie: I thank the Minister for that information, but can he be sure that people with the worst fuel bills will have claimed before the deadline period has been reached? Will the Minister give the House an assurance that if there is any evidence that the deadline period is causing a problem he will consider extending it?

Mr. Major: The deadline period has not yet been reached. The period for claims is 13 weeks from the date of the week in which the payments fell due. That is largely to approximate with the fact that most fuel bills are rendered quarterly. The deadline will not be reached until early April, and I am pleased to tell the hon. Gentleman that further claims are still coming in. I shall look at the situation in early April, but I can give no commitment on that.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware that pensioners in receipt of supplementary benefit, because of the requirement of the £500 limit, are forced to choose between keeping enough money in their savings accounts to bury themselves or heating themselves properly during their lifetime? Will he undertake now to review this £500 limit?

Mr. Major: The hon. Lady may care to bear in mind that we have already reviewed that level and increased it substantially from the £200 that existed at the time the hon. Lady's party was last in Government.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: Is my hon. Friend aware that the changes in the scheme have been greatly welcomed? However, I know of a considerable number of cases in my own constituency where pensioners have put a sum of money aside for their funeral, and with the rising cost of funerals I must ask my hon. Friend to look very carefully to see whether something can be done to increase the low level of savings involved.

Mr. Major: I understand entirely the points made by the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend. If my hon. Friend looks at the new regime that we propose for assistance with funerals, which takes effect from April this year, he will find that many people will have the full cost of their funeral paid and not just the inadequate flat rate of £30 as at present.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that under the Labour Government there was no clear method of helping those in need with fuel costs and, indeed, that it was this Government who made severe weather payments available on a statutory basis for the first time? Over and above that, is it not the case that there is substantially increased help for those supplementary pensioners and very many more of them are claiming heating additions?

Mr. Major: I can confirm all those points. This is certainly the first statutory entitlement of this sort and, of course, it is built upon the largest amount of special heating additions being paid that we have seen at any stage.—[Interruption.] We are not abolishing them, we are sinking them into the income support scheme, where they should be. So far as the position before 1979 is concerned, there was no statutory entitlement, no real entitlement and no concern shown by the Labour party.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister aware that his complacency in no way helps those people, including our own constituents, who are just above the level of supplementary benefit, who receive no assistance or any form of heating help, and therefore, even in weather such as today's, suffer great anguish simply because they do not have enough funds to provide adequate heating in their homes? Is there not a need to look again at the regulations to make them more generous?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman points to a problem that is always bound to exist when one bases entitlement, as traditionally we have done, on supplementary benefit level. It is precisely for that reason that during the period of this Government we have substantially raised the level of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Dickens: Is the Minister aware that the great success of the severe weather payments scheme is in no small measure due to the support that the Minister has had from Department of Health and Social Security offices throughout the United Kingdom? Furthermore, is the Minister aware that in most cases those payments have been made within one day, and at the very outside within seven days? This is a marvellous effort by Government and civil servants.

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend's point is well made and I am happy to join him in a tribute to the staff who worked so well to ensure that this scheme was successful and that the payments were generally made very promptly.

Mrs. Beckett: Is the Minister aware that almost everything he has said about the record of the last Labour Government in this respect is grossly misleading and that pensioners are much more interested in what is going to happen next winter than in what happened seven winters ago? Since the present scheme, of which he has spoken so highly, will be abolished in April, will he now undertake to do as was suggested last year, look at a sensible winter premium scheme which will run throughout the winter months, and introduce one in time for next winter?

Mr. Major: There is a distinction between a sensible winter premium scheme and the proposition put forward by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). As regards what will happen at the end of this winter, we shall consider the position then and determine what might need to be done for the future.

Hospices

10. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on hospices for the terminally ill.

Mrs. Currie: The Department's policy on terminal care is set out in circular HC874 issued last week. We are asking health authorities to examine their current provision of services for all terminally ill patients and to plan to rectify deficiencies, where possible in collaboration with the voluntary sector. I have arranged for a copy of the circular and the covering letter to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Spencer: Is my hon. Friend aware of the excellent work being done by the Leicester hospice, which has its day centre in my constituency? It has been funded by private donation as to its capital cost and 80 per cent. of its revenue funding comes from the local health authority. Does she not think that that spells out an admirable lesson in public and private co-operation for the Health Service as a whole?

Mrs. Currie: Yes. I am glad to add my words of praise, thanks and encouragement to the people in Leicester, particularly those in my hon. Friend's constituency who have worked together through LOROS—Leicestershire organisation for the relief of suffering—and the local health authority to ensure that the services can be developed and maintained.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Minister aware how attractive she looks today? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want to hear the rest of the question.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Minister also aware that I would like to praise those people back in the community, particularly in the constituency of Ashfield, who raise money for hospices? However, when are the Government going to stop street-corner begging to provide that sort of facility?

Mrs. Currie: In response to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, the circular I have just mentioned asks health authorities to describe in their programmes for 1988-89, as a start, what arrangements they have for financial support of hospices and voluntary bodies providing terminal care. They have been told that where a hospice plays an essential part in a health authority's overall plans, we expect them to make an appropriate financial contribution. In response to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I thank him and I must say that he looks pretty cute today, too.

Abortion Act 1967

11. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received seeking a review of the working of the Abortion Act 1967; and if he will make a statement.

17. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received seeking a review of the workings of the Abortion Act 1967; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received no recent representations seeking a review of the working of the Abortion Act 1967. We have however, received about 15 items of correspondence seeking a review of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 in the light of its effects on abortion practice.

Mrs. Roe: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is considerable concern about recent allegations in the press relating to certain tour operators who are arranging package deal trips at an all-in price of about £360 for pregnant Spanish women to come to Britain for a sightseeing tour of London, a shopping expedition and an abortion? Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to investigate these claims of abuses of the present Abortion Act 1967, and if so is he able to inform the House of his conclusions?

Mr. Newton: Yes. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for having taken the matter up with us. I hope to be writing to her with the outcome of our investigations shortly. I can tell her that officials, including both a medical and a nursing officer, have now visited both homes and made a thorough examination of numerous records. Those inquiries have produced no evidence that any abortion has been performed for the reasons that were alleged, nor that payment in advance had been made by Spanish patients. I understand that two of the doctors named have put the matter in the hands of the Medical Defence Union. In addition, solicitors acting on behalf of one of the clinics have written to the editor of the paper concerned denying the allegations and requesting a printed retraction and apology, failing which, I understand, they state that proceedings will be instituted.

Mr. Amess: Will the Minister recognise that, with the advances in medical science, the 1967 Act is no longer acceptable? Many people in this country view with increasing alarm the number of abortions that have been carried out, particularly those which are late. When will the Government introduce further legislation to protect the unborn child in this country?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will know that the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists has issued advice on this matter and we would expect NHS consultants to conform to it. It is a condition of registration that private nursing homes should not perform abortions after 24 weeks. Of course, we have made clear our support of the Bill introduced by the Bishop of Birmingham in another place.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Will the hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that he will resist any attempt to interfere with the basic provisions of the 1967 Act? Will he ensure that, at the end of the day, it still remains the woman's right to make a choice?

Mr. Newton: I can confirm that the Government would expect to maintain the general position that these are matters to be decided by the whole House on free votes.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Dame Jill Knight asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Dame Jill Knight: As my right hon. Friend prepares for her forthcoming visit to Moscow, will she reflect on the fact that, if it had not been for the strength and purpose of the Western Alliance in deploying cruise missiles and other INF weapons, there is no reason to suppose that Mr. Gorbachev would have come forward with his present proposals on balanced reductions of such weapons? Has my right hon. Friend noted the speech made in the House yesterday by the former Labour Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), which showed much greater purpose and grasp of reality than the Leader of the Opposition shows?

The Prime Minister: I totally agree with my hon. Friend, who makes her point very effectively. Unless this country had been firm in deploying cruise missiles, there would now be no proposals to take out SS20s. I agree with her that the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) has shown an admirable consistency in these matters, which is more than can be said for the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

Q2. Mr. McNamara asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr McNamara: Is the Prime Minister aware that at a press conference this morning the Secretary of State for the Environment, referring to his hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Planning, said, "Although he is the pilot of the Bill, he has not got his bow doors open"? My constituents crew these ferries. There are 81 people still on board and many are still unidentified. Was not that joke even sicker and even more insensitive than the one that appeared in Conservative Newsline this week insulting the blind? Now that the Secretary of State for the Environment, himself a former Minister of Transport, has apologised, saying that those remarks were inappropriate, inopportune——[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is unfair to go on for as long as that.

Mr. McNamara: Now that the right hon. Gentleman has said that those remarks were inappropriate, inopportune and insensitive, would it not be appropriate and sensitive for the Prime Minister to call for his resignation?

The Prime Minister: No. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, my right hon. Friend issued a statement, saying:

"I deeply regret this inadvertent error and apologise unreservedly. I am only too well aware of the personal grief involved in such a tragedy as the recent ferry disaster."

I believe it has been the habit and custom of this House, when an unreserved apology is made, to accept it.

Mr. Onslow: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to commend the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), in his regretted absence, not merely for exposing the nonsense of the defence policy of the Labour Front Bench but for showing up the fundamental contradictions within the so-called alliance, of which the Liberal unilateralists form so significant a part?

The Prime Minister: I gladly support what the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said and his firmness in defending this country, its defence and security. I join my hon. Friend in pointing out that, when it came to deploying cruise missiles, the Liberal and SDP Members voted against that deployment.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister aware that the revised balance of payments figures—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kinnock: Oh yes—the real world. Is the Prime Minister aware that the revised balance of payments figures published last week show an overall deficit of £1·1 billion, a trade deficit of £8 billion and a manufactured trade deficit of £6 billion? Is the Prime Minister going to sit back and allow that to grow to an overall deficit of £3 billion this year, or is she going to change policies?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman has taken the revised figures. He is correct about them. But since 1979 there has been a surplus on current account of nearly £20 billion. Between 1974 and 1979 there was a cumulative deficit of over £5 billion.

Mr. Kinnock: When the right hon. Lady has been able to depend in each of the years in which she has been Prime Minister on a minimum oil revenue of £8 billion a year, can she explain why, despite that great cushion for her policies, Britain has still lost 20 per cent. of its share in world markets, a 20 per cent. share of domestic manufacturing markets and 2 million manufacturing jobs and is now less competitive than it was in 1979? Can she explain all that and come clean about the fact that any success that she has achieved in international payments is directly and solely attributable to the oil revenues?

The Prime Minister: Last year, exports were at a record level in volume terms despite the reduction in oil exports. There was an improvement of more than £2 billion in invisible surplus between 1985 and 1986. The right hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that that minus £1·1 billion—[Interruption.]—has to be set against a surplus on current account since 1979 of nearly £20 billion. The right hon. Gentleman refers to the oil factor. May I point out to him that the United Kingdom had net overseas assets of £80 billion at the end of 1985, giving an annual income of more than £4 billion a year. That is achieved by investing some of the income from North sea oil.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister talks about export figures. Is she aware that, since she has been Prime Minister, exports have gone up by 10 per cent. in volume and value and manufactured imports have gone up by 40 per cent. in volume and value? If the right hon. Lady wants to take so much credit for overseas holdings, can she explain why, with holdings of £150 billion, we were still getting only £4 billion in return last year? Will she now answer the first question: what will she do to stop the constant deterioration in our trade position?

The Prime Minister: Bearing in mind that the right hon. Gentleman speaks for a party which, when in Government had an overall deficit of £5 billion—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman speaks for a party which, when in Government had an overall deficit of £5 billion and complains about this Government who have an overall surplus of £20 billion. We are not going to take lectures from the likes of him.

Mr. Durrell: Returning to the subject that the Leader of the Opposition understandably prefers to avoid, does my right hon. Friend agree that the fact that Mr. Gorbachev has taken up President Reagan's offer of the zero option is welcome? However, is it not important that NATO is not baffled by false promises or by weasel words about short-range intermediate nuclear forces and conventional weapons? Is it not essential that a clear link is established in the negotiations between the implementation of a long-range INF agreement with progress on reducing the conventional disparity, as well as short-range INF?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It does not help to make all this noise.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that the Soviet Union is now taking up the intermediate-range forces point because we deployed cruise and Pershing. I also agree with him that one can never take a single point out of the whole disarmament and defence picture and treat it in isolation from others. Therefore, one must also consider the shorter-range nuclear weapons and the conventional imbalance. Otherwise our defences would be insecure. We believe in keeping them secure.

Mr. Beith: Does that answer mean that the Prime Minister is going back on her previous support for the zero-zero option at a time when the United States is clearly prepared to back it? Is the Prime Minister to make progress on the other important areas a condition of achieving agreement on intermediate nuclear forces?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the draft treaties that have been tabled he will find that shorter-range nuclear weapons are considered. He will also find from the NATO communiqué that it is important to consider those: if not in fact to sign an agreement on them at precisely the same time, to have a follow-on agreement on shorter-range as part of the consideration of the intermediate range. It would be a very foolish person who also ignored the conventional imbalance. Those who wish to select one thing without thought for the others are not interested in our defence. They are interested only in making short-term political points.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the vast majority of people in this country and in western Europe believe that our security is safe in her hands? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are making very slow progress today.

Mr. Winterton: Is my right hon. Friend also aware that the vast majority of British people believe that freedom and democracy are worth defending whatever the cost?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. It is a fact of modern defence life that the time needed to design and manufacture the weapons is so long that one can never afford to make a mistake in arms control negotiations, because there will be no time whatsoever to correct it. That is why we have to look at the print so carefully.

Q3. Mr. Loyden asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Loyden: Has the Prime Minister had a chance today to read the comments in the press about the sharp drop in Townsend Thoresen's shares, which, it is said, is due to the safety modifications that will be required to meet the new standards? Will the Prime Minister now accept that her theory about popular capitalism has created a climate in which profit and commercial interests take precedence over life, the wellbeing of people, and the safety of crew and passengers? Let that be condemned as the ugly and utterly unacceptable face of her popular capitalism.

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. The hon. Gentleman is talking total nonsense and he knows it. The point was raised with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport yesterday and he dealt with it. The hon. Gentleman knows that no company has a future unless it puts safety above all else, and that is the key to its future.

Mr. Yeo: In the course of her busy day will my right hon. Friend reflect on the contrast between next week's Budget—when we are all looking forward to tax cuts that will follow on from the increases in spending that were announced last autumn—and the Budgets of nine or 10 years ago during the hung Parliament, when the choice was between which taxes would be increased and where spending cuts would be made? Does my right hon. Friend recall that the then Labour Government were able to introduce those Budgets only because they were sustained in office by the Liberal party?

The Prime Minister: I think that we had better wait for next Tuesday's Budget and not anticipate its contents. I would point out that those below the Opposition Gangway belonging to the alliance party voted against last year's income tax cuts. The Conservative party is the party of lower income tax while all other parties are in favour of higher income tax.

Q4. Dr. McDonald asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dr. McDonald: Does the Prime Minister expect to see full employment in this country before she retires to Dulwich?

The Prime Minister: I believe that this country is tackling both its manufacturing and its unemployment problems better than any other country in Europe, and that, had it not been for the policies that we have pursued, the unemployment figures would have been far higher than they are now.

Artificial Limb and Appliance Services

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. John Major): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the Government's response to the McColl report on the artificial limb and appliance services. As the House will know, these important services are administered directly by my Department and the working party was invited to consider them and to make recommendations for the improvement of efficiency and patient care. I am most grateful to the members of the working party for the comprehensive and dedicated manner in which they tackled this task.

The report made wide-ranging and detailed recommendations concerning the organisation and management of the services; the nature of the contracts for the supply of limbs; the quality of the limb-fitting services; and the desirability of closer links between the full range of hospital, community care and local authority services. Action has been taken already to implement many of the recommendations.

We have strengthened substantially the top management of the limb and appliance services by appointing a general manager to head a specialist disablement services division; supported by a new director of operations, and a new director of procurement from the National Health Service.

We now propose to extend the principle of general management throughout the limb and appliance service in order to implement the far-reaching changes we envisage. We intend to reorganise the service into regions with boundaries that are conterminous with those of the National Health Service. Each region will be headed by a senior manager responsible for the entire limb and appliance service in that area. We are also, as I told the House on 17 February, improving the range of wheelchairs that are provided. Pilot projects to improve transport arrangements for patients are under way and improved management systems are alrady in place.

We believe the quality of limb fitting by prosthetists is vital to patient welfare. The McColl report was critical of the level and quality of prosthetic training. We agree that it should be improved. We wish to see professional training and the status of prosthetics upgraded. We have therefore established a joint working party with the limb industry and the Orthotic and Prosthetic Training and Education Council to review speedily the present arrangements for prosthetic training and to make recommendations for improvement. We have already received an interim report from the working party and expect a final report within three months; I shall report further to the House when this is received. I anticipate that implementation of any recommendations will make provision both for initial training leading to a qualification and subsequent in-service training.

We also agree with the McColl report that we should seek improved contracts for the supply of artificial limbs. We are therefore pressing the limb industry to agree to new contractual arrangements that will increase competition and encourage a quicker and more flexible service. Discussions with this aim in mind are continuing and we attach great importance to this principle.

One of the most important conclusions of the McColl working party was that it would be inappropriate for the limb and appliance services to remain under the direct control of the Department of Health and Social Security. I wish to make clear that we accept that recommendation and propose to act on it.

We have therefore decided to establish an interim management board, in the form of a special health authority, with effect from 1 July this year. The authority will be accountable directly to me. I am delighted to announce that my noble Friend Lord Holderness has agreed to be chairman of the new authority. My noble Friend is a distinguished former Member of this House and has a long and proven record of commitment to disabled people. I have no doubt that he will be an excellent chairman.

We envisage the board will have about eight members and their names will be announced shortly following further consultation with the chairman. We shall of course also have regard to the provisions of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in appointing board members. However, the House may care to know that I have already invited Professor Ian McColl, chairman of the McColl working party, to join the board as vice-chairman so that the views and knowledge of the working party will be readily available. I am delighted to report that Professor McColl has accepted, and I know that this delight is shared by my noble Friend.

The McColl report identified an imperative need for stronger links with the occupational therapy, physiotherapy and rehabilitation services offered by the National Health Service. We agree with this recommendation. To achieve this aim in the interests of patient care we have concluded that, in the longer term, the right organisational framework for the limb and appliance service would be alongside these services within the regional and district health authorities. This is also the view of the recent report on disability published by the Royal College of Physicians.

Clearly, however, this is a far-reaching change which cannot, in our view, be carried into effect immediately. The process of transition will need very careful management to safeguard the interests of all involved, whether patients or staff. We shall expect the new authority to complete this task in time for integration to take place on 1 April 1991. The instrument establishing the authority will set this as the end date.

The new authority will have a threefold responsibility: to oversee the planning for the eventual transfer of the services; to build upon the improvements already under way; and to run the service for this transitional period. It will have power to appoint its own senior staff. The special health authority will be given its own budget for 1987-88 and planning figures for the two following years. Special arrangements will be made to safeguard the level of funding available throughout the period of the special health authority's life and for a period after integration with health authorities. The authority will also be charged with devising safeguards to ensure that continuity of the services is maintained following integration.

Staff who are currently employed in the service will be invited to work for the new authority. Their existing terms and conditions will apply and the authority will be required to ensure that their interests are protected. Discussions with trade unions and staff will begin today.

The authority will be responsible for the whole of the artificial limb service, for the wheelchair service, and for the provision of appliances to war pensioners. The Government remain committed to ensuring that the status of war pensioners continues to be recognised. We will ensure that the new authority reflects that commitment. Decisions on the future of the artificial eye service will be taken when the current review of the service is complete, but this may also be added to the special health authority's responsibilities. The departmental vehicle schemes will remain directly administered by the DHSS.

The decisions I have announced today represent the most far-reaching changes in the artificial limb and appliances service since its inception. They follow the recommendations of the working party. They meet the aspirations of disabled people, and I am confident they will improve the services available to them. I believe it is right to end the uncertainty of recent years.

The Government look forward to working with the new authority to build a better future for the patients they will serve.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): In thanking the Minister for his statement, I am sure the whole House will acknowledge the importance in human terms of the study undertaken by Professor McColl and his colleagues. May I remind the House of the words of the then Minister for Health when he published the report on 27 January 1986, over 13 months ago? He said that the report had "confirmed that the services are falling below standard in several respects".

and that it had

"identified a number of matters which must be tackled vigorously if the quality of care we want for patients is to be secured and delivered efficiently and economically." — [Official Report, 27 January 1986; Vol.90, c.391.]

I must, therefore, ask the Minister why it has taken over 13 months for us to receive today's statement. This surely does not suggest that the Government have been tackling the issues with any urgency or vigour.

The most fundamental question now is whether the Minister agrees that people with disabilities in the United Kingdom deserve a wheelchair and artificial limb service which is equal to the best in the world? Is he satisfied that his statement today will achieve that result? Will the new authority be totally independent so that it can act solely in the interests of disabled people? The chairman is himself a disabled person, but how many users of the artificial limb and appliance service will be members of the authority? Will the Minister also establish an advisory committee of ALAC users so that he will have direct feedback from disabled people themselves?

Can the Minister say any more about the training and upgrading of prosthetists and about giving them responsibility which starts, if possible, before the amputation and lasts until the patient is totally satisfied with the artificial limb? How will employment opportunitis be affected, and can the Minister say anything further today about the Hanger dispute, which he himself has described as "causing distress, worry and inconvenience," not to mention the deep sense of injustice felt by a dedicated work force?

What improvements to transport arrangements for patients does the hon. Gentleman envisage? In relation to artificial arms, will he accept that current hand covers are abysmal and cause considerable distress, especially to young people? On wheelchairs, is he satisfied that his statement will lead to the provision of a safe and comfortable wheelchair which is suitable for each individual who needs one, especially for growing children whose needs can change very quickly? Many of them, sadly, are terminally ill and since we cannot add years to their lives, ought we not at least to add life to their years by making the best possible provision?

How will what has been decided affect physiotherapists and others in the overworked and underpaid professions supplementary to medicine? How will approved repairers be affected, and will they be enabled to stock enough spares to reduce delays in repair and maintenance? Is the Minister aware that one wheelchair user who is well known to many of us, on both sides of the House, has been waiting over nine months for a simple repair? As he is Bert Massie, assistant director of RADAR, who knows the ropes as well as any disabled person in the country, what must the position be for people without his knowledge and contacts? Will the Minister respond to the desire for occupant-controlled powered outdoor wheelchairs, especially among people over pension age who do not qualify for mobility allowance?

The Minister's statement dealt with many complex issues. Does he agree that they deserve to be debated as soon as possible?

Finally, will the Minister agree that to finance any improvements for some disabled people by reducing benefits or services for other disabled people is not on, and that the recommendation to fund outdoor wheelchairs by abating mobility allowance must be rejected? Does he recognise that, in the week before the Chancellor intends to give away several billion pounds to people whose resources already far outstrip their needs, to cut a benefit paid to people with the least resources and the greatest needs would be wholly unacceptable to this House?

Mr. Major: The right hon. Gentleman has raised a number of detailed points to which I shall endeavour to respond. I am grateful to him for his kind words, with which I agree, about Professor McColl and the McColl report.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the time taken to produce our response. It has certainly taken a year to produce it, but it is better to take a sufficiency of time to produce the right response than to make an early response which perhaps does not meet what is required. I think that the right hon. Gentleman's words confirm that the statement meets the aspirations of disabled people, and that was the prime concern that we had in mind.

In so far as providing the best service in the world is concerned, it is certainly my clear ambition to ensure that the service is substantially better than it has been hitherto. That was the message of the McColl report. That is what the changes are intended to achieve, and I believe that they will do so. The special health authority will have the same degree of independence as any other special health authority and will, as I mentioned in my statement, report directly to me and, through me, to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I shall refer the matter of an advisory committee on artificial limb and appliance centre users to my noble Friend to consider.

As I mentioned in my statement, we wish to see improved training of prosthetists, both before taking their qualification and subsequently in in-service training. We wish also to upgrade their status. Discussions upon that matter will continue. We shall provide full details of employment opportunities to trade unions and staff at our first meeting, which is to commence this afternoon. I believe that they will be found to be satisfactory by the staff concerned.

I am bound to say that Hangers has maintained a high degree of service over recent months. As I have stated on previous occasions when reporting on the unfortunate dispute, we remain in daily contact with the company. I am pleased to tell the House that the backlog is diminishing steadily and the service is substantially improving. I hope that the backlog will be wholly cleared before too long.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to powered wheelchairs and the abatement of mobility allowance. I am not attracted to the principle of an abatement of mobility allowance to provide an alternative improvement elsewhere in the service. The special health authority will be aware of my views upon that point.

In concert with the chairman and vice-chairman, I shall consider future disabled board members at an early date. It is highly likely that other disabled people will be appointed. I must emphasise that they will be appointed not because they are disabled but because they are able, whether or not they are disabled, for they have a big job to do.

The McColl report was primarily concerned with efficiency and stated that substantial savings could be made by a more efficient service. If that proves to be the case, such savings will be available for the special health authority to use as it thinks fit on services for disabled people.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I congratulate my hon. Friend on his positive and far-reaching proposals. They will be widely welcomed, not least by our constituents who have to take advantage of such services. I was glad to hear that he intends to introduce an element of competition into the supply of limbs. Will that competition extend to other forms of equipment? Can the Minister give us some idea of how wide a range of contractors will be given the opportunity of supplying equipment to the service?

Mr. Major: I should be unwise to go too far down that line except to state that, as a matter or principle, for the reasons set out in the McColl report and others, we are committed to wide competition. At present, we are discussing contracts with the present suppliers. My hon. Friend is entirely right to point to the benefits of competition among existing suppliers and, no doubt in the future, among other suppliers as well.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I warmly welcome the ending of the old system of inefficient management control and excessive profits. Will the Minister assure the House that the service will always be geared to providing limbs for the individual, that limbs will not be mass produced and that they will always be free of charge? Does he recognise that a glaring omission from his statement was the need for specialised amputations? That matter was mentioned by McColl, who said that a quarter of amputations are unsatisfactory. One can replace inadequate artificial limbs, but one cannot re-do inadequate amputations. Will the Minister consider the creation of a specialised amputation service?

Mr. Major: I shall certainly discuss the right hon. Gentleman's last point with the special health authority. As the right hon. Gentleman will understand, I am bound to say that it raises far wider matters than those that fall naturally within my remit. Let me make it perfectly clear to the right hon. Gentleman that our policy is that every type of limb should be available to every patient at every centre. We want them to have the best possible limbs that we can provide, for it is critical to their standard and future style of life. That is our clear intention.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Does my hon. Friend recognise that there will be great pleasure at the Government's swift response, once again, to an expert report? However, may I ask him whether the term "appliance services" includes ileostomy and colostomy appliances? Will there be machinery within the new set-up for research into complaints that appliances, such as artificial hands, are unsatisfactory and could be better?

Mr. Major: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for her kind remarks. The service is principally related to artificial limbs, whether upper or lower limbs, and to the wheelchair service. It may also include the artificial eye service, though that has yet to be determined, and the various services for war pensioners, wigs and orthopaedic equipment. It does not include the other specific matters that were mentioned by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The Minister will be aware that we welcome thoroughly the report, as we welcome also the work done by Professor McColl and his working party. One of the conclusions to which the working party was forced to come was that the disabled have been very badly served.

It would be appreciated if the Minister could say this afternoon that the new special health authority will have true independence to say exactly what is needed by the disabled, that it will also have the budgetary capability to deal with what is required and that, tied in with the annual presentation of the special health authority's report to the Minister over the four-year transitional period, it will be possible to have a debate in the House about how the proposals are being implemented. Major criticisms have been made. However, the proof of the pudding will lie in how well the special health authority is allowed to get on with its important job.

Mr. Major: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I am grateful to him for saying it.

As for a debate on this subject, that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, who will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said. No doubt he will contemplate holding a debate both this year and in future years.

As for independence, I touched on that point in my answer to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). The concern and importance that we attach to independence could not be more clearly illustrated than by the appointment of my noble Friend Lord Holderness as chairman. The extent to which we are committed to the principles of the McColl report could not be more clearly illustrated than by the fact that we have invited Professor McColl to serve as vice-chairman of the management board and by the fact that he has accepted.

As for funding, I mentioned in my statement that we shall be protecting the funding during the life of the special health authority and for a short period after it is subsumed within the National Health Service. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's points, well made, have been well met.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): I add my congratulations and thanks to my hon. Friend for his far-reaching statement. The McColl committee was set up originally to look at inherent weaknesses in the artificial limb system that has existed not only for the last 13 months but for many decades, including the period when the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), who was so churlish in his acceptance of this statement, was Minister.

I am somewhat disappointed by my hon. Friend's cautious approach to the monopoly that is enjoyed by a handful of firms whose attitude has been less inclined towards giving a service to clients and patients than towards satisfying DHSS officials who are their ultimate paymasters. It is that more than anything else that led to the setting up of the McColl committee, as I am sure my hon. Friend will recognise.

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend makes some powerful points, though with typical modesty he does not mention that in fact it was he who established the McColl committee some years ago. I believe that many disabled people, both now and in the future, will thank him for having done so.

I take entirely to heart my hon. Friend's remarks about the apparently cautious approach to monopoly. We are in the midst of discussions, and at this moment anything other than a cautious approach would not be well made. However, I emphasise to my hon. Friend and to others that our objective is competition and efficiency in the interests of both the National Health Service and the patients.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Will the Minister say whether the statement made last week for Scotland by his noble Friend Lord Glenarthur reflects the way in which he would have responded had he had the responsibility for the supply of artificial limbs in Scotland and whether the body that he is discussing will have responsibility in Scotland? The Minister will know that the McColl report differentiates clearly between the practices in Scotland, which are to be preferred, and those in England and Wales. Does he agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) that there should be an early debate so that those different practices can be discussed?

As an hon. Member sponsored by the unions with which the Minister's associates will be discussing the proposals, I should like to ask him whether he could arrange a debate, once we know the outcome of those discussions, so that the House can be informed whether those who have been concerned with the supply of limbs are happy with the Minister's statement.

Mr. Major: On the question of a debate, I can only reiterate the remarks that I made a moment ago.

I do not have responsibility for the artificial limb service in Scotland, but I am aware of the provisions in the statement made by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health a few days ago. The special health authority applies to England. For a long time there have been separate systems to deal with the artificial limb and appliance service in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): Is my hon. Friend aware that hon. Members on both sides of the House will be delighted to learn that Lord Holderness has accepted the position of chairman of the new board. As an amputee, he has special insights, and as a former Minister responsible for pensions and national insurance, he will be able to work his way through the bureaucratic jungle. He and Professor McColl will make an extremely strong team.

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am sure that my noble Friend will not only work his way through what my hon. Friend has described as the bureaucratic jungle, but where such a jungle is shown to exist, I am sure that my noble Friend will trample all over it. I share my hon. Friend's view and cannot conceive of a better chairman for the authority than my noble Friend.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Does the Minister agree that one of the valuable by-products of the work of Professor McColl and his colleagues has been the democratic pressures that have been exerted on many of us by people who are chronically disabled and who are waiting for the report to come out and to see what the Government will do? Will he accept that this has brought into action many Members of Parliament who hitherto did not know a great deal about this matter but who have now visited the prosthetists in their workshops, and looked at the chairs.

Have we made a real advance in giving more of the chronically disabled access to the dual-purpose, battery-powered wheelchairs because, when we table questions on it in the House, letter after letter comes to us from a wider grouping of people than we ever thought needed such chairs?

Mr. Major: The early part of the hon. Gentleman's observations are entirely accurate. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed concern and interest in this important report.

As for battery-powered wheelchairs, and indeed wheelchairs generally, one of the principal responses of the McColl report was to suggest that there may be substantial room for improvement in the wheelchair service and possible savings to be made in its organisation and administration. I reiterate the point that I made a moment ago. If those savings are made under the management of the special health authority, they will be available to that authority to use in the wheelchair service or elsewhere in the service of disabled people as it thinks fit.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): In welcoming my hon. Friend's announcement, I should like to thank him especially for the extensive consultation that he has had with all the disabled persons' organisations, outside as well as within the House. I congratulate him on his decision to establish a management structure outside the DHSS, and also on the appointment of Professor McColl as vice-chairman of that structure. Will my hon. Friend pay particular attention to the use of modern technology in the design and fitting of wheelchairs and artificial limbs?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his earlier remarks. I can confirm that we shall take his latter remarks to heart.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In view of the fact that one of my constituents, a heavily built middle-aged lady, had to wait the best part of a year for her right leg, and in the light of the statement this afternoon, which we welcome, when can she and others expect a real improvement in fitting, provision and servicing — immediately, in a few months, or after a couple of years?

Mr. Major: The changes that have been made in recent months are already showing a substantial improvement. If the hon. Gentleman's constituent, or, indeed, a constituent of any hon. Member, finds herself in that sort of circumstance, I hope that hon. Members will draw it speedily to my attention. We now have a management structure which should ensure speedy treatment for those who fall into the circumstances set out by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellence of the Government's positive response which will give great encouragement to the disabled and those who work with the disabled. I know that he is aware that one of the problems facing disabled people is the difficulty of obtaining appointments at limb centres and then of obtaining transport to and from them. Has he any initiatives in mind to ease that problem?

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is entirely right. One of the principal operational problems for disabled people has been, first, obtaining an appointment and then finding the transport to take them to the appointment and home again. In both instances we have management initiatives in mind which we think will substantially ease and solve those problems. That will be welcome. I am also considering a specific budget to be administered locally by the artificial limb and appliance centres to deal specifically with transport problems.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the reasoning behind the Minister's statement today about implementing the recommendations in the McColl report to try to provide a better, quicker and more effective service at the point of delivery for people who lose limbs in the mining industry and industry generally, as many of my constituents have done? The Minister is prepared to set up a new authority which obviously has quango implications.

Will the hon. Gentleman bear in mind that scores of workers at Hanger want to return to work to provide limbs quickly and efficiently? Indeed, they could do so if only the Minister or one of his colleagues visited the management there and intervened, as the Government have done in some issues recently. The Government are well known for getting involved in all sorts of dramas and crises. Why do not the Government tell the management that they want the limbs produced more quickly and that the way to do it is to get those men and women back to work?

Mr. Major: We certainly require the limbs more speedily, which is why we have set up arrangements for there to be daily contact with the company. I am pleased to tell the hon. Gentleman that that objective is being met increasingly. However, it would be neither productive nor proper for me to intervene directly in the dispute. Our objective is the one that the hon. Gentleman accurately set out: we need a better service for the disabled.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I welcome my hon. Friend's responsive and caring statement. Any improvements in limb fitting are to be particularly welcomed. One of my constituents had three replacement limbs, none of which fitted properly and she had to go to Scotland to get them done properly. I congratulate my hon. Friend and thank him on behalf of all disabled people.

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is absolutely right; the fitting of a limb is absolutely critical to the well-being of the patient. That is why we seek to improve the prosthetic training and to provide in-service prosthetic training for prosthetists already in service.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): In view of the Minister's welcome references to the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, does he accept that the sections which deal with assessments will be particularly helpful to the various committees that he mentioned and to Professor McColl in identifying individual needs at a given stage in the life of disabled people? Can he tell the House when the orders will be introduced?

Mr. Major: I am not sure that that follows either from what I said or from my statement. Suffice it to say that I hope to be able to announce shortly that some of the provisions will be operative. I cannot elaborate on that at present. I think that the hon. Gentleman's intervention was ingenious.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): May I press my hon. Friend on the dual-purpose, indoor-outdoor wheelchair? One of the discussions around the report was about young people who suffer from diseases which will shorten their life expectancy. What is the position of the fairly rapid provision of suitable wheelchairs for those people?

Mr. Major: I assume that my hon. Friend has in mind patients suffering from muscular dystrophy and similar afflictions. Today I cannot say precisely what the position will be on that. It is a matter which we shall wish to discuss with the chairman and other members of the special health authority. Clearly, there are particular technical and design difficulties with such a wheelchair, apart from the other problems, of which my hon. Friend will be aware.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that the artificial limb and appliance centres now serve a different and aging population compared with that which the centres were introduced to serve in 1915? While one welcomes the recognition in his statement of the needs of war pensioners, they are now only a minority of the users of the service. Is he aware that his statement will be warmly welcomed by those who want to see an effective and up-to-date service for the disabled?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her remarks. She is right; the artificial limb and appliance centres now treat a different clientele from what would have been their typical clientele a few years ago. In recent years the improvement in the service has been substantial, and I am grateful to the many staff who work in the service who have helped to bring it about.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I welcome my hon. Friend's response to the McColl report. Does he agree, particularly in view of the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), that the time now appears to have come when contracts for the supply of artificial limbs should be put out to competitive tender?

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend is glancing a little into the future, but the underlying principle of his remarks is one that I cannot but acknowledge.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): As a member of the Social Services Select Committee with a particular interest in this area, and having recently met Professor Kennaway of Imperial college and Dr. Montgomery of the University of London, may I tell my hon. Friend that his statement will be warmly welcomed by all those with any knowledge of the disabled and of those who need artificial limbs and appliances?

Will my hon. Friend take on board two points which need immediate priority attention? The first concerns the training of prosthetists, which is of the utmost importance. Will he give further consideration to that? The second is that it is now time that the facilities of the companies that supply the DHSS are increased so that limbs are not just available for those who need them, but are made to suit the patients. That is long overdue.

Mr. Major: My hon. Friend has a long-standing interest in this matter, so I am especially grateful for his support. We are seeking to conclude the work of the working party studying the training of prosthetists as speedily as possible and I hope that we can carry its recommendations into effect with the objectives that my hon. Friend set out. I entirely take my hon. Friend's point about competition, which is an important one.

Mr. Alfred Morris: As the Minister knows, my principal concern today, indeed my duty, was to reflect the many worries expressed to me by disabled people and their organisations. I fully accept, and I hope the whole House will appreciate, the importance of the role of the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) in this matter.

With regard to a debate, will the Minister join me in an appeal to the Leader of the House, who has been an interested observer today—he is in reflective mood—for parliamentary time to look in more detail at decisions which are so deeply important to severely disabled people?

Mr. Major: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. As to joining the right hon. Gentleman in an appeal to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, I am sure that his appeal is sufficiently powerful and that it will have been noted.

Prime Minister's Question Time

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During Prime Minister's Questions it has always been the norm that the Leader of the Opposition puts two questions to the Prime Minister. That is generally accepted by the House. In recent weeks it has become obvious that that norm has become three questions; the right hon. Gentleman is putting three questions to the Prime Minister. Can you persuade the Leader of the Opposition to revert to the previous practice when two questions were the norm and that three questions were the exception? Prime Minister's Question Time is short enough for Back-Bench Members without having three or four interventions from the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before you give your response to the hon. Gentleman, I ask you to bear in mind that, even if it were the norm in the past—which I do not accept—for there to be only two questions, that was probably when Prime Ministers answered the first question. We now have a Prime Minister who refuses to answer any questions put to her, so it is understandable that my right hon. Friend has to ask several questions.

Mr. Speaker: There has always been a dispensation for the Leader of the Opposition, and three questions have been the norm in this Parliament rather than two, but nevertheless it is true—[Interruption.]

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Four.

Mr. Speaker: Not four. It is perfectly true that I am anxious to call as many Back-Bench Members as possible. The problem today was that there were very long supplementary questions.

Non-Public Limited Companies (Appointment of Directors)

4.11 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to give shareholders who hold in their own name twenty-five per cent. or more of a non-public limited company's shares the right to be appointed a director of the company.

In order to present to the House clear and logical reasons for my proposed change in company law, I shall describe the experience of shareholders in a non-public limited company in Tayside. This situation has brought me much personal sadness and it highlights clearly the problems that exist.

The individuals involved are all good friends of mine, and one is a close relative. They are all aware that I shall be outlining their experiences and problems, which they and I believe may be repeated many times throughout Tayside, and many hundreds of times throughout the United Kingdom.

In the late 1960s three young men purchased an aircraft. The objective was to obtain inexpensive flying. They formed a company called Aerosport Ltd. Since that time I have been an unpaid adviser to that company. In 1971 more funds were required and two more flying club members were invited to join the company. At that time, my relative, Mr. Walker, joined the company.

In 1978 a new company was formed with six shareholders. At that time, the main shareholders were part-time executive directors; each of the directors, with one exception were in full-time employment outside the company. The one full-time director was an ex-Royal Air Force flying instructor, who was the chief pilot and chief flying instructor. Those posts are essential under aviation law. The other directors built up the business by devoting summer evenings and weekends to the running of the company; they were working at their hobby.

In 1982 one of the part-time directors, Mr. Fraser, who was also a founder member and chairman of the company, lost his full-time job. The garage firm of which he was managing director had severe financial problems and was closed down. He was out of work and desperate for an income. On my advice, a full-time post was created for him within the company.

Shortly after that the ex-RAF instructor left and the company was left with four shareholders, one of whom was Mr. Fraser, for whom a full-time job had been created. he held just over 33⅓ per cent. of the shares and was a director. Another person who had a full-time job with Air Service Training was the chief pilot. He held just under 33⅓ per cent. of the shares; he also was a director.

The third major shareholder, Mr. Walker, devoted every summer evening and summer weekend to the company, and he had done that since 1971. He held about 30 per cent. of the equity and was the third director.

The last shareholder held only a few shares and he had not seen or been near the company for many years.

At the 1984 annual general meeting of the company Mr. Walker — who, as I said earlier, had devoted all his spare time to the company — was, without notice or warning, not re-elected to the board.

The company has never paid a dividend. That was done by agreement, and all the profits were invested in new aircraft and property. The part-time directors had paid themselves only a small director's fee — the perk was cheap flying. The ex-director has now lost his fee and cheap flying.

In the 1984 accounts the three directors' fees, including salary for the full-time director, amounted to £18,400. In the 1985 accounts, the two directors' fees and full-time salary appeared as £22,300. With one director less, that meant a massive increase for the remaining two. In addition, a new item was a £1,100 contribution for a pension for the full-time director.

All of that information is in the public domain. It can be obtained from Company House records. That is why I have no hesitation in disclosing it. What the records cannot show is the way in which the company assets have been built up by voluntary work over many years, while the full-time director has massively increased the expenses of the company, and his wife is also a part-time employee of the company.

The auditor for the company, Mr. J. L. Hope, advises the two remaining directors, acts for them at annual general meetings and prevents the ex-director from obtaining trading accounts and trading information. That can happen to anyone who has massive shares in a private company.

On the advice of the auditor, in 1984 the ex-director was offered the opportunity to sell his shares to the other remaining directors. The offer was made at £3·50 per share. Only a couple of months ago, Mr. Gillespie, the part-time director, who is soon to take up a post with Loganair, offered his shares to the remaining shareholders. The other shareholders—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but this is not an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Walker: I asked permission to introduce this point, Mr. Speaker, and it is an important fundamental matter of law. There must be hard evidence to prove what I am saying—I have discussed this with the Minister—and it is the hard evidence that I am producing.

The part-time director, Mr. Gillespie, offered his shares to the remaining shareholders for £11 per share. He did so via the company auditor. Nothing has happened to improve the value of the shares. In fact, the massive increase in expenses has probably made the company substantially less profitable. The full-time director has said that he will pay £11 per share and retain the former director, Mr. Gillespie, as a part-time director.

The ex-director has the option—this is the important point—of buying half of the shares on offer at £11 per share and still have no seat on the board, no say in the running of the company, no cheap flying and no prospect of ever being paid a dividend, yet he can hold over 45 per cent. of the equity of the company. That is not a realistic situation. His only other recourse under the law is to apply to have the company liquidated, claiming that his minority interests have not been protected. Everyone expects that to happen.

Such an option can be tortuous, expensive and acrimonious. That is why there is a need to provide the opportunity, in situations such as this or in family businesses, for shareholders to find an alternative and viable course of action.

I hope that the House can see the sense in a shareholder who holds over 25 per cent. of the equity of a company, and who holds the shares in his own name, being given the option, because that is what it will be, to demand as of right a seat on the board. The existence of such an option will bring realism into what at present can be unrealistic and often stupid situations. It could prevent the complete bust of a company. It would provide the opportunity for directors to take more account of minority interests; it would make shareholders and directors more responsive to the needs of the company and more aware of the realities of modern trading conditions. Directors would learn to operate within a boardroom where one of the directors asked penetrating and searching questions about expenses.

Public limited company law has had to be changed—this is the important point, and you will be aware, Mr. Speaker, of my interest in public limited company law—to bring the law up to date with modern conditions that are reflected in the City and the problems of the City.

Now is the time to bring non-public limited company law up to date to reflect more properly the conditions where more and more people are setting up small companies and where the law governing the accountability of directors requires a more professional and businesslike attitude in the boardroom.

That is why I ask the leave of the House to bring in my Bill, which may, even now, be too late for the company whose problems I have outlined. Yet its experience could and should be prevented. That can be done if my Bill is accepted.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bill Walker, Mr. Albert McQuarrie, Mr. Gordon Wilson, Mr. Jack Aspinwall and Mr. Peter Bruinvels.

Non-Public Limited Companies (Appointment of Directors)

Mr. Bill Walker accordingly presented a Bill to give shareholders who hold in their own name twenty-five per cent. or more of a non-public limited company's shares the right to be appointed a director of the company: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 1 May and to be printed. [Bill 108.]

Orders of the Day

Debtors (Scotland) Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

4.20 pm

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill reforms and modernises the law on debt enforcement in Scotland. It is the first comprehensive review and reform of the procedures for recovery of unpaid debts since 1838 when the previous Debtors (Scotland) Act became law. The reforms are designed to protect debtors from undue hardship and distress and to provide effective ways in which creditors can obtain payment of the debts due to them. In particular, the most resented aspects of warrant sales are abolished.

On almost every occasion that I have answered questions in the House once a month the reform of warrant sales has invariably been raised. This Second Reading debate is in no sense party political, but I am bound to say that I am a little disappointed that Members, such as the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), who have harangued me month after month about this matter have not thought fit to attend to give even a partial welcome to the changes that are being introduced.

The arrestment of earnings is reformed with the introduction of a new system of arrestment. New court orders are introduced which safeguard debtors by giving them time to pay their debts without the immediate threat of enforcement procedures, and the arrangements for the discipline and control of sheriff officers and messengers-at-arms are improved.

The Bill implements the principal recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission in its report on diligence and debtor protection and I am sure that the House would want us to pay tribute to the detailed consideration given by the commission in producing its most extensive report to date.

Indeed, as I have said over recent years in the House and outside, some criticism has been directed at the commission for the delay in bringing forward the report. However, anyone who has read the two volumes of the report and considered the research and the scholarship required to complete that report will, I am sure, readily appreciate why the work necessarily took so much time.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I have been one of those who from time to time have referred to the extraordinary delay in what is a highly complex area. Because the report has been in existence for some time it may not have taken account of the worrying development that, with the use of plastic credit cards, there is an upsurge of debt throughout Scotland. In my constituency work many more debt cases are coming my way. What do the Government wish to do to try to control such credit being given to people who are not able to cope with it and are then placed in a position of misery before moving on to this Bill, which deals with the enforcement of debtor provision in a much more humane fashion, but dealing with many more people than would have been the case one, two or three years ago?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I readily appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. All hon. Members will be aware that, with the increase in the opportunities for credit, particularly through the use, as the hon. Gentleman describes it, of plastic money, there is the greater prospect of people bringing together debts which they cannot meet. The hon. Gentleman may have in mind a survey in one Scottish Sunday newspaper which demonstrated that an unemployed 18-year-old could, by a judicious movement around Sauchiehall street and elsewhere in Glasgow, by lunchtime put together credit approaching £2,000. It is not difficult to see that at the end of the day such a person would be unlikely to be able to make a regular payment on those debts, and would accordingly run into difficulties.

However, having said that and acknowledging that some people may have such a problem, it may not agree with the hon. Gentleman's political philosophy, but I should have thought that the rest of us would recognise that it is important to consider credit on a United Kingdom basis rather than an exclusively Scottish one. I think that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that for the time being. However, he will understand that the Bill is concerned with dealing with debt in Scotland once it has occurred.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his use of the word "humane". Overall, the arrangements set out are undoubtedly a marked improvement on what at present obtains and they can properly be characterised as humane.

Diligence may be a term unusual or unknown to non-Scots lawyers, and that may include Scottish Members as well as hon. Members from south of the border, but, in essence, it is the definition of the methods of enforcing unpaid debts due usually under decrees of Scottish courts. Once a court has granted a decree for payment of the debt, two commonly used forms of diligence are available to creditors — the diligence of poinding and warrant sale, and the diligence of arrestment, particularly of earnings. It may assist in this complicated matter if I briefly describe each of those diligences.

The first main diligence with which the Bill deals is that of poinding and sale. The word "poinding" means simply the seizing or impounding of the moveable goods of the debtor. The goods are left in the debtor's possession until they are sold but only after the authority of the sheriff has been obtained. The goods are sold by public auction and the proceeds of the sale put forward in satisfaction of the debt. If the goods are not sold because no bids were made above the value set on them at the poinding the goods are handed over to the creditor to the extent necessary to satisfy the debt owed to him. The diligence is carried out by an officer of the court — a messenger-at-arms in the case of a court of session decree or a sheriff officer in the case of a sheriff court decree — and some of the procedures followed are supervised by the sheriff.

The second main diligence with which the Bill is concerned is that of arrestment of earnings. That is the procedure by which a creditor can attach in the hands of the debtor's employer wages due to the debtor on the next pay day. At present, before the money can be released to the creditor, either the debtor must give his consent or the creditor must raise what is described as an action of furthcoming. The problem is that repeated arrestments may be necessary on successive pay days until the creditor has recovered what is due to him since the arrestment will only attach money due to the debtor on the appropriate pay day.

I expect that some hon. Members are familiar with the complaints that are made to me about the existing procedure. The debtor employee is deeply concerned that successive arrestments made on his wages each week are cumulative in their effect and believes that after a short period he will be wholly deprived of any income coming in at the end of the week. On the other hand, the debtor's employer is more than a little irritated by the barrage of weekly arrestments that are placed on him. It is not difficult to see that his bookkeeping department or wages clerk eventually becomes snowed under.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): It is not only that the imposition of the wage arrestment can damage an individual's interests within the work place; such an order may damage the prospects of promotion and advancement in the company. So wage arrestment is a major penalty imposed upon a person.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I elaborated on two complaints of which I am aware about the existing arrangements for arrestment of earnings and later I will come to the changes and reforms that are to be introduced, which are a significant, possibly underplayed improvement in the legislative proposal. That is part and parcel of what I am saying about the irritation of the employer. He cannot understand why, in connection with someone who might otherwise, so far as he is concerned, be a perfectly satisfactory employee, his wages department is constantly under this barrage of arrestments from a solicitor, or whoever it may be, clogging up the machinery. I think that what we shall be introducing will be something that the hon. Gentleman, and indeed hon. Members generally, will welcome.

The Bill deals with the reform of these two diligences in parts II and III. In doing so, however, the Bill takes account of the fact, pointed out by the Scottish Law Commission in its report, that questions of debt raise social problems as much as or more than legal problems. The commission is to be congratulated on the fact that, having recognised the extent of these social problems, it began its study of diligence by commissioning an extensive programme of research on the nature, scale and social aspects of diligence and debt recovery. It also issued five detailed consultative memoranda, which were widely circulated, in order to ensure that the comments of all interested in these important matters were taken account of by the commission in framing its recommendations. These recommendations were the subjct of a yet further consultation undertaken by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate. The Bill has, I am sure, greatly benefited from this extensive consultation and from the commission's thorough and helpful analysis of the problems which arise.

The commission pointed out in its report that the recovery of debts, especially those due by individuals, falls naturally into three stages. The first stage is that at which the creditor makes informal attempts to collect the debt, such as — some of us will be familiar with this — the issuing of a series of warning letters seeking repayment. The second stage is that which begins when a court action for payment is raised. The third stage is when the court decree for payment is followed by further informal attempts at collection or ultimately the enforcement of the decree by diligence. The protracted process of debt recovery acts as a kind of filter, so that the vast majority of debts are settled in the informal stages and only a very small proportion of debts reach the stage of diligence. Indeed, if there is an underlying and unifying theme in these, as I readily recognise, complicated provisions, it is to improve that filter effect from the time when the informal approaches begin through to the ultimate enforcement processes.

In the case of poinding and warrant sales, only a tiny fraction involve a warrant sale. In 1985, for instance, of some 80,000 debt decrees granted by Scottish courts, 16,500 proceeded to a poinding, 6,000 to a warrant of sale and only 700 to the warrant sale itself. It is right to point out that that figure of 700 includes one third which are commercial sales in shops, offices and so on, as well as household sales. It is important to recognise that these stages of debt recovery are not separate but interrelated. The early stages would be ineffective in eliciting payment if the later stages did not exist. If the earlier stages were ineffective, more cases would, as a consequence, proceed to the later stages. As a result, the commission arrived at the conclusion, with which the Government agree, that the enforcement procedure must retain the ultimate possibility of the warrant sale as a necessary spur to payment in the great majority of cases which are settled at an early stage.

Those consulted by the commision generally agreed that the primary aim of reform should be to introduce new safeguards protecting debtors subject to diligence from undue economic hardship and personal distress and from the continuing threat of diligence even where instalment arrangements have been made.

Looking at the whole complicated matter, the commission considered the possible introduction of a number of different procedures which would involve discretionary control of diligence in order to provide safeguards for debtors. Such safeguards included possible discretionary power to a court to control the enforcement of a debt.

Another possibility was safeguards by operation of law, such as exemptions of particular types of property or categories or levels of income from diligence, or immunity from diligence for particular classes of debtor. However, the commission, at the end of its discussion of the merits of such an approach, rejected those various options. It concluded that the preferred reform was to introduce discretionary control of diligence by the ordinary courts on voluntary application by the debtor.

The first of these reforms—time-to-pay arrangements—is contained in part I of the Bill. This provides important safeguards for debtors who are unable to pay their debts outright. As I have indicated, and as hon. Members will see if they care to look at the commission's report, the evidence which the commission gathered suggested that most debtors subject to diligence are unable rather than unwilling to pay the debt outright and can pay only by instalments. So far as the social aspect of debt in Scotland is concerned, those who are interested might care to look at what is set out in the Law Commission's report beginning at paragraph 263, where it analyses in great detail exactly where the problem lies.

At present, the possibility of the later stages of the diligence of poinding and warrant sale, especially the advertisements of sales in debtors' homes, can sometimes induce debtors to agree to arrangements for payment by instalments at a level which they frankly cannot meet. In addition, only restricted use is apparently made of the right to apply for a summary cause instalment degree and there is at present no means whereby debtors can obtain an extension of time to pay, free from the threat of immediate or further diligence by others.

Part I of the Bill gives effect to the recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission to enable debtors in most cases to have more time to pay their debts free from the threat of diligence. There will be two types of order, and I appreciate that this may be somewhat confusing. The first is a time-to-pay direction, which will be available in both the Court of Session and the sheriff court when the decree is granted. In essence, these orders will replace the existing instalment decree, which, as I have just shown, is at present available only in sheriff court summary causes where the amount involved is less than £1,000.

The second type of order is the time-to-pay order, which will be granted by the court at a later stage in the debt recovery process and will have the effect of converting an existing open decree into one in which the sum due can be paid by instalments or by way of a deferred lump sum.

Mr. Wilson: In relation to the proposed instalment decree, will any guidance or direction be given to sheriffs or Court of Session judges in relation to the appropriate instalment to be paid, or will it be left for them to decide at their own discretion? It may well be, of course, that it would be very difficult to get any degree of regularity in payments from one court to another. It may depend, likewise, upon the individual views of individual sheriffs, and that might not be helpful.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. The short answer must be that the individual circumstances will vary so much that it would be very difficult to set out any schedule, as we do, for example, in relation to earnings arrestments and as are contained in the schedule to this Bill. What is important, and what should be recognised by those who possibly have hitherto been attracted by debt arrangement schemes, is that the opportunity is given at both stages—first at the time of decree and subsequently by the sheriff—to look at the means of the debtor, not only at his income but also at his outgoings, and say that payment can be made by instalments within a stated period or that nothing need be paid for the time being but that the debt must be paid later.

It would seem that the arrangement opens up an attractive opportunity. As the evidence of the Scottish Law Commission demonstrates, it is unusual for people to have two decrees coming together at exactly the same moment; they may be a matter of months apart and at different stages. If, in relation to one, there is an instalment decree being met and the debtor is paying that off, it would be open, sensible and desirable for the sheriff to say, "As you have concluded your payments in four months' time, thereafter you will start paying £x a week on the latest decree against you."

Mr. Wilson: As the hon. and learned Gentleman will appreciate, under the late and much lamented small debt procedure which had the great advantage of flexibility there was a going rate at which sheriffs would tend to grant an instalment decree and refuse a request for an open decree for those representing the creditors. However, would the hon. and learned Gentleman look further at the proposition of the sheriff being able to take into account the outgoings as well as the income? Where does he think the judicial time for this will be found? Would it be possible for the Scottish Courts Administration to set up a unit in each sheriff court that might be able to do that work so that the sheriff gets the information put to him, bearing in mind that the debtor will probably not be represented in court, or could such cases be referred to the citizens advice bureaux which already have a substantial role in giving help to debtors when they face an accumulation of bills coming in at the same time?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: One of the matters not included in the Bill but which is probably desirable — it happens in England — is for the citizens advice bureaux and the Scottish Consumer Council to develop, on a voluntary basis, a debt counselling scheme. If such work were to be done by those bodies — it is an interesting idea — there would certainly be an opportunity not simply to look to the debtor's income, which would be remarkably crude in approach, but to look to the balance of his income and the necessary outgoings.

One thing surprised me about the approach of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson). My practice at the Bar did not include debt matters, but it did include consistorial matters. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that when one was arguing before the court trying to arrive at what was an appropriate level of interim aliment to be paid, one looked not simply at the husband's income but at his necessary outgoings. On that basis, it is virtually impossible to arrive at any precise calculation of what should be done.

Mr. Wilson: I had some experience of the small debt court. The Solicitor-General has obviously been deprived of such experience. However, does he realise that a big court could take 150 cases in a morning, mostly heard in the absence of the parties? The time available to the sheriffs for that purpose is limited and I cannot imagine them welcoming means tests. It is entirely different from consistorial cases where one will be given an allocation of time before the court. In small debt work, as now under the summary decrees, and so on, many cases go through and, even allowing for the changes in procedures whereby people do not have to be present, judicial time is not available.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I do not want to protract this matter unduly, but I do not see why within our court system, in the sheriff court, there is not the opportunity to look sensibly at instalments so that those who can pay can come forward and say, "I can afford £5 or £10 a week, broadly speaking, and this is how I get to that figure." That would allow the court to come quickly to a conclusion as to whether that was right. It is important, as I said earlier, that they should not be under any undue pressure to offer too large an instalment fee. However, it would be open to the sheriff's clerk to give some assistance with the application.

While the provision of the time-to-pay arrangements is an important new safeguard, it is of course necessary to consider whether improvements are needed in the diligence procedures themselves to deal with those cases where the debt has to be enforced.

On the matter of diligence of poinding and warrant sale, the commission was strongly urged by some consultees that on social grounds abolition was required rather than reform. The commission rejected the proposal of abolition. It pointed out that some of the demands for abolition were based on misunderstandings. The diligence is not an anachronistic hangover from a harsher, earlier era. It is not peculiar to Scotland, since enforcement against movable property is permissible in every country of whose practice the commission was aware. Indeed, in England creditors rely to a greater extent apparently on enforcement against goods as compared with enforcement against earnings.

Further, the commission recognised that every society which considers that people able to pay their debts should be required to do so must have recourse to modes of enforcement which are necessarily coercive. These are limited to diligence against the debtor's person — that is civil imprisonment, which in large measure, this Bill abolishes — or diligence against the debtor's heritable or movable property or his income. The commission considered that abolition was feasible only if an alternative method of enforcement could be devised which was as effective and more socially acceptable. In paragraph 2.145 the commission concluded:

"Having considered the matter anxiously and at length, we believe that such an alternative cannot be devised."

Having considered the commission's arguments very carefully, the Government are convinced that the right approach must be to retain the diligence of poinding and warrant sale and to adopt the commission's approach. That rejects the introduction of undiscriminating legislation abolishing the diligence or exempting all consumer debtors or all household goods from its operation. However — I stress this — the Bill reforms the diligence so that its impact on debtors is made as humane as is possible consistent with the need to retain the effectiveness of the diligence as a method of eliciting payment from debtors who can but will not pay their debts. The Government consider that the commission has struck a proper balance between the interests of debtors and creditors.

That approach was broadly endorsed by the Scottish Consumer Council, among others, which commented in the consultation undertaken by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate:

"We have considered the arguments for and against retaining some residual power of enforcement against a debtor's goods. We conclude that it is necessary to have such a residual power to prevent abuses and act as an ultimate sanction to encourage payment."

Possibly more surprisingly, but similarly, the Scottish Council for Civil Liberties submitted to the Scottish Law Commission in 1983 its comments on the reform proposed. It said that when it came to consider the detailed legislative proposals it recognised

"the great distinction between ameliorating the worst consequences of civil diligence for those who cannot pay and legislating against poverty itself."

The council concluded that "there was no practical prospect that the abolition of the warrant sale would have a real effect on poverty, except in the context of much wider reforms of a kind not in prospect at this date."

The council had

"the gravest doubts about alternative proposals, including the establishment of debt counselling schemes as a method of enforcement."

Our objective is to see the creation of a coherent statutory policy towards poinding and arrestment that provides all the protections at present available to those who have access to skilled advice and assistance.

While the Scottish Council for Civil Liberties may not regard it as much of a compliment, I wholly endorse the view expressed in that last passage. It demonstrates an important distinction that it would be proper to maintain both now and later in Committee. There seems to be some confusion of nomenclature in the various stages—debt counselling on an informal voluntary basis, a debt arrangement scheme and debt arbitration as a substitute for all the other enforcement procedures.

One of the main reforms within the existing framework of warrant sales is that exemptions from poinding of household goods are widened. When the Bill was considered in another place, these exemptions were further clarified and widened by, for example, the inclusion of tools needed for the maintenance and repair of the dwelling house and household items. When executing poindings, sheriff officers are not to be allowed to enter a house where there is nobody present, or where only children under the age of 16 are present, without giving four days notice.

Greater opportunities are provided for debtors to redeem goods at their appraised value. This is the price that they would be likely to fetch if sold on the open market. Debtors can apply to the sheriff to release items from the poindings on the ground that their inclusion, on a broad equitable test, is unduly harsh. Sheriffs can recall a poinding on a number of grounds or, at a later stage of the procedure, refuse to grant a warrant for the sale of the poinded goods. A poinding is to last for no longer than one year unless the period is extended to allow the making of payment by instalments. Of particular importance are the changes with regard to the warrant sale.

If there is a matter which has excited anxiety and emotion in this House, it has not been diligence generally but the warrant sale itself. Warrant sales of poinded household goods will in future normally take place in auction rooms without the debtor being publicly identified. The sight of people in Scotland out on the street with a few sticks of their belongings, their circumstances having been widely advertised in their local newspapers, has caused distress. It has attached to our whole system of diligence the description of medieval or barbaric. It is wrong to describe the whole system in that way, but I have no doubt that removing this requirement of sale in a person's own home is an extremely important and humane reform.

A further amendment which the Government brought forward in the other place was to ensure that, where the consent of an occupier is sought to the sale taking place in a dwelling house rather than in a sale room, the consent of every occupier is needed. The Government consider that in total these are substantial reforms which strike the proper balance between the retention of the warrant sale as a spur to payment and the removal of the most resented aspects of the diligence, together with the introduction of new safeguards for the debtor.

I now pass to the question of arrestment of earnings to which the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has already referred. It was plain that reform was needed of the system of earnings arrestment and these reforms are contained in part III. That part introduces three new forms of continuous diligence against earnings: earnings arrestments for ordinary debts; current maintenance arrestments for aliment and periodical allowance; and conjoined arrestment orders in cases where two or more creditors wish to arrest a debtor's earnings. The arrestment of funds or property other than earnings is not affected by the Bill. At present, an arrestment of earnings attaches to the debtor's earnings due at the next pay day but does not affect the earnings due on a later pay day. The result is that futher arrestments may be needed to obtain payment of a debt.

Moreover, the proportion of a person's earnings in any pay period which is exempt from earnings for an ordinary debt is too low, being half the balance over £4 per week, and probably does not leave enough in some cases for the debtor to live on. In the case of an arrestment enforcing aliment or rates, the whole pay could be attached, leaving the debtor with nothing.

In the new form of earnings arrestment enforcing ordinary debts, the deductions from earnings are set out in the three tables contained in schedule 2 to the Bill. One of the other two forms of arrestments against earnings is the current maintenance arrestment to recover maintenance as it falls due. Such arrangements will be of considerable assistance to a particularly vulnerable group of creditors in the community—dependent spouses or ex-spouses and their children. These changes will enable this group to enforce payment of the maintenance they require as they require it without, as at present, having to wait for arrears to mount up.

I am sure that I can draw on the experience of hon. Members who are, like me, frequently approached by those who have suddenly built up vast arrears of aliment or maintenance and they cannot see a way of clearing them and the problem gets worse. With this new arrangement I trust that payments will be made contemporaneously without that grim eventually coming about.

There are also detailed arrangements in the Bill to deal with what are described as conjoined arrestment orders. Essentially, this extremely complicated part of the Bill ensures that there should not be what is described as a race for diligence. Where more than one creditor seeks diligence, these arrangements will allow more than one creditor to share simultaneously in the debtor's earnings and, simultaneously, for an orderly payment of his obligations in cases of multiple debt—a condition about which Labour Members have expressed interest.

Under a conjoined arrestment order, the employer will be required to make deductions from earnings computed in accordance with the rules of earnings arrestment and current maintenance arrestments, as the case may be, and to pay them to the sheriff clerk, who will disburse those sums to the competing creditors rateably in proportion to the amount of their debts. Schedule 2 shows what sum is affordable out of it. That is paid out to the sheriff clerk, who then takes over the administration.

Mr. Alexander Pollock (Moray): In that context, what is the role of the Inland Revenue and the priority claims of which it has had the benefit under current legislation? May I take it from what my hon. and learned Friend has said that the Inland Revenue will no longer be able to exercise that right over the priority claim, or does he intend to deal with that elsewhere?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I wish that my hon. Friend could have drawn that from what I have been saying. I know from correspondence that my hon. Friend had with me last year about a constituent company that he was aware that the Scottish Law Commission had proposed that the Crown's prior claim for arrears of rates and taxes in proceeds of diligence by another creditor should be abolished. The Government agreed that the state of the law was unsatisfactory. The prior claim for rates has been abolished, bringing into line the position on rates on both sides of the border. However, the prior claim for tax was also considered in the context of the Keith report on the enforcement powers of the revenue departments. The report applied to the United Kingdom as a whole. The Government are consulting on the Keith recommendations as a whole and have proposed that the prior claim should be retained but should be restricted to one year's arrears of PAYE.

My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate has arranged for all interested parties in Scotland to have an opportunity to comment on the prior claim. In the circumstances, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Moray (Mr. Pollock) appreciates that it would be inappropriate to bring forward legislation at this stage. Having offered him that opportunity for comment and consultation, and knowing of his previous interest in this matter, I shall doubtless be hearing from him in the near future.

Part IV contains provisions relating to the diligence and priorities for enforcing rates, taxes and Crown debts. Enforcement of rates and tax debts under summary warrants granted by the sheriff will continue to be undertaken by sheriff officers. Summary warrant poindings and sales will be in the same general form as ordinary poindings and sales but with necessary changes, and the diligence of arrestment is to be available for summary warrants for tax arrears as well as rates arrears. Civil imprisonment for non-payment of tax penalties, rates and most civil fines and penalties due to the Crown is abolished.

Part V introduces reforms of the arrangements for the appointment, training, control and discipline of officers of court. The Government agreed with the commission's recommendation that the present system of independent contractor officers of court should not be replaced by a system of salaried court officials. The Bill provides for the setting up of a new body — the Advisory Council on Messengers-at-Arms and Sheriff Officers—whose duty is to advise the Court of Session on the making of rules with regard to the regulation of organisation, training, conduct, and so on. Sheriffs principal are to have the power to order routine inspection of the work of officers of court.

Debt collection by officers of court is also subject to further regulation by the Bill. Officers are at present prohibited from enforcing debts due to themselves and this prohibition is to be extended to enforcement on behalf of members of their family, business associates and firms or companies in which they have a controlling interest. Officers of court are expressly prohibited from using their official designations when collecting debts before the creditor has obtained a court decree against the debtor. Officers are required to have the authorisation of the sheriff principal before seeking payment of a debt in a private capacity or through a debt collection agency. That issue may not arouse so much emotion as it did eight or nine years ago. Nevertheless, it is an important and worthwhile change.

Part VI contains provisions dealing with warrants for diligence and charges for payment. These are essentially technical provisions.

Part VII contains miscellaneous and general provisions. These include provisions to assist the debtor in proceedings under the Act. No court dues are to be payable to the court by a debtor in connection with proceedings under the Act and, if requested by the debtor, the sheriff clerk is required to provide him with information as to the procedures under the Act. Further, the Bill empowers the Court of Session to make court rules which may provide that a party to the sheriff court proceedings under any provision of the Bill may be represented, in such circumstances as may be specified in the rules, by someone who is neither an advocate nor a solicitor.

Hon. Members will be aware that there has been for a considerable number of years a general desire to reform the law relating to enforcement of debts so as to achieve a proper balance between the interests of debtors and of creditors. The Bill introduces the necessary reforms. They are necessarily complicated and detailed. Nevertheless, I trust that they will be widely welcomed on both sides of the House as achieving a long-desired and necessary reform of the law of Scotland.

5.2 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The Opposition give a general welcome to the Bill, although we should have liked to see more meat on its bones. It is a slightly more tepid piece of drafting than we wanted. The Solicitor-General for Scotland might wish to respond to our regret that the Law Commission's sensible proposals have not been met in full. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not reassure us. It would be interesting if he told us why the Government have decided not to take on board all the Law Commission's proposals, some of which are very important.

My hon. Friends would like to go beyond what the Law Commission suggested on some issues. Some were discussed by Labour Members in another place and will not be new to the Solicitor-General for Scotland who, I am sure, is studying them carefully. I cannot disguise, nor would I wish to hide, the Labour party's distaste for warrant sales in any shape or form. We want them to end. If the Bill is acceptable in the meantime, it is because it has moved just a bit in that direction. The Labour party believes that it has not moved far enough.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland referred to the time-to-pay orders, which we welcome. We recognise that they involve the debtor in finding a solution to his own problem and, in that way, much of the stigma of diligence is thereby removed. But there are two important shortcomings. First, we do not believe that a time-to-pay order should be available only on the specific application of the debtor. Many people who find themselves in severe debt do not have available to them the information or advice to make them aware of their obligations.

Since the Solicitor-General for Scotland has given such weight to some of the other views of the Scottish Consumer Council, perhaps he will bear in mind this comment:

> "It is not clear to us that debtors, who in the main are poor and disadvantaged, will have the necessary information and skills to be able to take this initiative."

The Labour party believes that it should be open to the court or even to the creditor to propose the implementation of a time-to-pay order. We urge that on the Government.

Secondly, time-to-pay orders are not available, as the Solicitor-General for Scotland has confirmed, for non-payment of rates and taxes. That is incredible. The Government argue that Government Departments and local authorities are to be trusted to use their powers of enforcement in a reasonable manner. That is a somewhat uncharacteristic, if touching, faith in the goodwill of local authorities, and perhaps even of other Government Departments. I do not share that faith and the report in The Scotsman this morning suggests that many others do not share it either.

I hope that the Solicitor-General for Scotland will not mind if, as a constituency Member, I refer to a case which was drawn to my notice during the summer recess. It contains a number of messages for us as we consider the Bill both now and in Committee. At the beginning of the recess, one of my constituents, who was seriously ill, came to my house and said that she was in considerable distress because her young daughter and her husband had purchased a house on the basis of being owner-occupiers and had become involved in a very heavy mortgage which, in time, they found that they could not meet. They had not been able to resist the blandishments of people selling all kinds of modern wonders, home equipment and the rest. The result was that the young couple went from one credit group to another, from one finance house to another and, like many other young couples in this position, I regret to say, found themselves caught in a spider's web. In due course, they had to leave their owner-occupied house and the local council allocated them a house in an area which is described as "difficult to let".

The mother was concerned because that day a warrant sale was to take place. She posed a fundamental legal question to me which became relevant if we are considering giving so many powers to local authorities and public bodies. She asked whether, after the first warrant sale had taken place, she would be free to use some of her savings—not very much, but the limited amount that she had to ensure that the young couple had enough furniture to keep their home going—as a gift.

She asked, "If I use my money and make a gift to my daughter and my son-in-law, does that mean that there can be yet another warrant sale and that they can take the gift of the goods that I have just given them?" I did not know the answer. With great confidence, I said, "I shall be going to Edinburgh today anyway, so I shall pop into the Crown Office and, no doubt, the officials will tell me."

I popped into the Crown Office and revealed to all the security people I met that I was carrying the Serjeant at Arms' identification card. After a few minutes, I found myself in the main building, which hon. Members would recognise. I was told by a fairly senior civil servant that, notwithstanding the fact that I was showing the Serjeant at Arms' ID card, I had no right to be there. He told me to get out and to leave the precincts.

We must remember that an ordinary person is expected to cope with such treatment. The Government are asking us to have faith in local authorities and public bodies that are said to be sympathetic. I am happy to say that I was rescued by a more senior member of staff, who acted more professionally and arranged for me to be given the advice that I should have been given initially. I drew the matter to the attention of the Lord Advocate, who acted promptly and correctly, for which I thank him.

If it is so difficult for a Member of the House to obtain such information, what makes the Solicitor-General think that ordinary wee folk, who may be terrified of authority, can obtain the information and help from local authorities and public bodies that the Bill suggests? I hope that in Committee the Secretary of State and the Solicitor-General for Scotland will agree to think again.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland referred to poinding and warrant sales. I was grateful to the Law Commission for getting the pronunciation right. I thought that the commission's report was very helpful, although I must say that at a cost of £32, albeit for two documents, we are all paying for our education. Having said that, I withdraw none of the congratulations of myself and my hon. Friends.

The system of poinding and warrant sales is antiquated and humiliating. It is not a reasonable system for collecting debts, and it invites reforms. The Bill suggests reforms, which we welcome and will welcome again in Committee. For instance, a vast extension in the range of goods to be exempt from poinding has been introduced in the Bill as a result of legal action. We are told that children's toys, most items of furniture, essential working tools and so on, will be included. Creditors will no longer be able to force a sale in the debtor's house, and we welcome that as well. It would be churlish to do otherwise. The old system whereby publicity was given in a community was very humiliating and I am happy that that too is being removed. Again, it would be churlish not to welcome that. However we deal with the matter, we must ensure that we remove every obstacle in the way of people's dignity, and any suggestion of humiliation for the person, his family and his neighbourhood.

Given that Opposition policy is the abolition of warrant sales, there are some questions that we should ask. For example, the list of items exempted from poinding prompts the question, "Why should warrant sales be retained at all?" The Government's only argument is that such sales provide the ultimate sanction. In another place, Lord Morton suggested more practical final sanctions. We shall ask the Government to consider such alternatives in Committee.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): I should not like to misunderstand the hon. Gentleman. What does he suggest as a final sanction?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) is offering himself as a member of the Standing Committee on the Bill. If so, I shall be happy to develop that point then. In the meantime, the hon. Gentleman may find time to read the speech of my noble Friend.

We are told that tools of trade are to be exempt from poinding up to a value of £500. In view of modern technology, individual tools of trade may be worth more than that. That is certainly true of computers. Surely the principle of exemption is to avoid depriving the debtor of has ability to earn. If that is to be achieved, the upper value limit of £500 should be at least doubled, and perhaps even trebled. We shall press for that in Committee.

We are told that medical aids and equipment will be exempted only if they are reasonably required. We feel that all medical aids and equipment should be exempt from poinding or sale. Decisions on what is required cannot be left in the hands of a law officer whose expertise and qualifications do not extend to medical science; nor should he be asked for an opinion on such matters.

[Mr. Clarke]

Creditors can no longer force a sale in a debtor's house, but the procedure will still be permitted if the debtor can be persuaded to agree to it. A debtor might be persuaded to allow a sale in his home so as to leave as large a sum as possible for an outstanding debt. That is an unhealthy aspect of the Bill. The debtor's family might suffer indignity, even if they were occupiers. Children would obviously have little say in the matter. Moreover, the stigma could stick to other members of the family in the community. That is another point that we shall pursue in Committee.

The question of diligence against earnings is a central feature of the Law Commission's report. We welcome the changes made by the Bill, especially the introduction of a system of continuous diligence against earnings, which will avoid the need for continuous arrestment against those earnings. The arrangements for imposing maximum arrestment sums are sensible, and will help the system to work more fairly.

However, our welcome for those proposals is severely dampened by the Government's refusal to accept the Law Commission's proposals for the introduction of a debt arrangement scheme. The suggestion has been backed by the Law Society and the Scottish Consumer Council, and we agree that the proposed scheme would deal sensibly and fairly with the problem of multiple debt.

The Government's cavalier rejection of the scheme is based on the assertion that multiple indebtedness is a minor problem that does not justify the cost of the commission's suggested solution. We strongly dissent from that view. The Government seriously underestimate the level of multiple debt. It is a major and growing problem in Scotland, to which a debt arrangement scheme would offer a workable solution. It is the only practical solution that has been suggested, but, rather than proposing an alternative, the Government are trying to suggest that the problem does not exist. They are wrong, and we shall argue strongly for the introduction of such a scheme, here and in Committee. I therefore ask the Solicitor-General for Scotland to explain his objections in greater depth and to accept the well-meant and seriously researched proposals by the Law Commission, because so far we find the commission's views on these matters more convincing than those of the Government.

It is impossible for the House to consider the Bill without giving thought to the growing problem of debt in our society, which is a much wider issue. I do not believe that we can solve the problem without recognising the influence of that development. Under the present Government, there has been a vast expansion of personal debt. In Scotland, the present Administration have overseen an increase of 30 per cent. per year in the number of severe debt problems.

In Coatbridge, in my constituency, the number of cases made known to the citizens advice bureau in 1986 has increased by 133 per cent. The figures of debt inquiries at the citizens advice bureau in Bath street, in Glasgow, tell a worrying story. In January 1987 that office dealt with personal debt to the value of £250,000. In February, that figure reached £312,000. The average size of personal debt dealt with was £11,000 per person or family. The largest personal debt was an alarming £37,000. On this evidence indebtedness is certainly a growing social problem. The Bill deals with the symptoms, but they are the tip of the iceberg. It has not got to the heart of the matter and we are concerned that it should. There is also the problem of fuel poverty. That problem will remain with us until we properly address ourselves to the serious problems that people endure.

It is impossible to judge the extent to which the difficulties are due to low wages or to the ease with which credit is made available. Moreover, the Paymaster General's solution — if I may refer to it — of reducing wages still more in areas of high unemployment is hardly one that appears to be helpful. In addition Lord Ross of Marnock has rightly warned us that there will be still more difficulties if the community charge is introduced in Scotland.

The fact that the Bill is required emphasises how right the shadow Chancellor is to warn the Government of the dangers of creating the false impression of economic growth based on irresponsible consumer credit arrangements, which the unemployment-stricken people in Scotland simply cannot afford.

It is with all that in mind that we shall closely examine the Bill. We shall examine it constructively and when we are given the opportunity, we shall seek to strengthen it. We shall also monitor it most carefully and earnestly following its enactment.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Fortunately, I have not been involved with a great number of my constituents facing warrant sales. However, I remember when I was in local government that several people came to me in great distress, sometimes with only 24 hours to go before the sheriff officers were due to enter their houses and attach their possessions prior to warrant sale.

It was not unusual for me to have the diligence procedure postponed to give the debtors more time to sort something out. Once the circumstances were explained to the firm of sheriff officers, the problems seriously considered — incredibly, often for the first time by the debtor — and an explanation given to the creditor, together with some plan of repayments, the worst eventuality was usually staved off.

For many people, especially those without the middle-class cachet of overdraft facilities, debt is similar to a vortex that sucks them in, and they lose control. I am inclined to agree with Opposition Members who have discussed the plastic explosion. There are some cases nowadays when people are offered no-deposit credit. If anything, that is the most dangerous form of credit available, and it can cause many problems.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Does my hon. Friend agree that the situation is worse than she has described—[Interruption.]

Mrs. McCurley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If my hon. Friend is making a point to me during the course of my speech, is it in order for Opposition Members to try to intervene, thus making it impossible for me to understand what my hon. Friend says?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): What the hon. Lady complains about is not in order.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Does my hon. Friend agree that the situation is worse than she has described, because much of the most available plastic money credit carries annual interest rates of about 35 per cent. compared with the 13 or 14 per cent. that one may pay on a personal overdraft?

Mrs. McCurley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I concur heartily with him. My hon. Friend will be aware that in many instances certain types of shops and firms attract particular types of individual. Those are the businesses that charge percentages higher than the average, and that is especially reprehensible.

One of the worst aspects is that many people panic and run away from debt. Often, when debt has been accumulated, it is as long as two or three years before a creditor takes the type of action that leads to a warrant sale. That is a long time. It demonstrates that a warrant sale is a court of last resort.

Not all debtors are victims. We have heard today that in 1975 only 700 decrees out of 80,000 ended in warrant sales. My hon. and learned Friend also point out that firms as well as householders were involved. That suggests that in some instances mistakes, incompetence, quirks of circumstance or downright bloody-mindedness had a part to play, until the heavy warning came at last. In the truly sad cases the relief of the debtor when someone takes over control of his problem, together with the general reasonableness of the creditor, has never ceased to amaze me. Ironically for some, the due process was a relief in itself, albeit humiliating and disastrous. In Committee we should consider debt counselling services and investigate how such services may be implemented. It is important to get that matter right.

I am extremely pleased that the Government have had the good sense to tackle this messy area of law on the excellent advice of the Scottish Law Commission. They have done so in a way that does not afford the debtor the opportunity to escape his responsibility, but holds out hope to both the debtor and creditor.

The two main objectives of the Bill, which are based on the recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission, are effective enforcement, by which creditors can be confident of recovering debt, and debtor protection. No longer will basic household goods that are needed, but are not absolute necessities, such as books or children's toys be held for sale. Instead of appealing to a councillor, a Member of Parliament or a citizens advice bureau to act like the fifth cavalry, a wide-ranging system of applications to the sheriff will be established.

The warrant sale will no longer come out of the blue and shock the debtor. I have seen that happen in many instances. A sale, if it reaches that position, will not be held in the debtor's home. Anonymity should take the Victorian censoriousness out of the system and fend off both prurient press and neighbours.

The more humane system of continuous diligence against earnings will ensure that debtors can, at least financially, survive the ordeal. Likewise, when a married man who is separated gets into a pickle over maintenance or when he is being bolshie over payments, his wife can be assured of continuity of payments through current maintenance arrestment. Therefore, the family is saved from some further agony in an already painful situation. I have never known any sheriff officers to act officiously, but in a potentially explosive situation human failings emerge. Increased control and scrutiny, as described by the Bill, will impose a more professional, if not more humane, outlook on sheriff officers who have transgressed.

The Bill may not satisfy the Opposition entirely, but I wish to reinforce the fact that it is necessary to have some ultimate sanction. Debts cannot suddenly evaporate. I am convinced that only the real chronics, as it were, need fear the new legislation. I support the Bill because it reflects a sympathetic and humane approach to those whose lives have deteriorated into a dreadful financial muddle.

5.30 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I listened carefully to the considered speech of the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs McCurley) and I was pleased that she addressed herself to the increasing problem of plastic credit, which is now so freely available, and said that she is in favour of personal debt arrangement schemes. I follow her in that and I hope that we shall be able to return to that issue when the Bill is considered in Committee and on Report. The argument for such schemes was also advanced eloquently by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke).

I wish to add my welcome to this tightly drawn and technical measure. I think that it could more appropriately be called the "Diligence Bill", because the Bill does not begin to address the wide range, panoply and extent of the debt problems that face those of limited means who get themselves into financial difficulties in Scotland. A Bill which addressed debtors' problems would tackle these, but it is of course right that we move on from the provisions of the Debtors (Scotland) Act 1838, which presently governs the process of diligence in Scotland and is now out of date. I for one deeply regret the demise of the Hornings Act 1579. In my previous incarnation, I spent much time tormenting sheriff officers. There was great sport to be had. As I am sure the House, or the Solicitor-General for Scotland, will know, sheriff officers have to be punctilious in following statutory diligence procedures. It was always possible to twist their tail severely if they failed to adhere to those procedures and to report them to the sheriff, using the Hornings Act and the like. That was good sport, but all that is being swept away, probably quite properly, by the provisions of the Bill.

The process of trade, commerce and business, and especially that of the retail sector, has changed radically since 1838. In those days people were much more likely to know personally those with whom they were trading. In the small towns and areas that I represent, for example, there was little chance of anyone being given a higher credit rating than he or she deserved. That was because communities were much smaller and more closely knit. That is no longer the position. Multiple retail stores today take a clinical view of debt. They decide that they can withstand annually say 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. debt write-offs. They adopt a completely dispassionate view and pursue any subsequent debt default ruthlessly. Some of them do so as a matter of principle and without regard to the cost-effectiveness of the action that they are pursuing. That approach, taken together with the iniquities of the warrant sale system, causes a great deal of hardship and distress.

As the Solicitor-General for Scotland has said, the twin objects of the Bill should be rightly and properly the achieving of a good system of enforcing debt by diligence and debtor protection, and it must be tested against those two propositions. That leaves for further and future consideration important areas such as credit provision, the levels of security that should properly be required, provision of debt counselling and small debtors' courts, which continue to form an important part of the wider argument.

These issues are of fundamental importance, especially as the consumer boom develops inexorably and people are taken through the courts with decrees for debt being enforced against them. The Bill is half a loaf; it is better than no bread but there is still the other half of the law relating to these other matters to be tackled at another stage at a future date.

My main concern is the need for continuing debtor protection. It is important in today's retail trading conditions that those who run businesses should understand that they are able to look after themselves and their own commercial interests. I have in mind the simplification of the whole process of diligence and in particular the attachment of earnings provisions that are contained in the Bill. If the process of diligence is made a lot easier, it will tend to be used more often. When I was a practising legal agent before coming to the House I rarely advised clients that the process of wage arrestment should be pursued because of its confounded difficulties. If it is made more efficient and expeditious, legal agents will be saying, "It is such a smooth, streamlined and efficient system that it should be used more readily." That is a potential danger that we should bear in mind.

I wish the House to consider carefully the position of those who cannot pay as opposed to those who will not. Those who will not pay deserve to be taken all the way down the avenue of enforcement that is contained in the Bill. In my view, and in my experience as a constituency Member, there is an increasing debt problem, and especially multiple debt.

The Scottish Law Commission's report perhaps did not address that aspect of the problem with as much energy and vigour as some of us would have wished. I am talking about those who find themselves in difficulty because of fuel debts to the electricity boards or gas boards. There are also those in rent arrears. The problem of mortgage arrears is increasing. There are also those who find themselves in difficulty after having used postal club books and catalogues to equip their households and clothe their families. I have in mind especially those who get into trouble because they are in debt to the extent of about £150. It is almost inevitable that these people find themselves on supplementary benefit, unemployment or sickness benefit, though they might not have been when they took on the debt initially. When they go over the top there is little hope for them.

Mr. Hirst: Is it the hon. Gentleman's experience that the voluntary code applied by electricity boards and gas boards works in a fair way and ensures that there are no disconnections, especially during winter months, for certain deserving categories of the public?

Mr. Kirkwood: I must concede that it is much better now than it was. There is a long way to go, but the code of practice has improved the situation a great deal. That is a valid point the House should bear in mind.

Mr. Wilson: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the rate of disconnections for short-term debtors has exploded considerably during the past six months, both to electricity boards and to gas boards? I think that there has been about a 40 per cent. increase in the number of those in debt to the electricity boards.

Mr. Kirkwood: I recognise that to be true. I understood the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) to be saying, however, that the system is working better than it was. There may be more debtors, but the process and the way in which the electricity boards are approaching the problems of disconnection have improved. That is my experience, but I stand to be corrected by hon. Members who may have had a different experience.

The cost of a poinding includes the cost of a decree and court expenses in addition to the amount of the debt. Account must also be taken of the interest that runs during the course of the repayment of the principal sum, including court expenses. These are all additional expenses and expenditures that go on top of the principal sum. I referred earlier to a debt of £150, and the process means that the final sum to be repaid is significantly higher than the original debt. I hope that further consideration will be given to diligence costs in Committee. I am worried about the imbalance.

I want to return to the argument about debt arrangement schemes. The hon. Member for Monklands, West made his position clear; I support him. We can explore the arguments in further detail in Committee and hear what the Government have to say.

I want assurance from the Government about social fund loan repayments. The Solicitor-General for Scotland may not want to address the point today but I give him notice that I shall raise it in Committee. Under current legislation, if loans made by the social fund are not repaid, do we use the process of diligence? If so, are people subject to civil imprisonment for non-repayment of loans? I do not think that that is likely, but I want to ensure that between now and Committee stage the Government will give thought to the matter because it is important.

The repayment of rates and tax debts by instalments should be permissible. Under clauses 1 and 5 the Government are setting their face against that. The Scottish Consumer Council has commented on it. I think that the Government's position is wrong.

Like the hon. Member for Monklands, West, I think that we should stop completely auction sales in a person's home if he or his family still live there. There is no excuse for that. If furniture is to be taken to auction rooms, auctioneers will charge fees for moving that furniture; sometimes they charge as much as 20 per cent. of the value of the furniture. Again that involves additional costs for the debtor.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I understand why the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), given his constituency, would in 99 cases out of 100, if not in 100, find it impossible to believe that a debtor would want to have the warrant sale in his own home. But the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who represents a rural constituency where auction rooms may be remote from where the property is, might feel that, rather than incurring the additional expense of an auction room sale miles away from the person's home, particularly if the person intends to sever his connection with that part of the world, it would be better value for money to have the sale on the spot. I stress that it is entirely a matter of consent. If the person does not consent, the sale has to take place in an auction room.

Mr. Kirkwood: I take that point. I think that there should be a restriction on the fees charged for moving furniture, but I am prepared to discuss that in Committee.

The Scottish Consumer Council is right to ask for the exemption of all medical aids and equipment used by the debtor and his family. The sheriff officer will be put in an impossible position in exercising his discretion under clause 16(1)(c). Clause 16(1)(b) should also be examined again. The exemption of £500 for tools of the trade is too low. We can discuss that too in Committee.

I give the Bill a general welcome. It is technical but it will improve the position. We have to be careful about how the Bill will impact on the small scale debtor who is invariably claiming supplementary or other benefits. That category of person will suffer most if we do not get the Bill's provisions right.

5.43 pm

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): It is encouraging that a Bill of such complexity and sensitivity is not politically controversial. I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), who generally presents the acceptable face of the Labour party, said that he would like the Bill to go further in respect of warrant sales but avoided spelling out how that should be done. Since 1968, the Scottish Law Commission has been considering the matter. For many years the Labour party has been pressing for something to be done about humanising—if that is the right word—warrant sales. The Government are now doing something. Unless the Opposition have worked out what they would do differently, it would have been more generous for the hon. Gentleman to give an unqualified welcome to the Bill in that respect.

The Bill removes the unacceptable Dickensian features of warrant sales procedure and gives some rights to debtors. I congratulate the Scottish Law Commission which has worked so long and—if one may be forgiven the pun—so diligently trying to find a solution to the problem. It started the process with a two volume report in 1985, and then there were successive consultations on which the Bill is based.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) made a distinction between people who will not pay and people who cannot pay their debts. It is a fundamentally important distinction. We should make it clear to all our constituents that the law will still come down hard on people who will not pay, as distinct from those who cannot, for one reason or another, legitimately fulfil their obligations. In this respect it would help if, from the earliest age and throughout their growing years, children were reminded of their duties and obligations, as well as of their rights.

Unlike the hon. Member, I am not familiar with these procedures so I was interested to read the Poinding Act 1661 which noted that if promises, pactions, obligements and debts were not faithfully performed and satisfied, there could be no trust and consequently no social intercourse and commerce at home. That is true. We must get it across to people that if they do not fulfil their obligations there will be serious consequences for all of us.

In opening the debate, my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland gave some figures. I did not catch all of them so perhaps he will come back to them in his reply. I understood him to say that there were in Scotland about 80,000 cases, of which 700 involved warrant sales. In the debate in another place, Lord Ross of Marnock referred to 38,000 cases in one year in Strathclyde, of which only seven involved warrant sales. If one of those sets of figures is not wrong, there seems to be a great disparity between what has happened in Strathclyde and elsewhere in Scotland.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The figures I gave were 80,000 debt decrees granted by Scottish courts. As I recollect, Lord Ross of Marnock was referring specifically to decrees involving rates, of which only seven eventually finished up as warrant sales.

Mr. Henderson: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for clarifying that.

If those who are less well off are to get fair terms and conditions for credit sensibly taken, it is important that society as a whole does not allow people to get away with not paying the dues for which they make themselves liable. Therefore, we have to strike the proper balance between encouraging people to fulfil their obligations and not being inhuman in the application of the law.

As I said earlier, the Labour party has long talked about doing something about warrant sales. I am delighted that it is this Government who have taken action. I particularly congratulate my hon. and learned Friend because he has taken a special interest in the matter since he came into the House, even before he reached his present high office. Apart from the weight of the Bill, it will be very important. On present form, it seems that such Bills last for about 150 years before they are changed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) made an important point about avoiding debt. The Scottish Consumer Council has been helpful to hon. Members by looking closely at the legislation and making a number of suggestions.

In a letter that I believe was circulated to all hon. Members on 5 March, the Scottish Consumer Council complained in the nicest possible way that the Bill, although making many improvements, did not deal with, for instance,

"controls of the informal debt recovery process such as the operation of debt collection agencies, other sanctions for debt such as disconnection of fuel services or evictions or the scope for money advice services. Therfore, the Bill's proposals concentrate on improving court processes and can certainly not be regarded as the 'solution' to the problems of consumer debt".

It would be interesting, on another occasion, to consider the sort of problems that would remain once the Bill was on the statute book.

It is important to recognise that easier credit is no kindness to anyone, least of all the less well off. Anyone who is involved in providing credit should concern himself not only with the possibility of the person repaying, but with his capacity to do so in a reasonable way. It is not just a question of assets.

I particularly welcome clause 18, under which sheriff officers will not be allowed to enter premises if children under 16 are alone in the house. That is most desirable.

The Scottish Consumer Council mentioned that it wants medical aids or equipment to be exempt, and the hon. Member for Monklands, West referred to that. I am not convinced by the case advanced by the council. Under the Bill, such aids will be exempt only if the court officer executing the poinding considers that they are reasonably required for the use of the debtor or his family. If they are not reasonably required, why should they be exempt?

Mr. Kirkwood: That is a medical judgment.

Mr. Henderson: The hon. Gentleman says that it is a medical judgment. Let me give an example in which it is not. A bath chair—a relic from the turn of the century — might be regarded as a medical aid. Other hon. Members could give examples. Some medical aids or equipment may have no conceivable connection with anyone in a given household. Should they be exempt simply because they are medical aids? A house might contain objects, such as an antique stethoscope, which might be regarded as having value as an asset.

It is too quick and easy to say that medical aids and equipment should be exempt. What if one of the problems of the household is drug addiction? I am not a sheriff's officer, but I would not know the difference between a "druggies'" equipment and medical aids or equipment. We should look further into this question and I am not yet convinced that we should change the wording of the Bill.

I am more sympathetic towards the point made by the Scottish Consumer Council on the £500 ceiling on exemption for tools of trade. There is a case for making that figure higher. I do not know what provision would be made for indexing that figure and perhaps my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland will clarify that.

I declare an interest as a member of the British Computer Society. I notice that the council uses computers as an example in which the ceiling might be more than £1,000. I am not sure whether that is important. The price of computers is falling and one can buy a sizeable computer for under £500 nowadays. There are many other tools of trade of which a modest range might easily add up to £1,000.

Dr. Godman: Shipwrighting, for instance.

Mr. Henderson: People in trades such as shipwrighting must have their own tools because they are not provided by their employer.

The Scottish Consumer Council also said that it was disappointed that the Bill did not allow instalment orders for arrears of rates and taxes to be made. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will take note of what the hon. Member for Monklands, West said about that, as he is an ex-president of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. The hon. Member for Monklands, West did not accept—nor did the Scottish Consumer Council—that local and central Government are always as sympathetic to debtors as are ordinary creditors.

Less secrecy about the way in which the high street banks calculate interest and bank charges might also help those who come within the ambit of the Bill. Not long ago one of my constituents had an argument with his bank about the calculation of interest on his account. Eventually, the bank said, "OK, we have done you for too much, but we won't tell you how we have calculated that. However, we will let you have a near £10,000 reduction in your interest bill." My constituent was not likely to have to have a warrant sale, but it is not untypical for a farmer to carry a substantial overdraft.

Dr. Godman: Or a fisherman.

Mr. Henderson: If people with overdrafts cannot work out what the interest payments on their accounts are at any given time, it ill behoves the banks to say, "You must pay so-and-so."

The banks have been less than honourable in withholding from their customers information to which they are legitimately entitled. If anyone is asked to pay a bill, he should be given full and explicit details of why. I do not understand how the banks have got away for so long with not spelling out exactly how the interest on accounts is calculated or how bank charges are accumulated.

If the banks do not put their house in order themselves, I trust that this House will put it in order for them before long. I appreciate that the Bill would not be the best instrument to do that, but I hope that there will be an opportunity to take up the matter in the House soon.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde said, one of the most important ways to keep people out of the sort of problems that we are addressing is to get them to face up to the problem of debt as soon as it is identified. When someone is in trouble he should never go on worrying. He should seek advice at the earliest possible moment either from the person to whom he owes money or from other sources, such as a citizens advice bureau. People must face their problems as soon as they are identified so that they can be helped to resolve them in a rational way, rather than under the anxiety and pressure that people often experience when they are in debt. If they deal with their problems in a rational and sensible way, they will not need to be worried by the Bill's provisions.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The Bill deserves a general welcome. Most of the points that need to be made about it have been made. I shall simply emphasise a number of points already made by hon. Members, and especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke).

In some cases credit is all too easily available, and that is a problem. Anyone with a bank card is inundated with letters offering more and more money on easy credit. Unfortunately, many people who are not very wealthy, and some who are in poor circumstances, become involved in excessive credit. The poorer the person, the more such money costs. The better off one is, the easier it is to get credit at reasonable rates. There is a problem there, but the Bill does not pretend to get rid of it; it deals with its consequences. However, as I have said, the Bill is generally welcome.

I share the view expressed by other hon. Members that there seems to be no justification, either in principle or in practice, for the exclusions in clause 1 which deals with payment by instalments. I am not sure about the reference to the Inland Revenue regarding payment

"as if it were tax".

Presumably that relates to national insurance contributions as well as tax. I should be grateful if the Minister could clarify that point in clause 1(5)(d).

On taxation generally, some of the VAT practices are damaging, especially to business. Obviously there has been a tidying up of VAT procedures, but there is no reason why firms that are able to pay their VAT on time should get extended credit, while other firms in similar circumstances pay their bills on time. The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise have everything in their favour. In this case they will be excluded from the instalment procedures and they have preference in insolvency and bankruptcy legislation. The Solicitor-General for Scotland will recall that we had arguments about the extent of the preference that they ought to have during the progress of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985.

The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise are well protected in terms of debts, and I see no reason in principle or in practice for excluding them from the instalment system under clause 1. I have had one or two constituency experiences of Customs and Excise vigorously pursuing debts. No doubt the authorities were acting under instructions, as they are at the moment, in view of the general determination of the Government to tighten VAT procedures. However, this pursuit has been carried out. Other creditors were being supportive of small firms while Government agencies were driving them into liquidation. That is undesirable. It is another example of making special rules for the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. I do not like that, and I hope that it can be amended in Committee.

Payment by instalments should not be on the application of the debtor, as is provided for in clause 1. Such a system sounds simple and perhaps even desirable, but in many cases the debtor is not sufficiently aware of it to make the application. I see no reason why that restriction should appear in the Bill. There is no reason why the court should not decide to make an order for payment by instalments, even if there is no specific application by the debtor. Again, I hope that that will be amended in Committee.

I agree with those who say that we should ban warrant sales in the debtor's home. The Bill goes a long way towards that, but it is unrealistic in some cases to look upon the debtor and creditor as being equally able to take decisions. In such situations one of the parties is under much pressure and sometimes suffers from a great deal of emotional stress. Therefore, he is not able to make sensible or rational decisions. I, and I think many hon. Members, would prefer to see the complete exclusion of warrant sales taking place in a debtor's home. I hope that the Government will not stick to the Bill's provisions. If we are to reduce the possibility of such sales to a small minority of cases, it is far better to abolish the provision for them. I am sure that all hon. Members would agree with that.

There has been some discussion about the poinding exclusions in clause 16. The exclusions in clause 16 make it difficult to see what is left—except perhaps a motor car, television set, a radio or a video. It would be desirable if legislation could be drafted to provide a list of the things that could be poinded, rather than a list of the exclusions. Of course we are talking about dwelling houses, not business premises. There is perhaps some difficulty about drafting such legislation, but if we consider the list of exclusions and take account of expenses and the difficulty of getting reasonable sums at auction for some of the goods taken from debtors' homes—unless one seizes a motor car or perhaps an expensive motor cycle or a television set—we see that it is not worth going through the trouble of poinding arrangements, the warrant sale, and so on.

Unfortunately, because of the way the Bill is drafted and the judgment of the value of items being in the hands of the sheriff officer, it will still be possible to take from domestic premises lots of things which at the end of the day will realise very little at auction. However, their seizure can cause considerable hardship to the debtor, even if he does not come within the strict definitions and exclusions of clause 16. Perhaps that matter can be examined in Committee.

It would be much better if, in practice, whatever the definitions of the legislation, only substantial items were subject to poinding, and only in cases where one could not really argue that one was dealing with an essential item of equipment. If we are to have warrant sales at all, that would be the best solution. Most hon. Members would like to abolish warrant sales altogether. However, there is a difficulty about the debtor who deliberately refuses to pay, even when he may be able to do so and where, for one reason or another, the earnings arrestment arrangement cannot be implemented. The easier earnings arrestment arrangements in the Bill should be an incentive to avoid the poinding and warrant sale procedure—certainly in the case of anyone who is in work.

Rightly, one has always tended to emphasise the humiliation involved in selling off a debtor's furniture in his own home, but there is also considerable humiliation in the arrestment of earnings. As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) said in an intervention, it does not do a person any good with his employer to have an arrestment put on his wages. The employer may not be able directly to punish an employee by dismissal, but we all know that in many cases, when faced with this kind of situation, an employer may decide that he has a troublesome and undesirable employee. In practice, many people must have lost jobs because of an arrestment of earnings. That is by no means an easy option compared with poinding and warrant sales. The Bill makes the process easier and puts an effective weapon into creditors' hands. It is a sanction that in many cases will make debtors, who are able to pay their bills but are perhaps reluctant to do so, think again. Many such matters should be pursued in Committee.

The Bill is generally to be welcomed, but it suffers from a number of defects. Some could easily be put right by simple amendments. I hope that hon. Members who serve on the Committee—I do not apply for such service—will endeavour to put matters right so that we shall have a worthwhile piece of legislation.

6.10 pm

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I believe that the House will give a warm welcome to the Bill and congratulate the Government on implementing the report of the Scottish Law Commission on diligence. I have heard frequent references in the debate to the worthy document that the commission has produced, but, as a non-lawyer, I must say that I like the executive summary of the report's findings rather than its meat. The Bill will probably be thought of in Scotland as the one that brings to an end the indignity of warrant sales in debtors' homes. It is important that we should recognise that other worthy advances are contained in the Bill.

I must confess that I have had no experience of a warrant sale, but I certainly have experienced constituents coming to me in great distress, and normally only a few hours before a warrant sale is due to take place. Anyone who regularly combs through his or her local newspaper must see the pathetic little notices that advise that a warrant sale will take place at the home of a certain person, with the address clearly shown. Such notices heap misery and indignity on someone who has had the misfortune to get into debt and have a court decree made against them in respect of the non-payment of debt.

Dr. Godman: The position could be even worse for the person concerned. I know of a poor person in my constituency who was caught up in such a predicament. He experienced his neighbours coming to see him because they had been leafletted as if it were some kind of general election campaign. The situation can be much worse than the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Hirst: The hon. Gentleman has rightly drawn attention to a practice which I understand is carried on by people who are known as ghouls. They move in not just to see goods sold at fairly low prices but to be general spectators at a grisly process. There is a supreme indignity in one's neighbours being leafletted about an auction of one's household items.

I believe—this point has been made by one of my constituents with great passion—that a ring operates among traders who customarily attend warrant sales. By consensus, they keep prices down and, in some way, make matters even worse for the debtor in that he or she does not receive full and fair value for the goods sold. Therefore, I welcome the provision in the Bill that ensures that the debtor can receive a fair market value for his or her goods.

The House would make a mistake if it did not recognise that the warrant sale procedure has been an effective tool in the system of diligence. I understand that, in 1985, some 80,000 decrees for debt were awarded by the courts, only 700 of which resulted in warrant sales. As the debate has focused quite reasonably and sensibly on the importance of recognising the existence of a debt and the need for it to be satisfied, we must accept that the warrant sale procedure is effective. Nevertheless, I am delighted to see that the Bill ends what I consider to be the appalling system of holding a sale in a debtor's home. If a debtor wants to have a warrant sale in his or her home, that is all well and good, but, frankly, I believe that it is important——

Mr. Kirkwood: Are there any circumstances in which a debtor would actively seek a warrant sale at home?

Mr. Hirst: Some debtors may be prepared to go through that stigma and misery, but they should have the option of adopting the anonymous process that is identified in the Bill and the various protections that it is able to give them.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) was right to draw attention to the phenomenal growth in credit use and the ease with which people can obtain it, often with little evidence of earnings to sustain capital and interest payments or, indeed, the existence of a job. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland mentioned a report in a Scottish Sunday newspaper stating that a young girl, who I believe was unemployed, had managed to go up and down high streets and obtain credit arrangements amounting to a considerable sum of money.

My experience with the availability of credit was brought home with a vengeance when my wife and I went to buy some new kitchen furniture. Having found some good, solid bits of furniture that looked as though they could withstand my children's depredations for the next 20 years, we proceeded to purchase it. I offered a cheque to the large store, but it was spurned. I offered an endless array of the plastic money that I have in my wallet, and each was politely refused. I was invited to apply for a credit card at the store. When I said that I did not need any more credit cards, and nor did my wife, I was told that, if I were to buy their card, there would be a discount and a special surprise gift, both of which were acceptable. We got a rather expensive electric coffee maker and another plastic card for my wallet.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Which shop was that?

Mr. Hirst: It would be rather injudicious to mention store names for fear that they instantly terminate the credit arrangements upon which my wife may well depend.

It struck me that the young man was more interested in getting me to take out a plastic card for his store's credit scheme than in selling the goods. I noticed with some interest that, after the plastic card arrived and after I had received the free booty and the discount that was offered, which apparently was not available on payment with a cheque, I noticed that the annual rate of interest—the APR—was about 38·9 per cent. I am happy to say that that store will never get interest at such a usurious rate from me.

Hon. Members have been right to draw attention to the ease with which credit can be obtained and the corresponding problems that occur when people—particularly young people—run into debt. Sadly, if my constituents' experience is anything to go by, when debtors talk about one debt, it turns out that they have multiple debts to many people. In fact, the £51·84 for which bank managers harry them is normally the smallest of the debts that they are trying to pay off.

We should pay tribute to the efforts that are made by the citizens advice bureaux to institute some form of debt counselling. It is particularly welcome. The CAB network has done a powerful job in trying to help people who have got into debt problems. I pay tribute also to the electricity and gas boards. The number of disconections that take place is minuscule compared with the number of customers that they have. The voluntary arrangements to guard against disconnections in special cases of need and hardship are worthwhile and we should recognise them as such.

I accept that debt counselling will not always be appropriate. Whenever there is evidence of a relaxation of a scheme, there are bound to be people who will try to take advantage of it. The House has a duty to protect not only the debtor who gets into a mess but the interests of the person who, for one reason or another, provides credit. I accept that creditors may be pushed into taking legal action simply because a debtor has either dishonoured a voluntary rescheduling of a debt arrangement or has persistently refused to settle a debt.

I am pleased that there is to be an end to imprisonment for non-payment of tax penalties and rates. That was an undesirable legacy of the past which it is impossible to justify in relation to many other debts. It cannot be right that somebody who has defaulted on the payment of his or her rates should take up an expensive place in gaol.

I believe that there will be a general welcome by the House for the arrangements in part I for time-to-pay directions and time-to-pay orders. If they are used sensibly by the courts, they will be a powerful weapon in their hands—not just so that people avoid getting into worse debt but so that they may be helped through this difficult period on a sensible basis that does not undermine the stability of the family by having all the creditors piling in simultaneously and driving the unfortunate person into personal bankruptcy, with all that that entails.

There can be no benefit to society in a system that allows a court order to be taken against a person if effectively it deprives him or her of the wherewithal to live. Normally the debtor is the bread winner of the family. It would be foolish if the breadwinner were to be stripped of all the money on which his family ought to be living to pay off one debt, thereby incurring future debt in order to stay alive. The present arrangements are onerous, and I am pleased that they are to be relaxed.

The House should welcome the new arrangements for arrestment. I am sure that all hon. Members know of sad cases of a wife or an ex-wife and her children discovering that her husband or former husband has defaulted on maintenance payments, which leads to sadness, worry and difficulty for the woman and her family. It is definitely preferable to have the arrangements set out in the Bill rather than the hit-or-miss arrangements that have existed until now, which mean that if the man defaults on his maintenance payments the woman is put to the inconvenience, worry and cost of going to a lawyer and obtaining a court order. It may lead to a wonderful amount of work for the legal profession, but it is not a civilised way of enforcing debt arrangements.

I am also pleased about the arrangements for conjoined arrestments. There is evidence that those who get into debt with one company, firm or organisation will probably have a series of other debts and that in some cases they juggle the debts between one company and another to obtain a breathing space. A conjoined arrestment has the merit of ensuring that no one creditor will pile in so strongly that that creditor obtains an unreasonable or an unfair preference over the other creditors. Therefore, we should welcome the intention to introduce conjoined arrestment.

I am aware that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) wishes to contribute to this debate, and I do not wish to prolong my speech unreasonably. Nevertheless, I think it is fair to say that while I have been a Member of this House I have heard a great deal from two hon. Members who are not here this afternoon and whose contributions I should have thought the House would have especially liked to hear. I refer to the hon. Members for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) and for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes).

I recall the trenchant observations that have been made on past occasions by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West. He has railed the Government for perpetuating the system of warrant sales in debtors' homes because it has brought so much misery and indignity to those unfortunate people. Moreover, not long after I was elected I well remember the hon. Member for Falkirk, West saying that warrant sales were a blight on the face of this Government and emphasised the harsh and uncaring nature of the Government. Therefore, I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is not in the Chamber to make a contribution to this debate. Then he would have recognised that, although he and some members of his party prefer to wear their hearts on their sleeves, we on this side of the House intend to take action.

Mr. Millan: No doubt my hon. Friends the Members for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) and for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) have good reason for not being here today. May I mention that my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. MacKenzie) very much regrets that he is unable to be here today. He is not very well. It is nothing serious, but my right hon. Friend would very much have liked to participate in this debate, because he has taken a considerable interest in this question over many years.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his intervention. The whole House pays tribute to the distinguished way in which the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. MacKenzie) has pursued this point. He has rightly emphasised in the House over many years, including the time when I was not a Member of Parliament, his distaste of warrant sales and his resolve to bring about a far more civilised arrangement for protecting both the debtor and the creditor. I know that the House would have been all the better for the distinguished contribution that we might have expected from him. I know, too, that the House hopes that he will recover quickly from the indisposition from which he is currently suffering.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): In view of the obvious disappointment of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) at not being included as a member of the Standing Committee that considered this matter on the last Scottish measure, may I suggest that he should play his part on the Committee that is to consider this Bill?

Mr. Hirst: I expect that there will be discussions between the usual channels. I make the confident prediction that if the hon. Member for Falkirk, West is included as a member of the Standing Committee the Committee will be all the better for it and that we can look forward to vigorous points being made by him.

Dr. Godman rose——

Mr. Hirst: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene. I shall allow him to do so, but after that I must press on.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. My hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) has also been a fierce critic of warrant sales, but unfortunately he has been ill for some time. Nevertheless, I am happy to point out to the hon. Gentleman and to the House that he is well on the way to recovery.

Mr. Hirst: Whatever the Opposition may lack in numbers, they make up for in those who will stand up and cite the roll of honour of their absent colleagues who have done well over the years in highlighting the indignity of warrant sales in the home and their desire that that system should be changed.

Before I gave way to the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), I was saying that I believe that this Government are to be commended for being prepared to enact the report of the Scottish Law Commission. I give the Bill a very warm welcome. I hope that those who are so quick to accuse the Government of being hard-nosed and uncaring will find that this Bill gives them plenty to chew on and that they will recognise that it shows a most caring attitude on the part of the Government.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Bill deserves a positive, if constructively critical, response. I share the natural modesty displayed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). I, too, am not volunteering for duty on this Committee, but if press-ganged into doing so I shall. The Opposition Chief Whip is heading my way. That is why I said that.

Indebtedness is a major social problem that afflicts the lives not only of many poor citizens, but of those on low incomes. In many communities in the west of Scotland indebtedness takes the form of that parasitic pest, the moneylender. I regret to say that my constituency is not free of that pestilential nuisance. The poorly paid, the unemployed and single-parent families are often offered by moneylenders what appears to be easy credit. However, there is a sharp sting in this kind of credit because of the huge rates of interest that are demanded by such parasites.

The hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) said that it is important that people recognise the dangers of slipping into debt. Some communities are reacting to the problem in a positive manner. Occasionally we hear of working-class communities fighting back and creating their own community-based banks with deposit accounts and loan facilities for depositors.

In my constituency, there is a fine example of such a community bank, situated in an area that is susceptible to debt—the Greenock East Credit Union Ltd., which held its first annual general meeting on Sunday. It now has more than 700 members and continues to grow month by month. The member depositors of that community elect the board of directors and, as depositors, they can obtain loans for sums ranging from £75 to £300. Many of those people subsist on low incomes, and, by way of the community bank, they can avoid credit with high interest rates. We have a community bank of fine repute, under the guidance, hard work and encouragement of Miss Marian Wilson and the Rev. Iain Fraser and their colleagues. That is a fine example of the role that a community can perform in dealing with debt. Such examples can also be found elsewhere.

I should like to see credit unions multiplying in number so that, among other things, people can escape the threat and humiliation of multiple debt and the fear of that harshest of sanctions—the warrant sale. That fear is present in many such communities.

In the main, people slip into debt not because of dishonesty or fecklessness, but because of a worsening in their personal economic circumstances. I share the deep disappointment of my hon. Friends at the Government's insensitive refusal to abandon warrant sales in the Bill. Although warrant sales have involved hundreds, not thousands, of citizens in the past two or three years, they nevertheless inflict humiliation and despair upon those who are affected.

I welcome the innovation of placing warrant sales in local sales rooms, but I do not believe that that is an effective solution, because only paltry sums of money will be realised by auction. Such items for sale will, in most cases, be puchased by those grubby dealers who hand around or frequent sale rooms in our cities and towns. I have no hard evidence—perhaps the Solicitor-General will correct me if I go badly astray—but I genuinely believe that those dealers organise rings in sales rooms so that they can obtain items for auction at the cheapest possible rate. Therefore, I do not believe that the sale room solution will be effective.

I offer a somewhat qualified welcome to the Bill. It certainly needs amendments to transform it into what could be a fine piece of legislation.

In a brief sent to Scottish Members, the Scottish Consumer Council outlined some of its reservations about the Bill. Perhaps those matters would be better considered in Committee. However, I support the hon. Member for Fife, North-East in saying that the ceiling of £500 for tools of trade is somewhat low. One need not be referring to someone whose tools of trade are, say, a computer and associated facilities; it could be someone who works in a manual trade, albeit of a highly skilled nature, whose tools vastly exceed £500 in value. In a sedentary intervention, I offered the example of a shipwright. However, there are other highly skilled manual workers who possess tools that have cost them much more than £500.

There is an alternative to the warrant sale, whether it is held in the debtor's home or in the local sale room. I support the reservations on that matter expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan. If the arrestment of wages sanction were developed in Committee, by way of amendments, could bring about the eventual elimination of warrant sales.

Therefore, this is very much a qualified welcome for the Bill, which I sincerely hope will be subjected to amendment in Committee.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I should like to give a brief welcome to the Bill. It is difficult to disagree with what it purports to do. I am rather surprised that it will take 109 clauses and eight schedules to achieve its aims, but I am at a disadvantage in not being a lawyer.

I should like to make just one point. As I sat here, contemplating what I was going to say, I became convinced that it would be a remarkable point for me to make, and my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will perhaps be slightly surprised to hear it coming from me. The Bill tilts the balance in favour of those who provide credit because it enables them, through arrestment of wages, to recover debts more easily than has been possible in the past. I am sure that that is a proper thing to do in balancing the provisions of the Bill, which also mitigates the burden of debt on individuals, but I am not certain that one would be happy for it to be easier for some people to collect debts, given the way in which the credit market is developing, especially for private individuals.

I refer not only to the individuals about whom the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) spoke. He concentrated on people with low incomes in Scotland. However, he knows very well that Scotland has the second highest per capita income of any part of the United Kingdom. The problem of debt is not confined to those who are poor. Of course we have our fair share of people who are hard up, just as we have people in Scotland who are well-to-do. The problem of debt cuts right across the board. It is a function of the development of plastic money and credit and the incidence of low inflation and high interest rates in the market place.

We have all experienced what happens when an account comes in from Access. Instead of encouraging us to pay it off at the end of the month to avoid paying a penal rate of interest, it asks, "Have you thought of extending your credit limit? Fill in the attached slip and send it off. Your credit limit will be increased by 50 per cent." No effort is made to find out whether, in the meantime, one has taken out other credit cards. If one has done so, one finds, of course, that they send out the same message.

Creditors can do that because they are charging penal and excessive rates of interest. As my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) said, interest rates of 32, 38 or 42 per cent. are obscene. I have little sympathy with the people responsible for that when they try to recover debts from individuals who, perhaps from feeble-mindedness or irresponsibility, get themselves into a desperate financial situation.

The reason why I say to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General that perhaps we should think how we can encourage people in the private market place to be more responsible in dishing out credit is that those people make a commercial judgment. They decide that on a 38 per cent. return they can afford to write off a large proportion of the debt, so they can afford to extend the volume of credit even further, thereby encouraging people who do not realise what they are taking on or understand the real cost of the debt to get themselves into deeper problems.

Mr. Hirst: Does my hon. Friend agree that a most unfortunate practice by some people who push credit hard is that they describe the interest rate as so much per month? While 3 per cent. per month does not sound much, the APR on 3 per cent. per month is approaching 40 per cent. per annum. Does he agree that while that is a matter for consumer credit and is not the responsibility of the Solicitor-General, something needs to be done to highlight better the precise rate of interest that will be paid by someone who enters such a credit sale agreement?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is why I am asking the Solicitor-General whether it is possible to make provision in the Bill so that these debt recovery procedures may not be open to those who do not draw clearly to the attention of the borrower exactly what he is embarking on. I realise that my hon. and learned Friend will say that that is unsound and would represent an intervention in the market place, which would be intolerable, and that it is a surprising request from this quarter, but it is a genuine problem.

The problem is not confined to Access cardholders and the plastic money brigade. I am delighted to say that I have been able to find out from my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden the name of the store that is giving away coffee machines in return for accepting its plastic card. The tragedy is that not everyone is as well educated as my hon. Friend or able to take the coffee machine and pay the debt immediately.

Mr. Kirkwood: Did the shop consider the hon. Gentleman's job secure enough to justify any credit?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) is not in a position, this week of all weeks, to talk about job security. [Interruption.] I was making the same distinction between the Liberal party and the alliance as the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) made yesterday.

This genuine problem is not confined to credit card companies; it extends to banks. Banks are falling over themselves to encourage people to extend their mortgages. The other day I was astonished to receive a letter from my bank inviting me to borrow more money and extend my mortgage, and saying, "All you have to do is fill in this form and you can borrow and extra £5,000, £10,000 or £20,000." Banks are equally irresponsible. The extent to which they check the evidence of income seems to be limited and they make little effort to check what other obligations people may have.

Such an invitation is tempting. One has only to talk to one's local citizens advice bureau, as we all have done, to see the extent of the temptation to buy today what one would otherwise have to wait some time to acquire. Some credit companies sell their services with advertising, saying, "Why wait? Buy it tomorrow and use your whatever card." Banks, building societies and other credit companies are all on the same kick.

I am a little worried about making it easier for those who are so irresponsible about dishing out credit to recover debts. People who get themselves into debt are among the most vulnerable. Sometimes they are irresponsible. At other times they simply do not know what they are taking on. It is only when the bills start coming in and they find themselves in difficulty — in other words, when it is too late — that they realise the extent of their problems.

I welcome the provision that warrant sales can be held only if the person concerned wishes them to be held in his home and the ending of the practice of putting the name of the person in the local newspaper. That is a tremendous step forward. The whole procedure smacked of the old Calvinist tradition of the cutty-stool. That does not help the debtor to get a grip on his problems and to establish a new basis for advancement.

This is a good measure. I confess that I have not studied every one of the 109 clauses. I shall happily volunteer to serve on the Committee, if only to remind my hon. and learned Friend between now and then to think about ways in which we could put some sanction on those people and give the courts discretion. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) spoke of moneylenders who also charge penal rates of interest, sometimes outwith the law and sometimes within it.

Dr. Godman: May I point out that those of my constituents who, regrettably, have fallen into the hands of those parasites and money lenders are not necessarily feeble-minded or irresponsible? Often they have no choice but to go to such people, and that is a matter for serious regret.

Mr. Forsyth: I shall not argue with the hon. Gentleman about specific cases or fall into the trap of arguing whether people who are put in the position of having no choice are doing the right thing in going to such people. I believe that there is choice, although I accept that people may not be aware of the alternatives or may have made a wrong choice in the first place, getting themselves into debt. However, the hon. Gentleman is certainly right to point out that there are some unpleasant individuals around who exploit the difficulties and miseries of others, but it was ever thus.

[Mr. Forsyth]

I ask my hon. and learned Friend to consider whether it is possible to remove from such people the ability to recover debts more easily, which the Bill provides. He may well have some difficulty in doing so, but I have great faith in the market place. If the credit card companies, the building societies and others who advance credit irresponsibly believed that it would be harder for them to recover debts or that their costs would be increased in so doing, they might stop and think twice. On the other hand, they may simply increase the APR even higher than it is at present, because that has been their strategy to date.

I welcome the Bill and look forward to serving on the Committee, should the powers that be so decide.

6.50 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke: The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) made a number of interesting points——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman needs the leave of the House to speak again.

Mr. Clarke: With the leave of the House, may I say that if the hon. Member for Stirling is on the Committee, I hope that we can progress from what he has been saying, and perhaps I shall be able to make a better impression on him than I did, for example, on Gartcosh. I live in hope.

I shall not join in the discussion about absent friends or hon. Members. At one point, I thought that some hon. Members who had spoken earlier in the debate had disappeared and left me to reply in their absence. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) has returned. Some of his comments — although he may not have meant this — were helpful. For example, when he flattered me with a certain description, which I shall not repeat because it is on record, I took it as a double compliment, because he referred to Strathclyde region and to the comments of Lord Ross of Marnock in another place.

The hon. Member for Fife, North-East posed the question, and I take it to myself, what is the alternative to warrant sales? In many ways the alternatives are contained in the figures that he gave the House. He talked about the 20,000 people in Strathclyde who were responsible for non-payment of rates. He said that only seven of them had been the subject of warrant sales. I suggest that that means that 19,993 people had been persuaded in other ways to meet their debts. Perhaps that is what this discussion is all about. Most hon. Members made a genuine attempt, on the basis of the report——

Mr. Henderson rose——

Mr. Clarke: I cannot give way; this is meant to be a brief speech.

Most hon. Members made a genuine attempt, on the basis of the report from the Scottish Law Commission, to find a balance between the debtor and the creditor. We are making an attempt to do that, given the demands of a modern society. We have heard a lot about credit being available — the plastic card society and the rest. The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) made a point about interest rates, as did the hon. Member for Stirling, which we appreciate. My right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) made solid points about the social fabric of our society. I hope that they will serve on the Committee, because I am sure that it would be delighted to hear more from them, especially as it would be based on their experience.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), in an interesting speech which was based on his experiences in court dealing with sheriff officers and others——

Mr. Kirkwood: As a lawyer.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that the House will bear that in mind. The hon. Gentleman brought out a point which we are bound to pursue. When we were protesting that warrant sales will still take place in houses, albeit with the agreement of the owner, he said that there might be a difference between people living in rural areas and those who live in constituencies such as mine. I have given fair notice to the Solicitor-General that that point, as well as other points, will be pursued in Committee.

A number of points have been made by hon. Members. The Solicitor-General cannot be expected to reply to all of them tonight, although no doubt he will respond. I look forward to the Committee proceedings and the constructive discussion—[Interruption.] I hope that even the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will agree and change the habits of a lifetime.

Despite our reservations, we welcome the Bill. We shall continue to express our reservations and, hopefully, we shall persuade the Solicitor-General and the Government when we debate these matters further.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to a number of the points that have been made in the debate.

First, I say to a number of my hon. Friends that the Opposition are correct in jumping to their feet to ensure that proper commendation is given to hon. Members, such as the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen, (Mr. MacKenzie) who, as a Minister and as a Back Bencher, has pursued this matter with great vigour and is responsible for some reform prior to the introduction of the Bill. That could similarly be said of the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey).

The strictures that were placed on the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) were properly imposed. For a long time, he has attempted to suggest that he is the only person who has been bothered about this matter. When we get down to the nitty-gritty, it is unfortunate that he is not here to consider it.

The debate has proceeded on two bases. One has been an interesting debate about the problems of the availability and accessibility to credit in our society. As was made clear on both sides of the House, that can give rise to acute social problems. None of us, as constituency Members, can fail to recognise that.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) appreciated that that did not fall within the ambit of the Bill. Nor, indeed, can we sensibly hope to contain it within a purely Scottish measure. For every one of those who obtain credit, whether it is by plastic money or other means, there are those who in their Sunday newspapers can send off, readily and easily, to mail order firms south of the border. If the matter of credit—which has clearly raised some concern in the debate—is to be pursued, the argument should be addressed on a United Kingdom basis.

Some consideration has been given to whether the Bill is balanced—whether it now gives greater advantage to the creditor as opposed to the debtor, or vice versa. I would argue, have argued and shall continue to argue that there is a balance—that there is an improvement in the procedures from which both sides benefit. It may be said that earnings arrestment procedures are easier for the creditor, who only needs to seek that order once. At the same time, as I pointed out in opening the debate, under the present arrangements, it may be that the whole of the earnings of the debtor would be taken up. That cannot happen now. Furthermore, as to poindings and warrant sales, the debtor is given an opportunity, for the first time, to go to the court and say, "To continue with this poinding, to continue with this warrant sale, is unduly harsh and it ought to be brought to an end." That is a humane and sensible manner in which to approach these problems in the future.

The connecting point between the broader argument about credit and particular provisions of the Bill is debt counselling. There cannot be any dispute that the sooner people understand the problems that they are accumulating for themselves in taking on board too much debt, the better. If it is through the offices of the citizens advice bureau or the Scottish Consumer Council that such schemes are to be set up, they are to be welcomed and encouraged.

Going beyond that into the more detailed provisions of what might be included, I am bound to say to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) that I am not entirely clear what the position of the official Opposition is with regard to warrant sales.

In the report of the Scottish Law Commission, at page 38, the commission, fully and in some detail, set out the concept of the debt arbitration service which was developed by the Scottish council of the Labour party, among others. At the bottom of page 38, commenting on the scheme, it says:

"It would appear that poindings and warrant sales would not be permitted, though this is not entirely clear."

That comment by the Scottish Law Commission, which was made some time ago, would now seem to be an accurate reflection of the exact position. Nevertheless, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends for the welcome that they have given in the main to the changes that we are introducing.

In particular, the hon. Gentleman criticised the Government for their failure to introduce, as the Scottish Law Commission suggested, a debt arrangement scheme. I think that he will be aware from the consultation that, while some were in favour of it, other interested groups and bodies are nothing like as enthusiastic as he might be or as the noble Lord Morton of Shuna appeared to be in the other place. I suspect that we shall consider the matter in detail in Committee, but it is not a provision to be overstated. First, the Law Commission, and the amendment tabled in the other place, suggested that such a scheme would have to be voluntary. It is interesting that the noble Lord Morton of Shuna concentrated on the debt situation of someone who was earning rather than seeing such a scheme as an opportunity for debt enforcement or debt arrangement across the board. Evidence from comparable although not exactly the same schemes south of the border shows about a 40 per cent. fall out in the first year. The opportunity to provide a satisfactory scheme needs to be examined carefully in Committee.

The hon. Gentleman made several detailed points, one of which was his complaint that debtors would have to apply for time to pay orders. There will obviously be some publicity about this. All the forms will tell the debtor the procedures available and, as I have said, the sheriff clerk will have an interest and will be bound to offer assistance.

The exemptions that are provided in clause 16 in relation to warrant sales was also mentioned. The comments that have been made today have been prompted by the observations which help fully arrived from the Scottish Consumer Council late last night or early this morning. If hon. Members look at that clause, they will find that the Government have already improved upon what was provided by the Scottish Law Commission. It was prepared to exclude only one refrigerator, whereas the Government have been prepared to extend that to "refrigerators" in the plural in the Bill.

A more serious point concerns medical aids or equipment that can reasonably be required for the use of the debtor. I do not find that issue as complicated as the Scottish Consumer Council and hon. Members seem to find it. Having had considerable contact with the Scottish Consumer Council, I am disappointed by its approach. For example, in its letter received by all Members of Parliament it asks whether an elderly person who could walk, but with difficulty, would reasonably require a wheelchair. The image created is that sheriff officers will burst into a house, shove grannies out of their wheelchairs and go out of the door with those wheelchairs. That is a short-circuiting of the procedures, and it is unfair and untrue.

First, there is the poinding process. Before poinding any goods the sheriff officer must prepare a schedule. If the debtor takes exception to that, he has not one, not two, but three opportunities to object to the sale of a particular item.

Odder still is that the Scottish Consumer Council in its press release went on to say:

"no medical item should be able to be sold to pay off debts, if it is used by the debtor or his family."

The qualifications in the Bill—

"reasonably required for the use of the debtor or any member of his household"— is simply a variation on exactly the same theme. Unlike the Scottish Consumer Council, I do not consider that to be a major flaw in the Bill.

Mr. Tom Clarke: The Minister seems to be missing the point that the Scottish Consumer Council was making, and he is also selective in his points. He disagrees with some and accepts others, but does not give the council much credibility on those points where it seems to disagree with him. The council's point is that a sheriff officer, or a person whom he sends, will not necessarily be qualified on medical matters and will not be in a position to decide whether somebody's bath chair, crutches or other piece of medical equipment is not required by him.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I understand that. Let us take the ludicrous example of a sheriff officer deciding that granny's wheelchair is not reasonably required by her. In those circumstances there is the opportunity to go to the court and say that that item should not be poinded either on that basis or because to do so would be unduly harsh.

[The Solicitor-General for Scotland]

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) was, I understand, at one time a pharmacist. Someone like him might have a considerable quantity of medical supplies in a cupboard which were not being used by the family. It would be absurd that they should be excluded from the possibility of being poinded. The test being applied here relates not just to medical aids and equipment, but to books and tools of trade.

Mr. Hirst: Has my hon. and learned Friend any observation to make on the third point in the Scottish Consumer Council's letter about Crown preference in the case of rates and taxes? Is it reasonable that Crown preference should be perpetuated and that time to pay or instalment orders for arrears of rates and taxes should not properly be extended in this case?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I shall come to that. The right hon. Member for Govan raised the same point.

Hon. Members have said that the figure of £500 is too low. I do not accept that, but, as is set out in the clause, that figure can be adjusted by the Lord Advocate in regulations.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) for being the only Member to mention the abolition of civil imprisonment. I am surprised that the extent of the abolition of civil imprisonment has not been more widely welcomed. If there is something medieval or anachronistic in the existing law, it is the continuation of that. It is highly desirable that it should be abolished. The courts would then have the opportunity to imprison only for deliberate failure to pay maintenance or a fine imposed for contempt of court in civil proceedings—a much more limited set of circumstances.

The right hon. Member for Govan was the first to ask why the time-to-pay arrangements are not applied to certain tax debts, and that matter has now been raised again. As the right hon. Gentleman may be aware, during the Bill's passage in the other place it was made clear that one of the differences is that in these circumstances most rates or tax debtors have a continuing liability to pay, so time-to-pay arrangements, say, for one month's PAYE or VAT, would quickly become mixed up with subsequent payments and arrears could mount. In other cases, the tax debtor is merely acting as a collecting agent for the revenue departments and has no entitlement to the money that he has failed to pass on to them. Indeed, as I recollect, and as the right hon. Gentleman reminded me, he participated in the work of the Committee on the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Bill and indicated then that he accepted that there was something of a distinction. Talking about value added tax and PAYE, he said:

"It is a different kind of debt, because the debt it collected on the part of the debtor for the Government, and deductions for PAYE have been made from employees' wages, and must be paid over to the Inland Revenue. Similarly, VAT is passed on".—[Official Report, First Scottish Standing Committee, 18 June 1985; c. 86.]

So, while there might be arguments about some types of tax, there is, generally speaking, a distinction which the right hon. Gentleman, at any rate individually, has recognised. In those circumstances, in my view that the distinction should be maintained, for the same reason.

Finally, considerable time to pay is already built into rates and taxes collection and the recovery system. Instalment arrangements are available for the payment of rates and a delay of many months can arise between tax default and summary warrant procedures. However, again I anticipate, having followed the proceedings in another place, that this is likely to be a matter that the right hon. Gentleman will want to explore further in Committee.

I will deal very briefly with a matter that was raised by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) relating to the ring of dealers and the way that the value of items, even in an auction room, might be depressed by such a ring. We need to understand the details of this scheme. As part of the poinding procedure there is a requirement upon the sheriff officer to value those goods. In terms of clause 20(4), he has to value the poinded goods. The test is that it must be

"according to the price which they would be likely to fetch if sold on the open market", but there is a further provision:

"unless he considers that the articles are such that a valuation by a professional valuer or other suitably skilled person is advisable, in which case he may arrange for such a valuation."

Therefore, I want to make it clear that, because the goods are taken to the sale room, it does not mean that they are simply knocked down at a price which a ring of dealers has agreed should be paid. If the goods did not meet the appraised value, they would not be knocked down.

Dr. Godman: Is it not the case that in auctions the autioneer, or the person giving the valuation, offers an anticipated price, which is what he offers to a would-be seller? It may be the same here. That is why he may not be able to give any kind of guarantee. He simply says that it is likely that the goods will raise a certain amount of money. However, we know that when the dealers get together the goods often do not get anywhere near the anticipated price.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As I have been trying to indicate, if that happens the goods will not be knocked down at that price. Obviously, I cannot say whether in every case the sheriff officer accurately appraises the open market value of goods, but that is what we would be requiring of him as a test should the Bill become law.

I am very grateful to hon. Members generally, and particularly to my hon. Friends, who have seen the importance of ensuring that we do not have warrant sales in their present form. As my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) pointed out, time and again this has been held up as being a matter in which we have shown inhumanity and an unfair attitude by allowing warrant sales to continue in their present form. That is not the case. We are going to bring about a substantial change. Even if there are those who would like to see warrant sales disappear altogether, the changes that we are introducing are very worth while. There are undoubtedly complicated matters still to be discussed in Committee, and I welcome the enthusiasm of my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) regarding a place on the Committee. I think it is not unrelated to the fact that he expects the Criminal Justice Bill, which follows it, might be somewhat longer. Nevertheless, he will be very welcome on the Committee.

The provisions of the Bill are humane and sensible. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

DEBTORS (SCOTLAND) BILL [LORDS] [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—
Resolved,

That, for the purpose of any Act resulting from the Debtors (Scotland) Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenses incurred by a Minister of the Crown under that Act;

(2) the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Maude.]

Parliamentary and Health Service Commissioners Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 4

APPOINTMENTS OF ACTING COMMISSIONERS

7.15 pm

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 5, line 48, at end insert—

'(a) until the appointment of a new Commissioner or the expiry of the period of twelve months bginning with the date on which the vacancy arose, whichever occurs first; and'.

This is a purely technical amendment which reinstates subparagraph (2)(a) of subsection (3) of clause 4, which was inadvertently omitted in printing, at the foot of page 5 of the Bill.

The three subsections of clause 4 deal in turn with the appointment of an acting Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, an acting Health Service Commissioner for England or for Wales, and an acting HSC for Scotland.

Hon. Members will see that these subsections are framed in virtually identical terms and the wording of the reinstated sub-paragraph (2)(a) is identical with the wording of the sub-paragraphs (2)(a) in subsections (1) and (2).

The amendment raises no issues of substance and I commend it to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

7.16 pm

Mr. Luce: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I hope that the House will agree that through the various stages of this Bill we have had some very good discussions and debates, not only about the purpose of the Bill but about the value of the parliamentary commissioner, the work that he does and the very effective liaison that he has with the House, and the excellent work that is done by the Select Committee which deals with the affairs of the parliamentary commissioner under the chairmanship of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck).

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I noted what my right hon. Friend had to say about the importance of the work of the commissioner and I am wondering if he intends to say a word about the way in which we might be able to publicise the excellent work that he does. This is clearly something which should be drawn more to the attention of the public. If they were aware of precisely what the commissioner does and the excellent work that he undertakes I am sure that many members of the public would contact him, to their considerable benefit.

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend and other hon. Members said in Committee that it might be valuable to ensure that there is greater knowledge not only about the existence of the parliamentary commissioner and his task as Health Service Commissioner, but about his powers. As we discovered in Committee, there is a misunderstanding about the range and extent of the powers of the parliamentary commissioner, particularly in his capacity as Health Service Commissioner. I have certainly taken this on board and will draw it to the attention of the parliamentary commissioner and we shall see whether more can be done to get across the message to citizens of the country who can benefit from the existence of a parliamentary commissioner. I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

As the House knows, the main purpose of this Bill is found in clause 1 and its associated schedule. These extend the powers of the parliamentary commissioner to investigate the listed quangos and provide for the addition of further bodies in the future. In addition, the Bill provides an opportunity to bring forward procedural changes to ensure the continuance in an interregnum of the work of both the parliamentary commissioner and the Health Service Commissioner. It also introduces some minor improvements in procedures for handling complaints to the Health Service Commissioner.

We had a very valuable debate in Committee, which provided an opportunity for a useful exchange of views on the powers to conduct investigations of both the parliamentary and the Health Service Commissioners. It might be appropriate now to refer to a particular amendment tabled in Committee by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown). He suggested in his amendment that there should be scope for an exchange of information between the PCA and the Health Service Commissioner. I undertook to consider whether I could introduce a new clause on Report to safeguard the position if, at some stage in the future, those offices were not held by the same person, as they are at present. I undertook to come back to the House on that.

I have written to the hon. Gentleman but I should like to take this chance to explain to the House. There was some delay in being able to come forward with an amendment due to various technical and drafting problems. I can assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that those matters will be overcome shortly and that they will be dealt with during consideration of the Bill in another place. There is no lack of will on my part to ensure that the objective behind the hon. Gentleman's amendment is achieved.

One of the noticeable things about the Second Reading and Committee was the widespread support, which is reflected in the country, for the work of the parliamentary commissioner and his staff. It is interesting that it is exactly 20 years since the Act was passed which established the first ombudsman in this country, and his work, particularly as a parliamentary commissioner, is well known. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) pointed out, it may be less well known in terms of the Health Service. The commissioner and the House work closely and effectively together in the interests of the adequate protection of the citizen against maladministration. That outlet for complaints against maladministration works well.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I want to follow up a point made by the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey). I share his view that the parliamentary commissioner does a marvellous job. However, he asked the Minister about ways of letting people know that the parliamentary commissioner is there. That would bring him more and more work. If the work is there it should be dealt with. However, my main point in Committee was that if work is going to pile up in that Department, the manpower in the Department needs to be examined. I hoped that the Minister would say something about that, bearing in mind what I and other hon. Members said in Committee.

Mr. Luce: I know of the hon. Gentleman's close interest in this since he serves on the Select Committee and follows the issues fully. I am happy to take this chance to reiterate what I said in Committee in answer to his probings. It is our objective to ensure that the parliamentary commissioner has adequate resources and staffing to do his job. As the hon. Gentleman may know, there has been a staff review of the work of the parliamentary commissioner and that can be taken into account when he considers whether he requires more staff.

I understand that it is difficult to establish what extra work load will flow from the passing of the Bill. However, I have heard an estimate of about an extra 15 per cent. It is impossible to establish that at present. Only experience will tell. We have added into the Bill about 50 quangos. Most of them have a good record in terms of their relationship with the public so there is no knowing what the extra work load will be. All I can say is that I can assure the House that adequate resources will be made available to the parliamentary commissioner to enable him to do his job.

I wish every Bill could go through the House with such an atmosphere of friendliness, and in this time span. It has been a constructive debate and with that in mind I warmly commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Bill commands considerable support in the House and there is no reason why it should be inordinately delayed. As the Minister said, the Committee stage was good natured and constructive. Indeed, there has been no organised lobby against the Bill. Since the Bill's intended victims are inefficient administrators, by definition one would not expect an organised lobby against the main thrust of the Bill.

Those of us who have reservations have them about matters of detail and certainly not about matters of principle. Almost all the issues raised in Committee related to the scope of the Bill, and the most often raised objection was that the Bill did not go far enough in a specific area. The Minister did his best to deal with our anxieties, and he did so with some effect.

I shall deal first with the issues relating to the parliamentary commissioner. The main thrust of the Government's argument, as I understand it, is that they wish to separate those bodies which have a primarily commercial or contractual nature to them. They wish to place those outside the commissioner's orbit and to place other bodies as recommended by the Select Committee inside the commissioner's orbit. As we said on Second Reading, that was not the retiring ombudsman's view and I still remain unconvinced that it is wholly necessary to place bodies whose main function is commercial or contractual outside the ombudsman system. That does not mean that I object to the inclusions we are discussing.

I think that the Government's distinction has got them into some difficulties at the margins where the reason for including some bodies and excluding others is a very fine one. We explored that at some length in Committee and I do not wish to retrawl the areas we explored then except for one example—the Civil Aviation Authority. I am using that as an example of a type of body. That is not the only body of its nature, but perhaps it is the best example.

The ombudsman's reports refer specifically to complaints about low-flying aircraft and the difficulties that he has in dealing with matters of that sort. I accept that some of the duties of the Civil Aviation Authority are, as the Minister will say, commercial or contractual in nature, but that authority also has a duty to regulate the flight patterns of civil aircraft and to make sure that they are keeping to the routes——

Mr. Pawsey rose——

Mr. Brown: Let me finish my point and then I shall give way.

It has to make sure that they are keeping to the routes that they are supposed to keep to. It ought to be possible for the ombudsman to investigate matters that are purely administrative in nature, even taking account of the Government's criteria and excluding everything to do with commercial or contractual considerations. There should still be scope for the ombudsman to intervene in a case of maladministration where there is specifically a question about how the authority has handled the complaint of someone who was, for example, arguing that aircraft were flying too low over his or her home.

Mr. Pawsey rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman intervenes, I remind the House that we must stick to what is in the Bill. It would not be in order to go into detail about what is not in the Bill. That is a matter for earlier stages.

Mr. Pawsey: I thank the hon. Member for giving way in such a courteous fashion. I noted carefully the point you made, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about what is in the Bill rather than what has been left out. However, the hon. Gentleman touched on a matter that affects my constituency closely — the incidence of low-flying aircraft. I know from bitter experience how difficult it is to register complaints on that particularly important matter. The hon. Gentleman has a reputation for being fastidious about the geography of the United Kingdom and must be well aware that Rugby and Kenilworth are separated by two envelopes, one covering the west midlands flat area, the other covering the area of the American base around Oxford. Therefore, aircraft tend to be funnelled into a fairly narrow area over my constituency, to the grave disadvantage of my constituents. I well understand the excellent point made by the hon. Gentleman. Speaking from bitter experience, I hope to discuss this aspect with my right hon. Friend the Minister. I hope that the Gentleman will say more about what might be in the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Member does that, I hope that he will recall that I said that, on Third Reading, hon. Members must stick to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Brown: You have touched on the main thrust of my argument, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The ability of the ombudsman to investigate matters of a purely administrative import is much wider than is generally believed. This point was brought home to us in Committee by the Minister's assurances. The Civil Aviation Authority's role in dealing with complaints of this nature, even at the administrative level, is probably still outside the scope of the ombudsman's function — but only just outside. However, administrative aspects of clinical judgment and family practitioner committees fall just inside the ombudsman's sphere of activity and are thus included within the scope of the Bill. This fine dividing line does a disservice to the Bill, the main thrust of which I wholly support. I hope that the Minister will be able to address my point about the purely administrative role.

I welcome the Minister's assurance that he will bring forward an amendment to deal with a small anomaly which concerns whether information held by the ombudsman acting in one capacity can be imparted to the ombudsman acting in another capacity. It may seem ridiculous to outsiders that we should be discussing whether a man can talk to himself. Different offices may not always be held by the same person. In any case, these matters are sometimes raised not by the holder of the office in chief but by subordinates.

A number of Committee Members were a little disturbed that in some matters the ombudsman seems to be taking an over-cautious view of his role, functions and powers. It seemed a shame that the Government should have to legislate to ensure that Members of Parliament can receive copies of reports. The risk to the ombudsman of a defamation suit seems to be fairly remote, especially as there would probably be a need to prove malice, and how one would do that is beyond me.

Most of the debate was on the activities not of the parliamentary ombudsman but on the Health Service ombudsman. The reason is simply stated. Many hon. Members feel that there is not an easily discerned or accessible way of dealing with complaints against hospitals or general practitioners. Some of us look to the ombudsman system to remedy the lack of a one-stop agency to deal with complaints. There is a division of opinion among those who follow these matters as to whether clinical judgments should be included within the ombudsman's remit and whether the contractual relationship between general practitioners and the family practitioner committees should be included.

The Minister made a number of very helpful comments in Committee. He gave an assurance that it was for the ombudsman himself to determine the extent of administrative matters with which he had to deal. That means that if there was an administrative aspect to a complaint which also had a clinical aspect, it was open to the ombudsman—indeed, the House would encourage him—to make sure that he did investigate rather than was unduly deferential to the medical profession. The Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. and learned Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck), stated succinctly in Committee:

> "From time to time the medical profession pushes its luck." — [Official Report, Standing Committee E, 19 February 1987; c. 23.]

That sentiment was widespread. I hope that this debate and the debate in Committee fill the Health Service ombudsman with renewed vigour to boldly go where perhaps he should have been going before.

The other matters we touched on in Committee—the right to investigate personnel matters and to deal with matters that relate to contract—could have been dealt with but were not, and I shall make no further reference to them. There was widespread support for the ombudsman in his office. Any criticism—it was muted if there was any at all—was in the desire to see the ombudsman exert himself to make full use of his powers rather than take a more narrow and confined approach to his duties, specifically in his Health Service role.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) mentioned resourcing. It would be wrong to extend the areas into which we expect the ombudsman to delve and then not to give him the resources to do so. There are difficulties in calculating precisely the extra resourcing that the ombudsman will require to explore what is asked of him. Nevertheless, I am grateful that the Minister has given an assurance that resourcing will follow demand and that the Select Committee will not be returning to complaints that the ombudsman could have done more if the resourcing was available.

I wish the Bill well and a speedy passage in the other place.

7.38 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): The attention of Standing Committee E was drawn to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Minister has special responsibility for preventing misuse of language and for trying to ensure much better standards in the use of English in Government Departments. It is therefore a strange irony that we note in schedule 2 one of the most unattractive new features of legislation. The heading of Schedule 2 of the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967 is "Departments and Authorities Subject to Investigation".

Schedule 2 of the Bill now before the House is "Departments Etc. Subject to Investigation."

The Bill's draftsman, apparently with the approval of my right hon. Friend the Minister in charge of decent English, has not even used the word "etcetera", which hon. Members may think is an unattractive word. But we now have the abbreviation "etc.", as though my right hon. Friend the Minister is giving his official seal of approval to a misuse of the English language. I hope that we shall cease to use that word in parliamentary documents, notably Bills. I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Sir P. Holland) is nodding in approval. I must say in fairness to my right hon. Friend the Minister that he has not sinned quite as greatly as some of his right hon. and hon. Friends who have introduced legislations with the word "etc." in the long title.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford): Oh, no.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend the Vice-Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household, from whom we do not hear sufficiently frequently in our debates, expresses disbelief that the Government, of whom my right hon. Friend the Minister is such a distinguished adornment, could possibly have introduced a Bill containing those words. I assure the House that the Government, who are almost blameless in every other matter, have not been blameless in the misuse of language.

There is another extraordinary feature. My right hon. Friend the Minister rightly said that it is almost 20 years to the day since the 1967 Act received Royal Assent, so we can find a commentary on what we have done. Under the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967, 44 departments and authorities were subject to investigation. As a result of the Bill introduced by my right hon. Friend the Minister that number is to be increased to 105. I do not know whether we should congratulate or rebuke ourselves on the fact that in 20 years the number of bodies subject to investigation has risen so dramatically. I agree with what the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) said. It is likely that, because of this dramatic extension in the number of departments and bodies subject to investigation, there will be an increased workload. I very much welcome the comment by my right hon. Friend the Minister in moving the third reading that, if we need, as I am almost certain we shall, additional staff and staff of a high quality in the office of the parliamentary commissioners, they will be made available.

Despite my friendly rebuke of my right hon. Friend the Minister on the subject of the English language, I congratulate him on the way in which he has introduced the Bill and piloted it so successfully in committee. I look forward to the Bill being on the statute book at the earliest possible time.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for his helpful comments in responding to my intervention. He will understand, however, that I deeply regret that the Bill contains no provision to give greater prominence to the work of the Select Committee and of the ombudsman. I rest assured, however, that he will make representations to the parliamentary commissioner and I hope that, as a result, we shall be given something firm and definite.

My right hon. Friend the Minister will understand that publicity costs money. Clearly, he will need to ensure that there are adequate funds to promote the parliamentary commissioner's work. Several times during our discussions the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) stressed the importance of making sure that reasonable funds were made available to the parliamentary commissioner. To derive the maximum benefit from the commissioner's work, there must be appropriate funding.

I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister to the notes on page 10 of the Bill which refer to various bodies. Paragraph 6 states:

"The references to the Management and Personnel Office and the Treasury do not include the Cabinet Office".

That is an extraordinary omission. I am puzzled about why the Cabinet Office has been so carefully left outside the Bill's terms. That is highly inappropriate. I do not understand why the people working in the Cabinet Office are operating and will operate outside the commissioner's umbrella. There is a strong argument to include them within the Bill's provisions. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will advise me on this important matter.

Clause 2 refers to the removal of a commissioner on the ground that he is "incapable for medical reasons". Should the House assume that those medical reasons include mental illness? The commissioner's job is particularly stressful and he operates under substantial constraints. Clearly, there is a substantial risk to his mental health. I should like, therefore, to be assured that "medical reasons" includes mental illness.

Clause 2 states:

"Her Majesty may declare the office of Commissioner to have been vacated if satisfied that the person appointed to be the Commissioner is incapable for medical reasons".

Who will give Her Majesty appropriate advice on the parliamentary commissioner's mental and physical condition? This is a particularly fine point. The commissioner must not be subject to duress. Anyone examining the commissioner's physical or mental condition must act in a truly impartial way. There should be no risk of anyone seeking to remove the commissioner from his office on grounds other than illness or ill health, whether mental or physical. A little advice from my right hon. Friend the Minister would be helpful.

If the commissioner is removed from office for medical reasons, what about his pension provision? Can we take it that when the commissioner leaves his job an adequate and reasonable pension provision will be made for him and his dependants? Those who have been hon. Members for a considerable period will be aware that we have argued about an adequate and proper pension provision for hon. Members. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the commissioner enjoys safeguards similar to those enjoyed by hon. Members. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will comment on those matters. Schedule 1 is headed:

"Schedule Substituted for Schedule 2 to the 1967 Act."

I have sought in vain to find some common denominator in the interesting list under proposed schedule 2. I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling in his accustomed place——

Mr. Haynes: Gedling? Do not insult Nottinghamshire.

Mr. Pawsey: I am tempted to say that it is impossible to insult Nottingham, but I shall not. I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Sir P. Holland) in his accustomed place and posture. He has achieved a substantial reputation as a quango hunter. I wonder what emotions passed through his breast when he studied this substantial list and when he realised that many were missing from the list.

As my eye travelled down the schedule I saw that it included the Building Societies Commission and the Charity Commission. It also includes the Crafts Council. I have tried in vain to discover the connection between the Crafts Council and the Building Societies Commission. The data protection registrar is also listed and a little further down the list the Forestry Commission appears. I believe that there may be a case to argue for the insertion on the list of the Forestry Commission. It employs a substantial number of people. At times those people may be exposed to the risk of injury, bearing in mind the nature of their work and because so much of it is carried on outside. Obviously those employees must have a form of redress in the event of the maladministration of their compensation claims.

I have studied the list and I wish to know the basis of it. What are the criteria for membership of the list? Who requested admission to the list? Why were there such requests? How many people will be affected by the list? What was the test of admission to the list? I ask a direct question of the hon. Member for Ashfield: why was the BBC omitted from the list?

During the course of his excellent remarks my right hon. Friend said that he estimated—that was the word he used—that, as a result of the schedule, the workload may increase by as much as 15 per cent. Those of us who serve upon the Committee of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, and are assiduous attenders, will be aware that the workload of the Committee has grown. I wonder — indeed, the hon. Member for Ashfield shares my wonder — whether the 15 per cent. additional workload may turn out to be a gross under-estimate.

I believe that adequate provision must be made not just for more staff, as has been pleaded by the hon. Member for Ashfield over and over again, but for additional premises and further equipment. We should consider installing word processors or computers. We must ensure that the commissioner is adequately serviced not just by personnel, but with the appropriate equipment that will enable the personnel to discharge adequately their work.

I notice that the office of the Director General of Gas Supply is included in the list and that is a welcome inclusion. From time to time I have made reference to that office and I believe that its inclusion will be of substantial benefit. Further down the list I notice the Horserace Betting Levy Board and I find that a rather surprising inclusion.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): That's a turn up for the book.

Mr. Pawsey: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for his witty intervention. It was an entirely appropriate remark. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman can find something illuminating to say about the Corporation of the Trinity House of Dartford Strond and the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses.

Mr. Dobson Deptford Strond.

Mr. Pawsey: I am obliged for that gentle correction. I do not understand why those two bodies are included in the list. I can appreciate the reason for the inclusion of the National Debt Office and the Trustees of the National Heritage Memorial Fund, but again it would be helpful to have some knowledge of the number of employees involved in those various bodies.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Bearing in mind the inherent dangers in creating too many links between the various bodies listed in the schedule, has my hon. Friend noted No. 21 and 22 on the list? He will discover that the Commission for Racial Equality, which deals with matters relating to discrimination based on colour, is followed by the Red Deer Commission, which I believe is basically involved in calculating the number of red deer that may be culled at any one time. I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate that some of the connections may lead to dangerous links.

Mr. Pawsey: There is another link to which my hon. Friend may have drawn attention — that between the Forestry Commission and the Red Deer Commission. It would appear that one commission will offset the other because I understand that red deer are partial to young trees. It may be that that could be investigated by another body on the list, the Medical Research Council. I certainly do not know of any red trees — most of the trees are green in my constituency.

The Science and Engineering Research Council is on the list and as a former engineer I am delighted about its inclusion. I certainly believe that that admirable council should be assisted in every way possible. With regard to residuary bodies I wonder whether they have inadvertently slipped into the list by error. I cannot understand why they should be included, but perhaps my hon. Friend will be able to tell me.

Mr. Rowe: Residuary body could be a description of this place.

Mr. Pawsey: That may be true.

Two thirds of the way down the second half of the list the English Tourist Board, Scottish Tourist Board and Wales Tourist Board are included. I favour tourism and I believe that it should be promoted to the maximum as it assists our balance of trade. It also ensures that people from other countries have a true understanding of what occurs in Britain. I am sure that if there were any tourists here today they would be especially interested in the Bill. They would be most anxious to take back to their Parliaments knowledge of what has taken place in this Parliament tonight.

I mentioned the inclusion of the Science and Engineering Research Council and if I may continue my reflections on the list for a moment longer, I also notice the inclusion of another engineering body — the Engineering Industry Training Board. I am extremely happy about that.

With regard to the notes on page 10 I should like to draw my right hon. Friend's attention to No. 4, which states:

"The reference to the Lord Chancellor's Department includes the department of the Accountant General of the Supreme Court and the department of the Public Trustee (whether or not either office is held by the Permanent Secretary to the Lord Chancellor)."

I do not understand why it is necessary for that to be defined so closely in that specific note. I am certain that there must be an admirable reason for it, but it does not readily strike me.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) rightly called for greater powers for the commissioner. One of the frustrations of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration is that present powers do not appear to encompass all the cases that could be brought before us. I can recall that when the office of parliamentary commissioner was established it was said that the office may trespass upon the work undertaken by individual Members. It is clear that that has not been the outcome. Indeed, quite the reverse has been so. Members of Parliament, recognising the importance of the office, have been only too happy to recommend cases to the commissioner so that they may be dealt with adequately. I join the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East —not for the first time and I am certain not for the last —in saying that the ombudsman should have additional and greater powers. I look forward to the occasion when another Bill may be brought before the House which gives the ombudsman the powers that hon. Members on both sides of the House consider to be appropriate.

There is so much more in this important Bill to which I could refer. I shall resume my place, however, in the hope that when my right hon. Friend the Minister replies he will touch upon some, if not all, of the issues which I have raised.

8.2 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): First, I wish to apologise to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office for inadvertently missing his opening remarks in this debate, which crept up on me somewhat surreptitiously. In my experience, it is rare that complaints from my constituents require the ombudsman's intervention. That shows that in our public service there is still a high standard of administration. It is appropriate that we should pay tribute to the large band of civil servants and administrators in the Health Service who run their affairs in ways which lead to such comparatively few complaints.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) observed that the number of bodies to be investigated by the ombudsman has increased substantially. That is partly a consequence of a desire to devolve some of the responsibilities from central Government to subordinate bodies, and to that extent it is a healthy development. If I had a criticism to make of the Government, it is that there are moments when I fear that there is a slight impatience on their part which leads to a desire to take things into their own hands rather more than is sometimes wise. The devolution of power to many bodies, as set out in schedule 2, is a step in the right direction. There are bodies included in the list that are capable of acting unjustly and doing damage to individual citizens, whether by the grant of financial support or the refusal of it, or whatever, which means that we are right to have them open to inspection.

My disappointment with the ombudsman system is that in the collation and presentation of reports it is still arguable that not enough attention is paid to rules which, in their observation, are oppressive. The ombudsman is now employed to pass a judgment on behaviour which fits the rules even if the rules are oppressive. If there is a collection of cases caused by a rule which in itself is oppressive, it would be valuable if the ombudsman's reports drew rather more explicit attention to it. In my constituency, a business man is being oppressed in a way that would be unsusceptible to the intervention of the ombudsman. The authorities are behaving scrupulously, according to the rules, but the rules make it impossible for my constituent to receive justice. Where such cases cluster in the ombudsman's files, they should be brought out and exposed clearly to public view. I think sometimes that in the selection of cases for detailed report the ombudsman does not always do what he might. I should like my right hon. Friend to take note of that.

8.6 pm

Mr. Luce: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply briefly to an excellent debate.

I begin by thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) for the tribute that he paid to the standards of the Civil Service. In carrying out my duties as Minister with responsibility for the Civil Service, I have nothing but praise for the work that is done by civil servants. When we consider the number of complaints, the number of civil servants in post and the wide range of duties that they undertake, it is clear that they do an outstanding and remarkable job. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Sir P. Holland) is in his place and listening to the debate. He is precluded from contributing to it because he played an important role, as Chairman of the Standing Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration Bill. As the Bill is principally about the extension of the powers of the ombudsman to deal with quangos, it is right that I should pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the remarkable work that he has done in reducing their number. It is interesting to note that over the past eight years there has been a reduction of 509 quangos, and much of that reduction is due to my hon. Friend's work in drawing attention to the number of unnecessary quangos there were in existence. I am sure that he welcomes the fact that about 50 of them that come within the terms of the Bill have been included in schedule 2.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) rightly said that there are a number of grey areas when it comes to considering which bodies should or should not be included in the Bill. This issue was drawn to my attention also by my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey), who is a splendid watchdog of the work of the ombudsman. My hon. Friend made a probing and detailed speech in which he drew attention to the types of organisation that should or should not be included in the schedule.

It is worth reminding the House of the criteria for inclusion. First, bodies should be subject to some degree of ministerial accountability to Parliament because they are dependent for their financing and continuing existence on Government policy. Secondly, this should apply only to organisations with executive or administrative functions that directly affect individual citizens or groups of citizens. Clause 1 provides more detail for the criteria that should be provided. It is important to keep one's eye on the criteria that we are using to judge whether a certain body should be included or excluded.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East raised again the question of the Civil Aviation Authority. I understand the argument that he put forward, but we have to judge it against the criteria. The Bill makes it plain that nationalised industries are to be excluded from the jurisdiction of the ombudsman, for the reasons that I have given on many previous occasions. That is the principal reason why the Civil Aviation Authority is outside it, quite apart from the fact that many of its activities are subject to the Council on Tribunals which would in itself exclude it from inclusion in the Bill.

There is considerable consistency in the criteria which we apply, but there will always be a grey area. That is why it is important to remind the House that there is provision in the Bill to ensure that an Order in Council could be introduced, subject to negative resolution, at any time which would enable us to withdraw bodies from the schedule or to include new bodies. So there is considerable flexibility in the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth drew attention to several points, most of which I shall answer by letter. It might be as well to get one point on record. He referred to the fact that the Cabinet office is excluded from the provisions of the Bill and from the jurisdiction of the ombudsman. That is provided for in section 8 of the 1967 Act, which precludes the ombudsman from investigating the proceedings of the Cabinet or seeing Cabinet papers. It would be inappropriate to schedule a Department which deals primarily with ministerial consultations and Cabinet proceedings; in other words, the Cabinet office does not come strictly within the criteria of the jurisdiction of the ombudsman.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) gave me notice that he could not be here for my reply to the debate. I accept his strictures about the standards of plain English in our legislation. There could not be a more suitable person than my hon. Friend to be a watchdog of plain English, as he expresses himself with the utmost clarity. The House would do well to listen to his strictures, as I do. Certainly I believe, wearing my Civil Service Minister hat, that it is right to aim for legislation which is comprehensible. I think the House as a whole will accept the view that much of our legislation is not adequately comprehensible to the public.

I have sought to answer some of the points that were raised. We have had a fair crack of the whip in the amount of time given to this important debate on the powers of the ombudsman. There is widespread admiration for what he does. Questions about the basis upon which he might have to be retired are not an indication or reflection of anxiety about the health of the present ombudsman but relate simply to the circumstances in which it might be necessary to ask an ombudsman to retire on medical grounds or on grounds of mental health.

I warmly commend the Bill to the House. I hope that its remaining stages in another place will take place quickly and that the extended power for the ombudsman will be in practice before too long.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Public Order (Northern Ireland)

8.13 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I beg to move,

That the draft Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 19th February, be approved.

This order deals with a number of aspects of public order in Northern Ireland—processions and meetings, stirring up hatred or arousing fear, miscellaneous public order offences, and the repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954. The proposal for a draft order was published on 1 December for consultation. We received a substantial number of representations and as a result amendments have been made in this draft order which was laid in this House on 19 February. The order amends and consolidates public order legislation in Northern Ireland in the light of recommendations by the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and of developments in Northern Ireland since the law was last amended 15 years ago. In doing so, it takes account wherever possible of the changes made in public order legislation in Great Britain by the Public Order Act 1986.

The Government believe it right that the principles underlying public order legislation should be uniform throughout the United Kingdom, although local circumstances in Northern Ireland may require detailed provisions that are different. The draft order is designed to reflect this balance, and many of its key provisions reflect advice on public order matters given by the RUC.

In the last few weeks it has become clear that a campaign of serious misrepresentation has been launched against this order, alleging every form of wickedness about it: that it is some sinister plot to curb and prevent traditional marches, or that it is all the result of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Both these allegations are quite untrue, but those who make them are clearly seeking to excite Loyalist emotions, and I would therefore like to make the position quite clear.

This order represents no change in public policy toward marches, processions, and open air meetings. I respect the tradition of marching in Northern Ireland, and believe that the overwhelming majority of people in Northern Ireland wish to see marches conducted in a responsible way; and the figures show that that is in fact what normally happens. Last year there were 2,200 marches. I shall repeat that figure for the House because I believe that many people, who see just some marches, do not appreciate how many take place, mainly during the marching season. Last year there were 2,200, of which some 2,100 raised no public order problems of any gravity. In fewer than 70 was there even any commotion or disorder, although some produced quite serious disorder. In only 10 was any rerouting requested and in one single case, last Easter Monday at Portadown, the Chief Constable requested me to ban the march because he believed that the route chosen was unacceptably provocative. Those are the facts, and they show quite clearly that in the vast majority of marches there are no problems whatsoever.

However, all marches, including customary marches, make demands on police manpower and organisation. I believe all responsible people will accept the fairness of giving reasonable notice to the Royal Ulster Constabulary in time for it to notify officers if they will be required for extra duty. In no sense is this having to ask permission but rather giving fair notice so that the necessary police arrangements can be made and any queries raised, should there be in any case difficulty over the route chosen.

I hope that there is nobody in the House who does not accept that that is manifestly a reasonable proposition. Those who do not accept that should do the RUC and the Chief Constable the courtesy of reading any of his annual reports since 1981 in which he draws attention to the heavy burden and load placed on the RUC, not just by one section of the community but by both sides with their various traditional marches and activities.

In respect of the incitement provisions in the order, the misleading statements that have been made about stirring up hatred or arousing fear and the suggestion that the provisions are different from anything seen before, these provisions effectively reflect the provisions of the Public Order Act 1986 for England and Wales. Before that measure was enacted, the House will recall that when I originally published the proposal for a draft order I announced that we had not at that time had the opportunity to take account of the provisions in the Public Order Act 1986. I told the House that I would seek to include them in this order, and hon. Members will see that the provisions are included in the draft order.

The order encompasses an additional element about fear and religious belief, both of which reflect the unfortunate circumstances of Northern Ireland. Some hon. Members may think that this is a radical departure, but those things have been in Northern Ireland legislation since 1970. There has been misrepresentation about this order and about the repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954. There has been gross misrepresentation about the effect of the repeal of this Act. Leaving aside the facts that there has not been a single prosecution under this Act since 1969 and that its repeal will bring the legislation into line with the rest of the United Kingdom, the allegation is made that its repeal would somehow give equal status to the tricolour in Northern Ireland. I say clearly to the House that that is quite untrue.

The repeal of the Act will not affect the fact that the Union flag is the official flag of the United Kingdom and will continue to be the flag that is flown from public buildings on public occasions. There is no question of the Irish tricolour being given any status by the repeal. It will no longer be an offence in itself to interfere with the display of the Union flag on private property—such as might have occurred under the Act — but any such interference would involve the commission of other criminal or civil offences, such as criminal damage, so the peaceful display of the Union flag or any other flag will continue to be protected. The police will also retain their general duty under common law to take whatever steps are necessary to prevent a breach of the peace arising from the provocative display of any flag or emblem.

No hon. Member familiar with Northern Ireland will have any illusion about flags being an emotional issue. It is extremely easy to stir up all sorts of misunderstandings and rumour. This Act will be totally redundant, and its repeal makes no difference whatever to the present position. I hope that the people of Northern Ireland will understand that when some people seek to excite their emotions about the matter. Undoubtedly in the past the Act has been a source of great grievance for some people in Northern Ireland and it has long been felt by many, not least by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, that its repeal was long overdue.

A further criticism is that this Order enormously increases the powers of the police and my powers as Secretary of State. The draft order confers no new powers on the police, though it puts the existing power under common law to impose conditions on open air public meetings on to a statutory basis and redefines the grounds on which certain of their powers may be exercised. The only new power conferred on the Secretary of State is a power to exempt specified classes of processions from the notification requirements of article 3.

This exemption power is relevant to an anxiety that was expressed by the Salvation Army. Part II requires organisers of public processions to give seven days' notice to the police rather than the five days' notice that was previously required under the 1981 order. This requirement for advance notice applies to all public processions except funerals, but there is provision for the Secretary of State to exempt by order other classes or descriptions of processions. This provision could be applied, for example, to the regular Salvation Army processions which obviously contain no risk of public disorder. I mention that point because I know some people criticise our procedures and say that there is no opportunity for views to be taken into account. The House will know that this provision arose specifically as a result of representations by the Salvation Army and others, and we were certainly ready to meet their concerns with the amendment that is included in the draft order.

This order is different in one respect from previous Northern Ireland legislation and from legislation that applies in Great Britain. I refer to the requirement to give notice for processions which are customarily held in a particular area or along a particular route. Earlier I said that part of the purpose for the giving of notice is to give reasonable warning to the RUC, because its officers need reasonable notice to organise the extra duties that may be involved. Such duties may arise whether the march is customary or not. However, we know that in Northern Ireland traditional parades can, unfortunately, become the focus of disorder, although that is not necessarily the intention of the organisers. For that reason we feel that it is necessary to include customary parades in the ambit of the requirement to give notice.

One other concern arose during the consultation. It is about the incitement to hatred and the arousal of fear provisions. This matter was raised by the National Union of Journalists and others, who said that the provisions might interfere with the normal activities of the press in reporting events in Northern Ireland. I can assure the House that this is certainly not the intention, nor is it the effect, of the new provisions.

This matter arose during consideration of the Public Order Bill and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in Standing Committee G, on 22 March 1986 said, as reported in column 860, that the British Guild of Newspaper Proprietors had expressed similar fears about the equivalent provisions of that Bill. As a result, the Bill was amended on Report to include the words,

"having regard to all the circumstances".

This provision enables prosecuting authorities and the court to distinguish between legitimate reporting and comment, on the one hand, and inflammatory material, on the other. The relevant wording of the Public Order Act is replicated in this draft order.

The House will also note that the draft order maintains the power that the Secretary of State enjoys to ban a procession in consequence of information furnished to him by the Chief Constable or for any other reason. I find it extremely difficult to conceive of any occasion when I would think it possible or appropriate to exercise that power without information and advice from the Chief Constable. At the same time, the House will understand the ultimate responsibility that I bear for order in Northern Ireland, and will understand why it is sensible to retain that ultimate responsibility if for any other reason I thought that it might be desirable to ban a procession. I tell the House bluntly that I find it virtually inconceivable that such power would be excercised without the good advice of the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

One criticism is that, by this order, we are seeking to snuff out the traditional rights of protest and assembly that should exist in any civilised democratic society. I make it quite clear that that is in no sense our desire or intention. Incidentally, in one of the pamphlets that I have seen circulating in opposition to the order there is a suggestion that there is a distinction between the time requirement that is shown in the Public Order Act, which is six clear days, and the requirement in this order, which is seven days. I am not responsible for all the draftsmen. They have different ways of saying exactly the same thing.

The requirement to give notice might appear to infringe the opportunity for genuine spontaneous demonstration. The order takes into acount circumstances in which a demonstration is genuine and it is simply not practicable for the required notice to be given. A reasonable and practicable provision is included.

A further charge involves the registration of bands. That feature is different in the order. Of course, anybody who knows traditional Northern Ireland marches will know that the number and type of bands differ from those that one might expect in other parts of the United Kingdom.

The registration of bands is not new. It was introduced into Northern Ireland legislation in 1971. The proposals for registration have never been implemented. I make it absolutely clear that the Government have no intention of doing so at present. At the same time, I recognise and welcome the recent announcement that the Orange order is to introduce a charter for the conduct of bands participating in Orange parades. I am sure that that is a responsible and sensible piece of self-regulation which should be likely to meet the situation.

The truth about the order, unlike the misrepresentations that have been put out about it, is that, in part, it follows a number of the Chief Constable's recommendations about public order. It carries forward the improvements contained in the Public Order Act 1986 for England and Wales, with the modifications that are needed for the special circumstances of Northern Ireland. It involves the development of policies and the guidance and important role played by Sir John Hermon as Chief Constable. In successive annual reports, he has advised of the need to find a more sensible and more orderly way in which the good traditions of marching can be protected and in which some of the elements that seek to disrupt and abuse such privileges and opportunities can be sensibly dealt with.

Society in Northern Ireland has paid a heavy price for disorganisation, disruption, human conflict and, undoubtedly, the resources that have been involved year after year in trying to bring order into certain areas in which it has been seriously disrupted. The order contains nothing that any responsible person in Northern Ireland need fear.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The order occupies approximately 21 pages. One almost hopes that the debate will not be too lengthy, but how in heaven's name can one get through this matter in a short time? Why it is an order and not a Bill?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman may have heard my opening remarks in which I made it clear that, under the procedure that the House adopts in the system of issuing proposals for a draft order for consultation, the opportunities for formal consultation are clearly established. In seeking to maintain the consistency of Northern Ireland legislation in this field, the Order in Council procedure has been followed. I make no secret of the fact that I should have liked to see the possibility of developing alternative procedures. It is a pity that the House has not addressed that matter.

As long ago as February 1986, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister specifically offered Unionist Members and other hon. Members the opportunity to discuss the procedures under which Northern Ireland legislation is handled in the House. It is a great pity that that opportunity was not taken. It is worth noting that those who make allegations about the order outside the House as though it is the end of civilised life in Northern Ireland as they know it are not prepared to take the opportunity to raise any points arising from it, either inside the House or during the consultation period. The reality is that they are either grossly negligent about the interests of their constituents or are wholly exaggerating their fears. The order consolidates in part what the House discussed at considerable length in relation to the Public Order Act 1986. In certain other respects, it carries forward and clarifies a certain amount of the existing Northern Ireland legislation.

Although I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's point about the length of the order, my illustration of its components will help to clarify it. I make no secret of the fact that—I say this quite straightforwardly to the hon. Gentleman — I should like to see discussions on alternative ways in which Northern Ireland legislation of such significance could be handled in the House.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does the Secretary of State accept that to make a charge of negligence is only to aggravate a condition? Surely he would wish to withdraw that charge.

Mr. King: I gave the House the opportunity to choose between the alternative conclusions. I leave the hon. Gentleman to make his judgment. I happen to believe in the House. I happen also to believe that we live in a parliamentary democracy in which arguments and disagreements are brought out into the open and issues are discussed. If the issues are about disorder — I do not often agree with the hon. Gentleman, as he knows—or if they are about how legislation is handled, it is a fair point to make, and the House should consider it. I respect the fact that he raised it.

I say clearly again to all hon. Members and to those who are interested in our proceedings that the order contains nothing that any responsible person in Northern Ireland need fear. Rather, it is to be welcomed by all who wish to see honourable traditions maintained and exercised, free of abuse, intimidation and fear, and who recognise the need to support the RUC and for it to have the necessary and appropriate powers to maintain the peace and to protect the law-abiding people of Northern Ireland. I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): In replying to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) the Secretary of State was very frank. Let me be equally frank. I found much of what the Secretary of State has just said very persuasive. The division across the Dispatch Boxes tonight arises not from what he said; nevertheless, it is of the Government's own making. It is the clearest example for a long time of the unsatisfactory procedure by which we legislate for Northern Ireland. If ever there were legislation that was not appropriate for an unamendable order, it must be the provisions that we are now discussing. The Opposition accept that there is a need for reviewing the public order provisions which exist for Northern Ireland. The differences between us and the Government may fairly be said to be largely matters of judgment—where the balance should be struck between the various interests and the various rights that have to be protected.

But this is an area where balance is all-important, where it is vital to examine the details of how a provision will operate and what its impact will be in various situations. If this had been a Second Reading debate, we might have been able to say, "Let the Bill proceed; we shall discuss our reservations and anxieties in Committee; then, on Third Reading, we shall assess what progress has been made towards a consensus on the controversial issues and whether we can accept the final edition." But that option has been denied to us. We are presented with a sealed package containing a variety of provisions, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough said, with little in common, except that they may all be described as relating to public order and we are told to take it or leave it.

Perhaps it was naive of me, in the light of our experience with the Government's business managers—I accept the distinction between the Northern Ireland Office and the Government's business managers — to expect something better, but I really did expect something better. Together with the Minister of State, we have just taken part in the Committee stage of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill. It was a refreshing experience. There were genuine discussions; minds actually met; and there was give and take. I doubt whether any hon. Member who took part in the Committee proceedings was not persuaded to a change of mind on some question by the arguments.

We are not wholly happy with the outcome; there are still differences between us. But we enjoyed the experience —a novel one in Northern Ireland matters—of seeking together after truth instead of proceeding to an all-or-nothing vote. I had hoped that the Government would want to repeat that experience—if not by way of a Bill, as I understand that there are constraints on time, at least by way of a preliminary debate that would permit a test of feelings in the House on some of the controversial issues, before the House was presented with the final draft.

I am sure that I am not betraying any confidence—in fact, I think that the Secretary of State implied it—if I say that that possibility was explored through that mysterious process which we call "the usual channels". However, I suspect that the Government lost interest when they failed to reach an agreement on our procedures which would include the two major Unionist parties. That was the reason which the Secretary of State gave a moment ago to my hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough.

But the hon. Members of the two Unionist parties are not the only Members of this House who want to discuss matters relating to Northern Ireland. They are not the only Members of this House who represent constituencies in Northern Ireland. I very much regret that those hon. Members have not thought it right to come to the Chamber and participate in this debate, unsatisfactory though it is, and to express the views of their constituents. But it seems to me that it is even more regrettable that the Government have allowed that fact to preclude any experiment with our procedures. If abstentionism is seen to operate as a veto over any development, there is a clear bonus for abstentionism.

While I am still on the Second Reading part of my speech, may I take up something that the Secretary of State said a moment ago about consultation. There was a very short period for consultation. There are some problems relating to public order, which, as he said, are peculiar to Northern Ireland.

We accept that the provisions cannot be identical with those which apply to the rest of the United Kingdom. That is the very reason why it was necessary to have separate consultations in Northern Ireland. But there are many groups in Northern Ireland who are concerned with the same issues as concern groups in Great Britain. They want to demonstrate about boycotting South African goods, or about particular accident black spots, and they are entitled to express a view as to where the balance should be struck between those rights and the rights that are brought into issue by the special situation in Northern Ireland.

The time allowed after the draft was published to circulate members to convene meetings, to draft submissions and to get them agreed was six weeks, including the Christmas holiday. That is not genuine consultation. It was an invitation to come to the party, addressed to those who could not hope to make the journey before the gates were closed. I hope that the Government will take that on board for the future. Those of us who would like there to be discussion in Northern Ireland of what we would regard as the stuff of politics elsewhere had hoped that those groups would be encouraged to express a view. In many cases their view was excluded.

As for part II of the order, we are concerned about the fact that there is no limit on the categories of procession which may be the subject of conditions imposed by the police or of prohibition by the Secretary of State. There is power to prohibit a school crocodile or a funeral procession. It is only for the purpose of the provisions about the giving of notice that there is any limitation on the categories of procession in question. [Interruption.] If I mistake not, the Secretary of State is a little surprised to hear that, but if he reads the order he will see that that is what it says. Even those categories are much wider than the categories that are subject to the equivalent provisions in Great Britain. The Public Order Act 1986, to which the Secretary of State referred limits those categories in section 11 to processions intended

> "(a) to demonstrate support for or opposition to the views or actions of any person or body of persons,
> (b) to publicise a cause or campaign, or
> (c) to mark or commemorate an event."

For the equivalent provisions in this order, the term "procession" is all-embracing, subject only to very limited exceptions. Those exceptions are to be found in article 3(4). There is only one specific exemption. That is the one to which the Secretary of State referred. A requirement of notice does not apply to a funeral procession, although the police may impose conditions on it and the Secretary of State may direct that the deceased shall not be accorded a funeral procession at all.

The other provision in article 3(4) empowers the Secretary of State to exempt the provisions of a specific class or description. I hope, as he pointed out, that the Secretary of State will at once exempt obviously innocuous processions like those of the Salvation Army. But there is no general exemption for the school crocodile. Is it seriously intended that notice must be given before a class of schoolchildren can move from one building to another, or will that be one of the exemption orders that he makes? If so, perhaps the Minister of State will tell us so at the end of the debate.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has referred to article 3(4). It is arguable that greater latitude is here given by the Secretary of State under article 3(4)(b) for precisely the opposite reasons from those given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Crocodiles of schoolchildren could just as easily be excluded from that category by the Secretary of State. It is a little disingenuous of him to say that it automatically follows that school crocodiles would be included when this power has been taken precisely in order to deal with innocuous occasions of that kind.

Mr. Archer: I hope that the Secretary of State will take careful note of what the hon. Gentleman has just said, because I echo it. But if the intention were to exclude school crocodiles, why not say so in the order and set everybody's mind as rest? We have specifically excluded funeral processions. What is so different about school crocodiles? I understand that it was the Salvation Army kind of situation that the Secretary of State had in mind. If he intends to exempt school crocodiles, the sooner he says so and sets our minds at rest the better.

What about trade union processions? To my knowledge, they have never been a source of violence or disorder in Northern Ireland. Are trade unions to be brought into these provisions by stealth, as they have been in previous legislation, simply because they are not included among the exceptions?

Article 2(2) includes a requirement that is absent from the Public Order Act 1986 which applies in Great Britain. As the Secretary of State has just reminded us, in Northern Ireland the notice must include the number of persons who are likely to take part in the procession. I assume that one reason for its absence from the Act is that it is virtually impossible for the organisers of a procession to know in advance the numbers likely to take part. Anybody who has tried to organise a meeting of hon. Members in this House will know that there is no way of predicting how many are likely to turn up.

I confess that I am not sure of the consequences if the organisers get the numbers wrong. Article 3(5)(b) states that a person who organises or takes part in a procession

"which is held on a date, at a time or along a route which differs from the date, time or route specified in relation to it in the notice" shall be guilty of an offence. There is nothing about getting the numbers wrong. Article 3(5)(a) states that it is an offence to organise or take part in a procession

"in respect of which the requirements of the Article as to notice have not been satisfied".

One of those requirements is that the numbers likely to take part shall be specified, but so is the date, the time and the route. Do the Government take the view that article 3(5)(a) does not apply to those requirements and that they have to be dealt with separately in article 3(5)(b)? If so, why do the words of article 3(5)(a) not mean what they appear to mean in ordinary English? If it does apply, why is it necessary to make special provision for failure to supply those details in article 3(5)(b)? If that is necessary, and as there is no provision in article 3(5)(b) for failing to specify the expected numbers, what is the sanction against someone who fails to specify the exempted numbers?

While the Secretary of State is sorting that out, before leaving article 3(5) I note that the order makes it an offence not only to organise a procession in respect of which the requirements as to notice have not been satisfied, but even to take part in such a procession. That is a clear contrast with section 11(7) of the Act which applies to Great Britain.

I appreciate that it is not always easy to identify the organisers when confronted by a procession. If there had been an opportunity to discuss the order in Committee and to suggest amendments, we might have explored how to meet that difficulty. But have the Government considered the consequences of what they are doing here for someone who is exercising his right simply to take part in an apparently lawful procession? That person has to ask to see a copy of the notice which has been given, to satisfy himself of its accuracy and that it was properly given, or risk being found guilty of an offence which carries a penalty of up to six months' imprisonment. That is such an incursion into a right which is taken for granted in a democracy that it cannot be acceptable.

Finally, among the provisions relating to the notice of processions, the Public Order Act permits notice to be served by post. No such facility is contemplated in this order. I understand that there may be a problem for those organising processions in England, if the route lies through the areas of two or more police authorities, but surely that is not the question. The question is whether the police can live with service of notice by post. In Great Britain they can. What is so different in Northern Ireland that police stations cannot be equipped with letter boxes?

I have just referred to the requirement of notice. The questions multiply when one turns to imposing conditions and prohibitions. They include not only processions, but open-air meetings. They are concerned not only with marching through an area, past people's homes, but with meetings in which people stay in the same place. It is true that the Act relating to Great Britain refers to assemblies, although it does not call them public meetings. The Secretary of State did not explain why there has been a change in terminology. An "assembly" is defined as 20 or more people. There is no similar limitation for the definition of a public meeting in the order. Presumably, it could be a public meeting, if the chairman and the secretary only were there.

I understand that in Northern Ireland, perhaps on a day for which a rally or a general strike has been arranged, a few people standing on a street corner in a housing estate may amount to an unspoken threat. If that is the situation that the Government contemplate in the order, they have not dealt with it. Although the definition in the order does not say one way or the other, I assume that a private conversation is not included, even if it is in a public place and attended by half a dozen people.

The term "meeting" surely implies an element of formal procedure, with a chairman and speeches, and it must entail a degree of prior organisation with invitations to the public to attend. So the provision misses what some may think should be its real target. I wonder why there has been a change in terminology from the word "assembly", which might have hit the target, but what it may well catch is a vigil outside a church or an industrial picket. Whatever the Government's intention, the order is not an appropriate vehicle for changing the law relating to industrial disputes. If the Government wish to do that, they should introduce an order dealing with industrial relations, when everyone is on notice as to what they are about.

The grounds on which a police officer may act in imposing conditions, and on which the Secretary of State may act in prohibiting a procession or meeting, go well beyond public order considerations. If a police officer has to decide whether to impose conditions because the procession may result in what he has to consider is its impact on such things as shopping or transport. That means that he must balance the right to shop against the right to demonstrate. In certain circumstances that judgment may have to be made. There can be no absolute rule either way because neither right is sacrosanct. A balance must be struck in each situation.

"serious disruption to the life of the community,"

But that is a political judgment which cannot be struck by any rigid application of some rule, even if the order contained rules, which it does not. But the order states that that judgment must be made by a police officer. A police officer is not the right person to make such a judgment. Even if his decision is subject to judicial review, the grounds on which a review can be entertained do not extend to the courts substituting their judgment for that of the police officer. Even if they did, the court is hardly a more appropriate vehicle to make a political judgment than a police officer.

The Secretary of State reminded us of some of the things said by the Chief Constable. Last year the Chief Constable very fairly said that that is not a task for which the police should be made responsible. He suggested a tribunal. I would not go to the stake for any particular solution to the problem. But I am sure that, in Northern Ireland especially, no one will be satisfied by a political judgment which is made by the police. Indeed, that is not fair to the police.

Mr. Cash: I am not sure whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman is referring to the difference between a public assembly and an open meeting. I believe that his first point related to the size of the meeting. He has now moved on to the question of the extent to which the police will make decisions. On that point, I refer him to section 14 of the Public Order Act 1986, in which it is quite clear that both provisions are on the same main point.

Mr. Archer: I was not making the point that there is a difference between who makes the decision here and who makes it under the Public Order Act, but I was making the point that, in Northern Ireland especially, political decisions should not be made by the police. I am not happy about the police making political decisions anywhere, but in Northern Ireland in particular it cannot be a way of increasing public confidence to know that a decision was made by the police. Moreover, it is not fair to the police.

The equivalent judgment in relation to a prohibition is to be made by the Secretary of State. That is right in principle; political judgments should be made by a politician who is answerable to the House. But it does not follow that the people of Northern Ireland repose complete confidence in an English Secretary of State. His judgment is not always seen as unquestionable so that further argument is precluded.

The right to judicial review would have enabled a court to inquire whether that judgment was based on accurate factual information; whether it took account of all relevant factors; and whether it was influenced by wholly improper considerations. More extensive use of the public review procedure in recent years has, indeed, restored some public confidence in administration, yet in article 5(3) we read:

"A recital in an order made by the Secretary of State under paragraph (1) as to his opinion and the information upon which that opinion was formed shall be conclusive evidence of the matters stated therein."

Presumably that is intended to exclude judicial review. It is a recital that the Secretary of State is to be deemed infallible, his powers are not to be questioned in the courts, and he is above the law. Why does the Secretary of State want to go out of his way to minimise public confidence in these procedures? Have the ineptitudes of the Secretary of State for the Environment and the consequent succession of chastisements he has received from the courts caused the entire Cabinet to resolve to place their activities beyond the reach of the law?

Next the order permits the Secretary of State to prohibit a procession or meeting if it is likely to cause

"undue demands to be made upon the police or military forces."

Clearly it would be a consideration to be taken into account if the police were precluded from protecting the public against crime. But what is an undue demand on the police must depend partly on what resources have been made available to them. It would be curious if the Government could reduce the rights of a citizen by reducing the resources available to the police. Our civil liberties would rest in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and, given the present incumbent, that would not inspire confidence. Yet that is what is what the order implies. I venture to predict that if that provision were challenged under the European convention on human rights, the Government may well find that they are in breach.

Before I leave part II of the order, I wonder whether article 4(1)(b) hits the target at which it is aimed. No one can have sympathy with a procession or meeting held to intimidate people, but I see two shortcomings in the test of intimidation. First, it is based on the purpose of the event, so the test is subjective: what do the organisers intend? Would it not have been better to speak of the likely consequence and so to introduce an objective test? Secondly, intimidation is defined as "the intimidation of others with a view to compelling them not to do an act they have a right to do, or to do an act they have a right not to do".

Intimidation does not always consist of compelling people to do something. It may amount simply to placing them in fear. If, in consequence, they decide that they cannot face the situation any longer and they sell up and move away, those who organised the meeting may be able to say with truth that that was not their purpose and that all they meant to do was to terrify the local population. Had there been a Committee stage, we might have made that provision more effective.

Finally on part II, since there is a requirement that there shall be seven days' notice of the intention to hold a procession, should there not be ample notice to the organisers if conditions are to be placed on that procession or if it is to be prohibited? If they are to be told of these directives at the last minute when everyone has assembled that may well invite unnecessary trouble.

We welcome part III. The right of free speech cannot be absolute and one proper restriction is that it must not be abused to stir up tribal hatred or to arouse fear. The most obvious target in Northern Ireland will be people on one side of the sectarian divide, but there is a Chinese community there which sometimes feels anxiety and there are Indian families who could easily become a target. I understand that the legislation which exists in Great Britain against discriminatory behaviour—for example, in the supply of goods—has no equivalent in Northern Ireland. I hope that the Government will address themselves one day to that, but this, at least, is a beginning.

On the remainder of the order, we are pleased to see the Government implementing their promise to repeal the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954. That Act can render unlawful in Northern Ireland conduct which would be perfectly lawful in Birmingham, Manchester or Glasgow. It is intended to be discriminatory, and it is a pointless and provocative restriction on civil rights. We shall not mourn its passing.

Two articles require further discussion. Article 21 imposes sanctions on the wearing of a uniform, but there is no definition of that term. If in a public place in Northern Ireland I arrive wearing a Labour party rosette, is that a uniform? What if I wear a Labour party tie? What if, simply because it is fashionable amongst those of us who are bright and young, I wear a red jersey, particularly if, having regard to the bright spring sunshine, I add a pair of sunglasses? What of the French tourist whom we discussed in Standing Committee on the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill who turns up wearing a beret?

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): A brown beret.

Mr. Archer: I think we mentioned a red or black beret, but the possibilities are endless. I shall not embark on them.

However reasonably the courts construe the term, it is important that people should know clearly whether they are infringing the criminal law. They should know what they have a right to do and what will render them liable to three months' imprisonment. That article requires further discussion.

As to article 23, I do not say that trespass should never, in any circumstances, be a criminal offence. But we should exercise great restraint in applying criminal sanctions to what has historically been a matter for civil litigation, particularly when we turn to article 24(2) and find that it carries a power of arrest without warrant.

The article applies to entry into any public building as a trespasser. It would apply to occupation in the course of an industrial dispute. Whatever the merits of limiting the actions of employees in such a situation, they require separate discussion and debate and belong in industrial relations legislation. Even if we are considering the right to carry out a political demonstration in a public building, I am not persuaded that tenants of the Housing Executive who feel so strongly about an issue that they would be moved to protest by visiting the official concerned therefore should be guilty of a criminal offence, provided that their entry and protest are without violence.

The reason why we cannot support this order is not that we do not believe that there are problems in Northern Ireland relating to public order; not that we object to every solution that the Government propose; not that we believe that all Northern Ireland legislation should be by way of a Bill with a formal Committee stage; not even the absence of proper consultation; but that the Government have wholly failed to distinguish between proposals that can be adequately discussed by way of an unamendable order and proposals which, by reason of their importance, their impact upon basic rights and the necessity of striking the right balance in each case, require fuller discussion in the House—the only forum in which they can be properly discussed. A Government who do not appreciate that distinction are not sensitive to the needs of a democracy and cannot be entrusted with the judgments entailed in this legislation.

I believe that many of our anxieties are shared by Conservative Members and we invite them to join us in the Lobby tonight.

9.8 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I agree with much of what the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said about this being an order rather than a Bill. The experience of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill, has been good. Although I did not serve on the Standing Committee, I am sure that my right hon. Friend and the Minister of State will agree that as a result of that process the Bill will be given Royal Assent as an improved Bill.

The legislative procedure enables hon. Members who are concerned about aspects of a Bill to express their concern and to press Ministers in detail by tabling amendments. If they are satisfied with the assurances that they receive from Ministers they can withdraw their amendments. At least the facility exists, even if hon. Members do not choose to press their amendments to a vote. The procedure enables hon. Members to seek assurances, undertakings and statements from the Government. It enables hon. Members who feel strongly about an aspect of a Bill to register their protest, while welcoming the Bill generally.

I find myself in such a situation with regard to the order. There is much in the order with which I am in agreement. There is much in it to commend it to the House. A certain amount of consolidation is necessary, and the order, rightly, does that and will ensure that we have one reference point in the future. I welcome that aspect of the order.

However, I am concerned about the repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954, although not to the extent of voting against the order tonight. That is the problem. The order is on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. If we wish to register a protest about some aspect, we can do so only by opposing the whole order. I do not wish to do that and I shall not do so later, but I am worried about the flags and emblems aspect.

I accept entirely the view that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expressed in his speech earlier, that there is no nasty dark plot behind this. He rightly drew attention to the fact that no cases had resulted from the 1954 Act since 1969. I accept that that is probably a largely redundant Act, but I question the wisdom of repealing it at this time.

A large section of the Northern Ireland community—the Unionist community in particular—for better or worse, rightly or wrongly, feel that the Government have let them down. I accept my right hon. Friend's statement earlier, but the perception among those on the other side of the water will be that this is some dark and devious plot. I and most hon. Members know that that is not so, but that will be the perception. I wonder whether now is the right time to repeal that Act. The Government have the difficulty of trying to secure agreement and support—I do not think that they will get it, but they will seek to do so—for the Anglo-Irish agreement. This will not help the Government in that task. We should let sleeping dogs lie when we need so much good will and when the Government are having great difficulty in obtaining support from the Unionist community in Northern Ireland for their Anglo-Irish agreement. It must surely be unwise to include that item in the order, although that, of itself, will not make me oppose the order later.

I understand entirely why my right hon. Friend has felt it necessary to require notice of demonstrations. I accept that he is introducing the measure on the advice of the RUC. The RUC has a difficult job in Northern Ireland at present and anything that it recommends to the Government must be taken seriously. There will be some concern in some parts of the Northern Ireland community about the extent to which legitimate protest is being frustrated. I was glad to have my right hon. Friend's assurance from the Dispatch Box earlier that the right of legitimate protest will not be limited. In a democracy, even in Northern Ireland where there are strains on the democracy, it must be right for communities to be able to register their protest peacefully.

My right hon. Friend said that the Government had responded to the consultation with regard to the measure whereby there will be the opportunity for spontaneous demonstrations. My right hon. Friend has on one occasion used the example of the welcoming of a football team, or something of that kind. Such a spontaneous public demonstration of support would not require the six or seven-day rule. However, if a senior politician representing the Irish Government went to Stormont to participate in some aspect of the Anglo-Irish agreement discussions, some people might want to demonstrate spontaneously about intrusion by a foreign politician. Will that be caught by the order? My right hon. Friend shakes his head and I am grateful to him for that. He has reassured me that that will not be the case.

Much in this order needs to be implemented. I support it but I regret that we legislate for Northern Ireland in a different way from the rest of the United Kingdom. The experience of the Bill recently before the House was good because it resulted in full discussions on all aspects of the Bill. Hon. Members were able to respond to those concerns in a very positive way.

I wish it were possible for this order to be the subject of a Bill instead. Nevertheless, I shall support it.

9.16 pm

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): I preface my remarks by saying that, like the Secretary of State, I have been astounded. I did not realise that there was so much concern for civil liberties in the north of Ireland until the debate on this order started.

I think that we must look at it—and I choose to do this—from three angles, because, unless we do, we shall not be dealing with it in the proper way. We must look at it in the context of what is happening in the north of Ireland and the quality of life that we are experiencing there; we must look at it from the point of view of the rights of the individual; and, equally important, we must look at it from the point of view of the rights of the community.

I have heard the term "civil libertarian" used more often in the past three or four weeks than I have ever heard it in northern Irish life. I hope that I speak in this debate as nothing other than a civil libertarian. I came into politics through street protest, through a civil rights organisation, and I wish to preserve the absolute right to make a peaceful protest for every single person in the north of Ireland. But I say that with the civil libertarian conviction that those who are charged with administering society have a responsibility to protect the weak, the defenceless, the most vulnerable people, and not in any way to bolster the bully, the bigot or the triumphalist. That definition of a civil libertarian approach is one that I hope I shall be able to express in my remarks on the order.

I must examine the order in the context of Northern Ireland in the recent past. Listening to the Secretary of State and the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) I began to wonder whether I was living in a different world; I began to wonder whether I was imagining things that have happened over the past two or three years; I began to wonder whether I had been dreaming about last summer and the summer before and the summer before that. There was an air of unreality about it, and that centred on two things.

I do not wish to do a disservice to the Secretary of State, but I think that he was slightly disingenuous when he made his remarks about the way in which processions and marches take place in the north of Ireland. I have no objection whatsoever to people marching, for whatever reason, provided that they do not do it to insult another section of the community; provided that they do not do it in such a way as to bring disruption to the lives of ordinary people; and provided that it is not a coat-trailing exercise — a way of inflaming passions within the community.

I say that very clearly because the reality is that we do have a triumphalist approach, we do have a display of atavism right from Easter Monday to 22 November, which I personally cannot believe the north of Ireland can stand much longer, not just in terms of the disruption of people's lives or the fear and tension that it creates, but in terms of the cost to the Exchequer and, as a result of that, to the community.

I could understand the great desire to hold marches, processions and public meetings if they were held to celebrate something, to bring joy to the community, not, as unfortunately many of them are, as a statement of ascendancy by one section of the community over the other. I see no excuse for allowing a small or large section of any community to create that tension, fear and community upheaval on an on-going basis without being able to defend the right of the weak and vulnerable people within our society who suffer as a result.

I do not want to labour the House with details or examples. I shall refer specifically to Portadown, a place which over the years has experienced curfews for four or five days running because of the insistence of Loyalist marches through the Obin street area and the Gervaghy road area where there is no support for those who are organising the marches. I use the word "curfew" consciously because the protection afforded by the security forces for the marchers — not to protect the people who should be protected—takes about four days to set up and dismantle. Can we ask people to continue like that, especially as there is an acceptable alternative route for those marchers to which no-one would object? The alternative route is shorter and more direct. It is there; let it be used.

I think of people in Rathfriland who, at certain times in July, are in such fear of their lives that it is unbelievable. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Secretary of State and the Minister of State for the way that they got to grips last year with that tribal night when the ritualistic attacks took place.

I think of people in places such as Cookstown and Dunlow where they have to undergo an exercise in intimidation on a bi-yearly basis. Those people deserve our consideration. They deserve our consideration in civil libertarian terms and I must say, having experienced this sort of thing first hand in the north of Ireland for many years, the lives of ordinary people who want simply to live out their lives in peace during the summer months are much more of concern to me than where the full stop goes in this order or where one word might replace another.

As the Secretary of State has said, we have 2,200 marches in a year. That is a large number of marches. The Secretary of State understated the situation. I believe that it was he who confirmed that of the 2,200 marches, about 186 are contentious and involve considerable controversy. Those controversial marches have caused great suffering and cost to the community. For example, the Official Report shows that the demonstration that took place on the so-called day of action on 3 March 1986 cost £470,000 in police overtime alone. That is £470,000 of our money. If it cost that in police overtime, what did it cost overall and in terms of claims against the Northern Ireland Office?

Another example from the Official Report shows that between May and September of 1986 it took 334,000 police man hours to police that sort of march. To my reckoning —it is a conservative reckoning—that would work out somewhere in the region of £8 million. I can think of a lot of things and a lot of people in the north of Ireland who could do with £8 million. I think of the number of schools it would build and the facilities that could be put into hospitals. I think of the number of tables on which £8 million could put food where at present there is simply no food.

We cannot allow to continue — we must rethink — anything which has this cost in human suffering, disruption and financial loss. If we are to be serious about it, now is the time. I dislike many things in this order but I shall have to swallow them. Against that I have to weigh my own views and prejudices. I have to think of the welfare of old people in Portadown during 1987, 1988 and 1989, and of young families living in Kilkeel under the type of physical attack that they experienced last year. I have to think of watching a man and his family in their house in Keady which was set on fire during a procession. The police and fire brigade could not get into the house and only by the grace of God did that family get out.

I have to think of a working man coming home from a 12-hour stint in Belfast, having driven 40 or 50 miles, being caught up in a parade in his own village night after night, having to leave his car and walk another one and a half miles home after a hard day's work. I have to think of the quality of our lives which are scarred by violence, eaten into by unemployment, and which must be protected from bigotry, triumphalism and coat-trailing exercises.

Secondly, I focus on the rights of the individual. It is essential that each person has the right to peaceful protest. Any attempt to remove that right will be counter-productive. Every person in society must have the right to free speech and to hold meetings where he can peacefully propagandise his own views. But he cannot do that at the expense of the young, the old, or the families of the community. We take a very simplistic and sincerely naive approach and we react as refugees from the reality of Northern Ireland if we do not face the problem and deal with it.

The Secretary of State could have been a little more honest when he referred to the differences between this order and the Public Order Act 1986. This order is substantially different in many ways, as it has to be, for very good and valid reasons. The Secretary of State has power to ban or re-route marches. If that power does not reside in the Secretary of State there is no ultimate protection for the community. The police, rightly, regard these marches as operational concerns and, like every other body of professionals, they are jealous of their ability to handle situations, some of which perhaps they cannot deal with. It is essential that that power resides in the Secretary of State and is used wisely and when necessary.

We have read and heard about static assemblies or outdoor meetings. I do not know if it is called a public meeting in this order. I remember seeing on television the Secretary of State being a victim of the actions of a static assembly. On Thursday last week I drove a carload of young people to a youth forum in my constituency to discuss unemployment. We came across a static assembly. It was not static for very long because concrete blocks came through the window of my car, which was seriously damaged and almost destroyed. Luckily, none of the young people was killed. They were going to a meeting to discuss how they might deal with unemployment and ways of creating peace. That is the reality of a static assembly.

I ask the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West to accept that people come out of the woodwork at night, or at some other time, do what they have to do—it is not always good — and disappear. In such circumstances, there must be the type of latitude that will allow the person on the spot to make a decision. That person on the spot will be a policeman.

Mr. Archer: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I suggested what I thought was a method of making these provisions more effective in relation to that situation.

Mr. Mallon: I accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point. I simply wanted to say that these things happen in such a way that no type of plan can cater for them.

There are four reasons why the powers under the order are in many ways much stronger than I should like: first, to prevent public disorder; secondly, to prevent serious damage to property; thirdly, to prevent serious disruption to the life of the community; and fourthly, to prevent intimidation of others. We must ask whether those are valid conditions. I believe that they are.

The order refers also to incitement to hatred or fear. But there has not been one conviction under the Prevention of Incitement to Hatred (Northern Ireland) Act 1970. The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights has said:

"By contrast in Great Britain not only has the law been strengthened since its original introduction but it has been applied and successfully enforced on a number of occasions".

There is a strong case for strengthening the law on incitement to hatred. The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights said:

"though there should be a presumption in favour of freedom of expression, every democratic state has had to recognise and define for itself permissible limits which may be placed upon freedom of expression in the interests of a greater good".

I put that in the context of the responsibilities under article 20(2) of the international covenant on civil and political rights, which states:

"Any advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discriminate, hostility or violence should be prohibited by law."

It does not say "may be", "might be", but "shall be". It is in those terms that I welcome this part of the order.

The standing advisory commission has summarised the reasons why this action is necessary in the north of Ireland and I should like to give examples which might bring us towards reality. First, religion and politics in the north of Ireland are so closely intertwined that there is an extra emotional dimension to the political arena. This stems from sincerely held political beliefs. Secondly, there is the effect of statements on the public. I should like to try one such statement on this public — the terms used by a politician in the north of Ireland who was sitting on an area board dealing with education. He said:

"They"—

meaning Catholic members of the community in the north of Ireland—

"should acquire an incinerator and burn the lot of them as they are only Fenian scum".

Those words were quoted at his trial on 2 October 1986. I know the effect that has on me and the effect that it will have on many right-thinking persons, but what effect will it have on hot-headed young people in the cauldron that exists in the north of Ireland?

The third reason the standing advisory commission gave was polarisation of society. Again I would like to use a quotation from an hon. Member speaking in Cookstown in 1986. The massive contribution made by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) towards the end of polarisation in the north of Ireland was:

"No self respecting Unionist should trade, buy, socialise or have anything to do with members of the SDLP or alliance party."

The fourth reason given is conformity with international obligations and I have already spoken about that. There are two key changes. First, in relation to the requirement to prove intent before convictions could be obtained in relation to the Prevention of Incitement to Hatred (Northern Ireland) Act 1970. Now the offence can be proved if there is likelihood of hatred or fear being aroused having regard to all the circumstances. Those people who make utterances of the type that I have quoted are well aware of the significance of such utterances. The final say rests with the courts and it will be interesting to see how they deal with the order.

I voice my concern about sections 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 in relation to the media. The power of the media is of particular significance after what happened in Glasgow over the Zircon affair. Everyone must be concerned about that. We must protect the rights of the media to report what has happened and what has been said. We must ensure that there is no pressure from any source upon the media. I know that the BBC and the Independent Broadcasting Authority are excluded from this legislation, but what will happen with regard to Radio Telefis Eireann? That broadcasts to the north of Ireland and it is bound by section 31 regulations preventing people from paramilitary groupings appearing on it. It is crucial that we defend the right of the press and the media whether electronic or written in every way that we can.

With regard to the repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954, unlike a previous speaker I do not see it as an emotional matter. It is an anachronism and a deplorable relic from a discredited regime. As it is written it is an insult to one section of the community and has been inoperative for a long time. It has succeeded in doing nothing but giving offence and allows people to surround flags and emblems with emotive connotations.

I have seen enough of what I would call brush-handle politics in the north of Ireland. Brush-handle politics means that one gets the flag, which it is assumed one respects, ties it to a brush handle and uses it as a means of annoying people who represent the political opposition. That happens with the Union Jack and with the tricolour. I believe that those people who use it for political, sectarian or religious purposes are demeaning not only themselves but the flag which they purport to respect.

I believe that that Act should be replaced by tolerance. I hope that it will be replaced by a new tolerance for the other tradition and for the symbols of the other tradition which may sooth the fears the other tradition may have about its position in Northern Ireland. I believe that if that tolerance comes out of consideration of this order it will represent an advancement on the present situation.

Reluctantly I shall vote for the order because I believe that it is the only way open to me to protect the well-being and the lives of the very old and the very young in the community from the excesses and triumphalism that they must endure each year.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I voted in favour of the Anglo-Irish Agreement and I never had any doubt that that agreement was the right way in which to tackle the problems of Northern Ireland and Southern Ireland. That was my view at the time of the vote.

The order has been brought before us under a procedure which differs from the public Bill procedure. I have considerable sympathy with those on both sides of the House who have expressed the view that it would be better if we could manage to produce a more satisfactory procedure for dealing with legislation affecting Northern Ireland. I have suggested in the past that we should have a Select Committee on Northern Ireland, or alternatively the ability to refer legislation of this sort to something in the nature of a Special Standing Committee. It seems imperative that such legislation should be examined thoroughly on a similar basis to that which exists for other legislation that is considered in the House.

Many who normally attend debates of this sort but who are not present this evening would argue for consistency in the legislative process, but the circumstances prevailing in Northern Ireland are quite different from those which pertain in the United Kingdom as a whole. It is equally true that the Official Unionists are deeply divided between themselves. I deplore the fact that they are not present this evening to consider the order. The Official Unionists are deeply divided and there are signs that soon there will be a severe split between them, leading to the Democratic Unionist party breaking away in a manner that will be potentially dangerous for the Province.

The proposals that are before us have been deeply and seriously misrepresented by those who oppose the principle of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. If we are to have marches — there are proper circumstances in which marches can take place in Northern Ireland—they must take place in a responsible and orderly manner. There is no doubt that, despite the instances given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, there have been a number of occasions, especially at Portadown, when the degree of civil disorder that transpired was so bad that new legislation was required. Much of this legislation is based upon the original legislation of 1970 and the Public Order Act 1986, and I welcome the provisions that are set out in the order. There is no doubt that we must have regard to the special circumstances of Northern Ireland in dealing with extremely difficult problems.

It seems that the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954 had become an anachronism, and it is as well that it is dealt with in the order. There has been criticism that public processions are not defined in a way that limits them to the sort of processions, apart from funeral processions, that should be covered. The fact is that there is and has been a significant misuse of the rights that exist. Therefore, it is right for the Secretary of State to extend to all processions the requirement to give notice of public processions, and I fully support the proposals in the order to that end.

There has been discussion about public meetings, about whether the size of a public meeting is sufficiently well defined and, by analogy, about whether it would be more appropriate for the definition of an assembly as set out in the Public Order Act 1986 to be applied in the order. When we consider the legislation which we passed recently affecting the rest of the United Kingdom and the circumstances in which legislation has to apply in Northern Ireland, the distinctions which have been drawn are entirely justified. I would go further and say that the powers which the Secretary of State has taken to himself are required because in the tragic circumstances which apply in Northern Ireland it is necessary to have a full-back provision.

The definitions of "fear" and "hatred" in article 8 regrettably have to apply to religious belief. The conditions which we hoped would have improved over the past 15 years have so markedly not improved that these definitions are required.

The order has been accused of doing many things, but it will provide for greater consistency in the legislation applying to the United Kingdom as a whole. There are differences but they are justifiable. We all regret that there is such a tragic situation in Northern Ireland, but I believe that the order will go a long way to improving it. The Anglo-Irish Agreement is still in place and it is clear that it will remain in place. The determination and courage of the Ministers who have had to maintain that policy are to be greatly applauded.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Universal opprobrium has been heaped from all parts of the House on the use of unamendable orders. I associate myself with those remarks, but I think that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) made the point eloquently when he said that the situation in Northern Ireland is not normal. So it is inevitable that procedures that none of us likes very much sometimes have to be used in the context of Northern Ireland.

I understood from what the Secretary of State said that he was willing to have discussions with hon. Members from other parts of the House, even perhaps in the absence of Members of the Unionist parties, about reintroducing more normal procedures in the use of Bills so that we can have proper debates, with amendments being tabled. That would mean that we would not be faced with the stark choice, as we will be when we vote tonight, of being for or against an order about which we all have reservations.

My right hon. and hon. Friends in the alliance parties will support the Government tonight because we recognise the realities which were spelt out by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh and which apply in Northern Ireland, although I understood and accept some of the points made by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer). He made an eloquent Second Reading speech and also dealt with some Committee points. If we could have had a Second Reading debate and a debate in Committee, I think that some of the differences between the two front Benches could have been ironed out and probably no Division would have been necessary. Any worries that we may have about the use of unamendable orders cannot surely match the deep repugnance that all of us must feel for the bigoted and menacing shows of strength that the Secretary of State described. I found it staggering that 2,200 marches have taken place in Northern Ireland in the last year.

I welcoming the order, I should like to thank the Secretary of State and the Minister of State for the response to the representations made by me and by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) in response to the invitation to take part in the consultation process. The letter that the Minister sent to us on 18 February answered a number of our reservations and worries. His assurance that spontaneous action would not be covered by the terms of this order, should effectively ensure that punitive action is not taken against innocuous groups of residents who wish to make some point about a burning local issue or against groups like school crocodiles mentioned by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West.

In our representations to the Minister and in the speech by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) on Second Reading of the Public Order Bill, we spelled out the inevitable concern of Liberals about striking the right balance between public order and the right peacefully to protest. We also place our longer-term trust in the confidence and trust of the community rather than in increased powers. The emphasis should be on a return to normal policing as quickly as possible. To facilitate that the time is ripe to establish more formal and mutually beneficial links and relationships between police at sub-divisional level and locally elected representatives and other responsible organisations and groups.

We should like to see established statutory police liaison committees, perhaps along the lines of those that have operated for many years in Derry, that contain an elected element and have a statutory right of consultation on marches and demonstrations. Members of these committees should be required to make a declaration committing themselves to democratic methods and a renunciation of violence. I should like to see experiments in community policing in areas where that is possible. The Royal Ulster Constabulary should consider having open days so that the public can obtain a clearer idea of the nature of police work.

All these trends can be encouraged, but we accept that they cannot be realistic at the moment because of the situation in Northern Ireland. We want to see as much movement as possible towards normalisation, and we do not want to see a reduction in civil liberties as a result of the present strife in Northern Ireland. That is why we also want the Goverment to consider complementing the kind of measures they are introducing by, for instance, establishing a wholly independent police complaints board.

We would also like to see the incorporation of a Bill of Rights—even in lieu of incorporation into the statutes for the rest of Great Britain—in the laws of Northern Ireland. We would like to see that backed by a commission on human rights. Although that kind of legislation will not necessarily be a panacea, it will safeguard the sort of civil liberties and civil rights that quite properly have been raised by hon. Members in this debate.

The issue of marches is the primary concern of this debate. We recognise that many of the marches are intimidatory and offensive, and are designed to create tension and to whip up unrest. Their use by extreme elements has been a chief cause of the never-ending hostility between the two warring tribes. Marches often incite and offend and that inevitably leads to retaliatory action. We have heard something about that in the debate.

The motives of people outside the House who are opposed to these orders were well summed up in remarks by the hon. Members for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) and for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams). Their words demonstrate the reasons why those hon. Members are opposed to the order and perhaps why hon. Members in the House ought to be united in supporting the order. In the Irish News of 26 February the hon. Member for Belfast, West said:

"'The real purpose of the Public Order Bill however is the further repression of Republican and nationalist expression. It will significantly restrict free speech and political expression and is quite specifically aimed at the traditional Easter commemorations.'"

His remarks — ironically, some might think — were echoed by the hon. Member for Antrim, North. The Belfast Telegraph states that, last month, he "told a Press conference in Belfast that the new legislation on public order was designed to 'stifle' protest against the Anglo-Irish Agreement."

He is reported as saying:

"when the order became law there should be a 'simultaneous uprising' by loyalists in towns, villages and hamlets throughout Northern Ireland".

The article further states:

"parades and public meetings should be held as an act of defiance against the new measures, which, he claimed, were a direct result of the Intergovernmental Conference.

He said: 'This, the latest product of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, is an attempt to stifle completely the voice of protest, and to destroy civil and religious liberties in Northern Ireland.'"

I refute what the hon. Members for Belfast, West and for Antrim, North have said. It is significant that they are united in their opposition to the order. They recognise that if the ugliness of marches can be taken off the streets of Northern Ireland, and if some order can be put in the place of menacing and intimidating marches, the kind of extremism for which they stand can be combated. It certainly will lead to the normalisation of Northern Ireland that the Anglo-Irish Agreement is all about.

The kind of remarks that have been passed outside the Chamber are grossly irresponsible. As other hon. Members have said, those who make such remarks should be in the House of Commons to justify what they have said. Whipping up unrest and disquiet on the streets of Belfast is no task for a parliamentarian.

Mr. Archer: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the comments of those who oppose the order from outside the House. In turn, does he agree that it does not follow from the fact that they gave unattractive reasons that there may not be good reasons for opposing the order?

Mr. Alton: In my earlier remarks, I recognised that some of the points that the right hon. and learned Gentleman put forward would normally have been met in Committee or on Second Reading. It is because of the unhappy way in which the order has been introduced that we cannot debate the minutiae. The order is like a curate's egg. There are matters in it of which we approve and others of which we disapprove. The balance of judgment of my party is that the order should be supported, not least because of the kind of remarks that were passed outside the House and the signal that might be sent to the hon. Members for Belfast, West and for Antrim, North, if we were seen to be in opposition to the order.

We, in common with Labour Opposition Members and other hon. Members who have spoken tonight, are pleased about the decision on the flags and emblems legislation. The other piece of legislation that is normally coupled with it is the Public Health and Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (Northern Ireland) 1949, Section 19(4) of that Act deals with the erection of street signs in Gaelic as well as in English. Is it the Government's intention to bring in an order which might deal with that offensive piece of legislation as well? It has quite justifiably — like the flags and emblems legislation — given cause for concern in the minority community in Northern Ireland over many years.

The people of Great Britain are growing increasingly weary of the outpourings of hatred in Northern Ireland. The measure deals firmly with the perpetrators of bigotry and prejudice, and represent positive progress towards the creation of a community in which both traditions will learn to respect and tolerate the other. For those reasons, we shall vote in the Government Lobby this evening.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The order gives the opportunity to raise serious public order issues. I wish to raise one such matter — a monstrous travesty of public order committed by the state authorities. In the autumn of 1982, a shoot-to-kill policy was activated by the security forces in Northern Ireland. A special squad, the RUC mobile support unit, set up ambushes and went on a shooting spree. The 12 October 1986 edition of The Observer described three murderous events. On 11 November it stated:

"As they closed from behind, the MSU man stretched out of the passenger window, pouring shots into the Escort from his machine gun . . . The scene, one policeman described as 'like the Wild West' . . . The chased car careered into a ditch, riddled with bullet-holes. No fewer than 109 shots had been fired in a few minutes. Forensic evidence later proved that one of the men was shot through the heart, with his door open, presumably after the chase ended. Toman, McKerr and Burns were unarmed. All were dead."

The Observer, on 24 November, referring to what happened in a hayshed in Armagh, said:

"After the firing stopped, a 17-year old boy, Michael Tighe, was found dead inside. He was innocent of republican connections but had accompanied McAuley."

The MSU would not necessarily have realised that he was coming and an MI5 bug had, unknowingly to the MSU, been placed in the hayshed and this killing was taped.

Again, The Observer on 12 September said:

"A plain Peugeot had been trailing the unarmed Seamus Grew and Roddy Carroll's yellow Allegro all day . . . It went badly wrong. An army private crashed his automatic car into an RUC Cortina and broke a policeman's leg. Grew drove by what seemed to be a mundane road accident . . . They tore after the Allegro. As they slowed in front of it, the constable leapt out and pumped 15 shots in the direction of the passenger, Roddy Carroll. He killed him. He moved round to the driver's side and killed Grew, who was found not in the car but lying in the road with a bullet in the back of his head. What followed all these killings was the smooth process of cover-up and disappearance of individual responsibility via what was known as 'a Chinese Parliament.'"

At the opening of the adjourned inquest on 2 September 1983 the coroner stated that he was prevented from carrying out his statutory duty by the unexplained delay of the Director of Public Prosecutions. On 22 August 1984 he resigned, saying that he found grave irregularities in the police files on the killings of Grew and Carroll. John Stalker, Manchester's deputy chief constable, was then appointed to investigate this entire shoot-to-kill affair, but we all know that he was blocked. Senior officers ordered junior colleagues to lie during the internal investigations and threatened them with the Official Secrets Act 1911. The Chief Constable of the RUC, Sir John Hermon, personally refused to hand over the tape of the Tighe murder. Later, when Stalker won authority for access to it, Hermon announced that it had been destroyed.

By any account these are startling revelations. In a democracy explanations could be expected, but answers from this Conservative Government have been hard to get. The Prime Minister has consistently refused to answer any questions directed to her, despite the fact that she has overall responsibility for the security services. They are all passed to the Northern Ireland Office, but its replies are scant indeed.

I ask the Government to list all the officers responsible for the operations and activities of the MSU in 1982 and to explain the functions of the MSU. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland replied that it was not the practice to publish information on operational matters. I asked him to list each occasion when the RUC Chief Constable and his deputy were asked to make available the Tighe tape, and what was their response. I asked him also to explain the role of section E4A—surveillance—and essential witnesses to the killings and to say whether the Government had asked for a report about the apparent destruction of the tape recording. The Secretary of State said that he had nothing to add to his earlier reply.

In his earlier reply of 23 October 1986, the Secretary of State did not answer any of those vital questions. Instead, he stated that Mr. Sampson took over from Stalker and had completed the first part of his report dealing with the incident on 24 November 1982 in which Mr.Tighe was shot dead. He went on to say that Sampson's second report would address the associated issues connnected with all the cases that were under investigation but that it would not be published. Therefore, the whole disgraceful episode about the tape continues to be covered up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman, but finding it difficult to relate what he is saying to the order. Will he please tell me which—

Mr. Cohen rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman please tell me to which part of the order he is relating his remarks?

Mr. Cohen: I apologise for jumping the gun before you had finished speaking, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am referring to two parts of the order. Article 24 states:

"A constable in uniform may arrest without warrant anyone he reasonably suspects is committing an offence under Part II."

A constable might have that power, but he should not have the power to shoot, as has been the case. Part III is headed,

"Stirring up hatred or arousing fear."

I cannot think of anything more likely to arouse fear than those incidents. I should like to continue on that basis because——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. He referred to article 24. That relates only to powers of arrest under this order. The hon. Gentleman went much wider than that.

Mr. Cohen: I take the point, but in that case only future events would count and we could not refer to anything in the past. That is the gist of what you are saying, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and surely that cannot be right. I hesitate to advise you of that, but surely we must learn the lessons of the past before we can relate them to this order. That is all that I am seeking to do. I must say that such action arouses fear and that relates to the article to which I have referred, as does the constable arresting and possibly shooting those people.

There were persistent "dirty tricks" allegations during the Stalker affair, the whole purpose of which was to delay the investigation into the RUC's role in the unlawful killings. In the face of that, the Government have been cynically opportunist and have not shown any interest in that allegation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman again, but I cannot relate what he is now saying to this order, which is the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. The hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks to the order; otherwise he is being unfair to the House and to other hon. Members who wish to speak.

Mr. Cohen: I have attempted to raise this issue since before Christmas last year, and this is the first opportunity that there has been to raise it. It is a matter of public order and several articles relate to it—for example, carrying an offensive weapon in a public place. What were used in those cases, it not offensive weapons? Powers of entry and search are also referred to. A hay barn was entered and Michael Tighe was murdered. That aroused fear. That must be relevant and we should receive answers from the Secretary of State on those points.

The state has not brought anyone responsible for the killings to justice; and while the Director of Public Prosecutions normally decides upon prosecutions within about 10 weeks, it has been several years in this case. The conclusion can be drawn that the Government have been happy with the delay. They have been waiting for the trail to go cold, as perhaps it leads much higher up—not just to the Chief Constable, but to Downing street or the Northern Ireland Office which may, very likely, have been involved in the original policy decision for shoot-to-kill.

The leading article in The Guardian of 15 December 1986 stated:

"Officers up to the rank of Chief Superintendent were expected to be charged by March with offences likely to include conspiracy to pervert the course of justice."

That has not happened but, if it did, it is hard to believe that the buck stops at chief superintendent level. The Guardian continued:

"London and Dublin are understood to have agreed that Sir John was not responsible for any officially sanctioned shoot-to-kill policy . . . but he has several questions to answer about what took place after."

The question remains; if he did not sanction it, who did? The Secretary of State should give us those answers.

That it can be suggested that the Chief Constable, or his deputy, did not know what was going on is incredible, and, even if that is the case, it smacks of negligence on an enormous scale. Furthermore, their roles in respect of the destroyed tape could have been rapidly ascertained by the Government. Again, if it was destroyed by negligence or design, or simply salted away, they had responsibility for its safe keeping, and resignations should have been asked for by the Government. They should still be forthcoming.

Amnesty International has taken up this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have advised the hon. Gentleman that he must relate his remarks to the order.

I realise that he feels strongly about this, but any remarks must be related to the business that is before the House. With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I do not think that at the moment he is making any effort to relate his remarks to the order. I feel sure that he will now do so.

Mr. Cohen: I am trying hard to make my remarks relevant, particularly to the aspect of arousing fear. The order talks about recordings and a tape recording is involved in this case, so I should have thought that the case was relevant.

Amnesty International has take up this matter. Its September 1986 communiqué states:

"Over the years Amnesty International has been concerned about incidents in Northern Ireland in which members of the security forces shot people dead in circumstances that gave rise to accusations that these killings were premeditated. There have reportedly been 34 fatal shootings by police or army personnel in Northern Ireland since the autumn of 1982, in 18 of which the persons killed were unarmed.

The organisation believes that it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that effective procedures and safeguards are instituted against the occurrence of such practices and that, if such practices occur, effective mechanisms are instituted to investigate and establish facts and make them public. In the organisation's view, the mechanisms existing in Northern Ireland used to investigate these incidents, such as police investigations, inquests and criminal proceedings, have not produced sufficient evidence and clarification to eliminate the possibility that unlawful use of force has been used by the security forces to kill people deliberately."

That is about order in Northern Ireland, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

"Amnesty International is also concerned that the laws and regulations governing the use of lethal force in law enforcement offer less protection against unjustified use of force than do international standards."

Clearly, in this matter Amnesty is showing the same concern with Britain as it would to some of the appalling state tyrannies around the world which we all deplore.

Shoot-to-kill is a despicable policy. It dispenses summary injustice, and innocent individuals are included for its instant death sentence. The killings have had horrendous personal consequences, but they are also appalling for police, public relations and respect for the law. Decent people expect the police to uphold civil liberties and, above all, the right to life. Only civilised policing practices are wanted. Britain should immediately come into line with international standards and shoot-to-kill should for ever be confined to the dustbin. To reach that stage the truth about the 1982 killings should now be fully disclosed by the Government.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Several hon. Members have said that the order needs to go to Committee, and I agree with them. However, it is important that the House should consider a further reason for that which is that, if several provisions in the order become law and are challenged in certain circumstances in Northern Ireland, it will almost certainly end up with the United Kingdom again being found guilty at the Court of Human Rights. As in recent years the United Kingdom has been found guilty more than any other Western European country, that must be a matter of grave concern. As I proceed through the order, I shall select one or two of those issues. That alone is a reason for considering it in more detail than we are doing tonight and for warning the Government by voting against it.

I accept much of what has been said, especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), about the reality of life in Northern Ireland. I can well understand the feelings of the communities there towards the order. If as a result of the inadequate supervision of the order through the House we are once again found wanting at the Court of Human Rights, sooner or later the Government will have to alter the legislation. That is to the advantage of no one.

I join my hon. Friend in congratulating both the Government and the RUC on facing up to Unionist demonstrations there last year for the first time. That came as a great shock to the Unionist community because it had always assumed that the RUC would automatically protect Unionists who were demonstrating, but would not do likewise for the Republican Catholic community. For the first time they came across the reality of a change in the behaviour of the RUC. Although there is still a long way to go, it would be churlish not to recognise that change, particularly in view of the pressure that was put on those RUC officers—the threats to their lives and physical assaults on them. That also needs to be borne in mind.

I remind the Minister that the order, although it has much in common with the Public Order Act that was passed for the rest of Britain, contains major differences. In his closing remarks, will the Minister tell us whether the order will affect the right to picket in the same way that section 14 of the Public Order Act in Britain did? My understanding, on looking through the order—albeit more quickly than I would like—is that it affects the right to picket because it deals with what are called open-air meetings and assemblies. A picket is an assembly, and if it is outside it can be defined as an open-air meeting. The Government must tell us whether the provisions replicate section 14 of the Public Order Act and whether they should, therefore, insert the same safeguards that the Opposition managed to insert in that measure which defines an assembly in the open as being, I think, 20 or 25 people. That was the figure that we managed to squeeze out of the Government.

I shall consider a couple of items in the order. One of the differences between the order and the Act is that the rank of the police officer involved is different, and I welcome that. In the British Act it involves an officer of any rank. A police constable may have the power to limit numbers and decide the route. In the order, in certain circumstances, it is the rank of sergeant, and in other circumstances it is the rank of inspector or above. That is welcome.

Under article 3(2) notice must be given and more detail must be given than under the equivalent Act here. One of the matters that must be assessed is the number of persons who are likely to take part in a public procession. It troubles me—we have not gone through this in the detail that we should—that that is one of the matters of which someone could be found guilty. A reasonable court would make a reasonable judgment about that, but I am afraid that we are not talking about reasonable courts and reasonable judgments; we are talking about an order which has the force of law.

The only qualifying part of article 3, as to making judgments about dates and times, routes and the number of persons who are likely to take part, is that a person had "neither suspected nor had reason to suspect, the failure to satisfy the requirements . . ."

[Mr. Clive Soley]

That is a mild check to put on the administration when it is finding an individual guilty of an offence under that article.

The point that troubles me is one that troubled us before the Act was passed in Britain, and it occurs in article 4, which deals with imposing conditions on public processions and open-air public meetings. Sub-paragraph (a) says,

"it may result in serious public order disorder"—

that is fair enough—

"serious damage to property"— that is fair enough; but then there is the deadly point—

"serious disruption to the life of the community."

Those people who followed the original Act through the House and much of the evidence that was given in Committee will know that the Association of Chief Officers of Police, when asked what it meant by came up with the answer, "A demonstration that can lead to buses being delayed and having to be re-routed." The danger of that definition is one of the matters which are open to challenge in the European Court. The European Court will accept restrictions on the right to demonstrate, the right of assembly and so on, but those restrictions have to be much more serious than a serious disruption to the life of the community, which can be interpreted as making shopping or travelling to and from work more difficult than it is normally.

It is worth bearing in mind that, although many people regard demonstrations as disruptive, a farmer in Leicestershire, on discovering that his farm was one of the proposed sites for the NIREX exploration for burying nuclear waste, said that he had always felt angry about people who demonstrated and marched, but now he felt the same way himself. The message is that in any democratic community this is a vital safeguard. It is a pressure valve against more restrictive practices being imposed on a society.

Another thing that troubles me greatly is that the police are being asked to define the circumstances. That is dangerous. Only the other year Sir John Hermon said—my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) referred to this—that he did not think that the police were necessarily the most appropriate body to decide the route, time, place and number of people on marches and demonstrations.

I entirely agree with that for two reasons. The first is one of principle. The police, as the agency which enforces the laws of the state, should not be the organisation that decides whether and in what circumstances people can march and demonstrate. We must remember that we are talking about the ability to restrict the numbers of those who can march.

Secondly, and realistically in terms of Northern Ireland, if the police decide such issues they are put in the party-political firing line. They will be seen, as they were clearly seen by the Unionist community last year, to be doing the work of Dublin and London. Virtually every Unionist alleged that.

I am not suggesting that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has an easy job, but it is up to him to take that responsibility on his shoulders. That responsibility should not be devolved to the police who then have to go back to live in their own community and be accused of enforcing Dublin's and London's law. That is why the RUC come under so much pressure in such situations. That expectation should not be pressed upon them.

Article 5 prohibits public processions and open-air public meetings and is another area which could easily be challenged in the European Court. For example, it says:

"the holding in any area or place of any public procession or any open-air public meeting is likely to cause . . . serious disruption to the life of the community; or"

this was not in the British legislation—

"undue demands to be made upon the police or military forces".

Imagine going to the Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg and trying to defined a position in which it was argued that people could not have the right of assembly, which is guaranteed in the human rights charter and in the United Nations charter, because it placed undue demands on the police or military forces. The Government could not conceivably expect to win that case, and if they cannot expect to win it they should not leave the order unamended. We shall have to change it, and it is no good having to change it in the way that I have described.

I welcome strongly part III relating to stirring up hatred or arousing fear. There has been some difficulty over definition. We had similar problems on racial hatred in the legislation for the rest of Britain, but this is an honourable and good attempt which I want to encourage.

One area which will get the Government into trouble comes under part IV, "Miscellaneous public order offences". Clause 20, entitled says;

"Obstructive sitting, etc., in public place"

"A person who, by sitting, standing, kneeling, lying down or otherwise conducting himself in a public place, wilfully obstructs or seeks to obstruct traffic or wilfully hinders, or seeks to hinder, any lawful activity shall be guilty of an offence."

I have to say again to the Minister that in Northern Ireland of all places to put that in an order is virtually to invite people to kneel in prayer across the road. What we shall then see is police officers or the military carrying away those people kneeling in prayer and arresting them.

Mr. Scott: Why have they not done it for the many years that this has been an existing part of Northern Ireland legislation?

Mr. Soley: That is a very fair point. The reason why—and this will come as no surprise to the one and only Unionist Member who has been present, the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross), who was sitting next to me and talking to me about this only a few moments ago—is that they know what is in this order. They are also saying, and they make no secret of it, that they will do their best to make sure that it does not work. I am not putting it in their minds; they are pointing it out to me. That is the difference, and that is why I think that the Minister has to take this on board.

I am utterly amazed and very impressed by article 18, because here I find riotous or disorderly behaviour in a public place attracting a sentence of six months' imprisonment or "a fine not exceeding level 5".

What do we find in the British Act of Parliament for rioting?—10 years. The moral of the story is that if people want a riot they should hold it in Northern Ireland. We had to get the riot sentence down from life to 10 years in Britain, and that is still twice as long as in almost any other country. All the Commonwealth countries and even the European countries have much shorter periods unless the rioter is found also to be in possession of a weapon such as a gun or a knife. Otherwise the longest sentence that I can recall in a Commonwealth country is about three years and in a European country about 10 years; and then, as I say, the rioter has to be in possession of a weapon. Therefore, in a sense, the Government are being much more realistic about Northern Ireland, but I think that there a message to be conveyed to the Home Secretary, who clearly does not have the same view as the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Finally, the repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954 is very welcome and long overdue.

As has been said, there are many good parts in this order, but there are one or two parts that will almost certainly get the Government into trouble. I say quite categorically that I do not want to see that happen. I think that public order in Northern Ireland is very much more difficult to deal with, for all the reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh set out. It is so much more difficult to deal with that we need very different approaches to it. But to do it in this way, which is likely to bring us before the European Court, to be found guilty and have to change the order, and in a way that invites the Unionists, by their own statements, to challenge it, cannot be the best way of legislating. We may well rue the day that we passed an order of this complexity and length after a three-hour or four-hour debate on the Floor of the House. I can understand the Government's difficulties, but unless they take on board some of the points that have been made they will have to change this order sooner or later.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I want to raise five aspects of this order: part III,

"Stirring up hatred or arousing fear";

article 9, on threatening behaviour, including by servants of the Crown; article 22, on the carrying of weapons, which would be an offence under this order and indeed has been an offence under a number of orders preceding it going back to 1969; the distribution and publishing of written material, under article 10 of the order; and breach of the peace and riotous behaviour, again by everyone including servants of the Crown.

I particularly want to raise the whole question of enforcement of this order and all orders preceding it which include the same or similar articles, because I think that in carrying this order tonight hon. Members should be conscious of the failure of the Government to bring prosecutions for offences that have previously taken place under these articles. I would have thought that the failure to prosecute on previous occasions would weigh heavily in the minds of hon. Members who have to take a decision tonight in the Division Lobby.

I wish to raise all those articles and part III in general in the context of the allegations that have been made by Major Colin Wallace and Captain Frederick Holroyd, who were working actively in Northern Ireland in the mid-1970s. They have both made a number of major allegations in the press, on radio, on television and in correspondence with Ministers and Members of the House. They have named names, given dates and identified places. They have identified the existence of letters, they have identified witnesses and they have made innumerable statements concerning a campaign of what they call "destabilisation" against the Labour Government of the mid-1970s and politicians of all political persuasions in the House of Commons, but, in particular, politicians in Northern Ireland, equally of all political persuasions. They have referred to a campaign of dirty tricks by the Army, the Royal Ulster Constabulary and security services, using paramilitaries in campaigns of murder and kidnap.

All those matters are dealt with under the four articles that I identified in the order. All those articles have been in existence, as I understand it, in previous orders that have been approved by the House of Commons and been the subject of repeated debate over the years, yet no action is taken.

I do not know whether what those men are saying is true or false. Indeed, I am not convinced that even Ministers know, and I am pretty sure that there are no hon. Members who know. We have not been told, and the only sources of the information are Mr. Wright in an Australian court, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Holroyd and a few other people who refuse to identify themselves publicly, although they have written privately to individual hon. Members setting out their experiences in this area.

Colin Wallace was a senior information officer in Northern Ireland and his work in Northern Ireland has been the subject of credit paid by a great number of people. I do not want to go through them all, because I know that we are short of time. However, the Minister knows that many people are on record as saying what an allegedly excellent man he was in the carrying out of his duties in Northern Ireland. One senior officer who worked closely with him at Lisburn said that he regarded himself as always on duty, working at least 90 hours a week, and by 1974 had taken no leave for six years. Someone else said of him that he had a knowledge of the Irish situation which was totally unique in headquarters and surpassed—

Mr. Bernard Conlan (Gateshead, East): I know that my hon. Friend is going to name names——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am not going to name names.

Mr. Conlan: If he is not, that is fine. However, I was going to suggest that if he is going to name names, he has to have the approval of the people concerned.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am sure that my hon. Friend would pay me the credit of knowing the procedures of the House of Commons.

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the credit with which the person of whom he spoke was regarded in the north of Ireland. Would he include that person's knowledge and possible involvement at administrative level in the Kincora boys' home scandal as being to his credit?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I did not want to stray too much into that area, but I am perfectly willing to answer my hon. Friend. I do not know, and nor does he. That is the trouble with the whole affair; we do not know. That is why——

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman does know the people involved. If he really wants to do a service to society in relation to what he knows, let him get up and name those people who blighted the lives of young people in the Kincora boys' home. I challenge him here and now to give that information to the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Much as I would like to be able to please my hon. Friends, I am bound by the strictures of Mr. Deputy Speaker in his intervention to a former hon. Friend of mine who spoke during the course of this debate. If I were to veer into these areas in great detail—which is why I answered my hon. Friend in the way I did—I am sure Mr. Deputy Speaker would be the first to tell me that I am out of order. I have all those names in my possession. I do not reveal them because I do not know the truth. It might well be a slur on the character of those people who have been identified to me if I were to reiterate their names during the debate this evening.

In the light of the experience of hon. Members over the last few months, who have made a point of criticising my activities, I am sure they would be the first to commend me on taking this approach this evening. I wish I could respond to my hon. Friend in a more favourable way, but these matters will surface, as inevitably they must. That is why he, certainly I, many of my hon. Friends, the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), Conservative Members and others have asked for a full judicial inquiry into all those allegations that have been made by Mr. Wallace.

Mr. Wallace has a credibility problem, because he was convicted at Lewes Crown court of the manslaughter of a 29-year-old Brighton antique dealer, a charge that he has always denied. Mr. Wallace appeared, protested his innocence, tried to appeal, but was refused leave. He went to the Police Complaints Authority. He alleges he was framed. In July 1985 the Prime Minister asked the noble Lord Trefgarne, who was then at the Department of Defence, to reply to some of Mr. Wallace's allegations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman said at the beginning of his speech that he would relate his remarks strictly to the order that is before the House. I cannot find any relation in what the hon. Gentleman is now saying to any of the articles in the order. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will bring himself into order.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am sure the Chair will understand that, having been drawn in the way I was to talk a little about the character of the people concerned, I had to balance my case by drawing on some other material which I had not wished to raise in any great detail during this debate. That is why I had to refer specifically to Mr. Wallace's credibility.

Mr. Holroyd served as a captain in the Army's military intelligence in Northern Ireland in the mid-1970s. He maintains that, following an argument between MI5 and MI6 in Northern Ireland and the replacement of MI6 by MI5, he was whipped out of Northern Ireland, placed in a military psychiatric hospital unit, where he protested that he should not be placed, and, indeed, was subsequently released therefrom.

An argument has been going on for six years between the hon. Member for Southend, East and the Ministry of Defence as to whether that period should be stricken from Mr. Holroyd's record in so far as he believes that it places an unreasonable slur on his character.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I still find it impossible to relate what the hon. Gentleman is now saying to the order before the House. The hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks to one or other of the articles in the order which we are discussing.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Article 10 of the order deals with the distribution and publication of written material. I understand that article 10 has been in similar orders which have been previously debated and carried by a majority of this House, yet it has not been used in the prosecution of individual servants of the Crown who have carried out acts clearly in default of those articles on previous occasions.

The two gentlemen to whom I have referred, refer specifically to offences under that article. They refer to forged documents, one of which I have in my hand. This is a forged document in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), who was then a Minister in Northern Ireland. It is allegedly a quote from a speech, which he never gave, to a Labour party conference. This document has been attributed to the security services. There was no prosecution of any officer in Northern Ireland concerning this document. I should have thought that Ministers would deny at the Dispatch Box that this document was produced by the security services. If they were to do so, there would be no cause for us to raise this matter during this debate.

I have another document, which again would be an offence under article 10. It is allegedly produced by to quote from the document. It is also a forgery. Why do Ministers not refute these documents? Why do they not deny that the documents could be sourced on the security services? That is a perfectly reasonable request. If Ministers were to to that we would no longer have to raise these matters in the public domain.

I have another document, entitled, "The Labour Movement. Economics — Master or Servant of Mankind?" which is allegedly by

"Denis Healey, Tony Benn and Stan Orme."

The sub-title is "Imperialism, Crisis and Revolution", document No. 2, 1971. It is another forgery. Who is producing this material? Publication of these documents is an offence under article 10 of the order. If they are forgeries, let there be prosecutions or let the Minister deny that the security services or servants of the Crown had any responsibility for them.

I have another document, publication of which would be an offence under article 10. Publication is also an offence under similar articles in the 1981 order and in the 1969 order which pre-empted both orders. This document is entitled,

"Vote Labour. Ulster is British. Internments, Special Powers, Discrimination, Intimidation, Assassination."

Someone printed that document. It is clearly not a Labour party document. We are entitled to know from where it came.

This is what Mr. Wallace and Mr. Holroyd were alleging. We can either turn our backs on all this and write it off as nonsense, or accept that the Government should make a statement and should not get a junior Minister to reply to an innocuous question placed on the Order Paper by simply saying, "There is nothing to be said." Why not have a substantial statement at the Dispatch Box so that we can deal with this nonsense, if indeed that is what it is?

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I have listened to the hon. Gentleman, who has alleged that there are forgeries and asked why there have not been prosecutions. I am sure that he will be the first to accept that it is one thing to say that something is a forgery and quite another to pin a forgery on a specific person. One cannot say that there must be a prosecution without directing the comment at a specific individual. Does the hon. Gentleman have information about individuals and has he put it in the hands of the responsible authorities?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: According to Mr. Wallace, he provided information in November 1957 to the responsible authorities. He wrote to Mr. Harold Wilson in August 1977 providing information following the security services inquiry which was launched in May 1977. He again provided documents to the Prime Minister on 1 November 1984. The Prime Minister wrote to Lord Trefgarne asking for some response. Mr. Wallace maintains that a response from the Government was not forthcoming.

We do not know who produced these documents. We should know. Prominent people in the Liberal party and in the other half of the alliance have taken a great interest in this matter. People right across the political spectrum want to know what happened.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Name them.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman intervenes, but he would do well to listen. One day they may try to interfere with him.

Mr. Mallon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Does he not find it strange that, to my knowledge, these gentlemen have not sent any information to Members from Northern Ireland? I would have thought that that would have been an obvious thing to do in relation to accusations concerning Northern Ireland. With regard to the Kincora boys' home, the two gentlemen were centrally placed to know what was happening there. I will start to believe some of what they say if they show, by their concern for society, that they are prepared to name the people who corrupted the lives of young people. If I have any reason to believe that the names, if given, are valid, I will not show the hon. Gentleman's rectitude or reticence.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept that I am constrained by my previous experience from revealing names in the House. I ask him to take that on board when he passes judgment on my failure.

Mr. Mallon: It is not the hon. Gentleman's failure; it is their failure.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: They have identified the persons involved and they have been listed, but it is not for me to produce those names during the course of the debate.

Mr. Holroyd maintains that he was recruited by MI6 and he has drawn the attention of the House to many offences under various articles of previous orders which will be updated by this order. He made a number of allegations concerning the John Francis Green affair. He maintains that MI5 eased out MI6 in the mid-1970s and tried for quick military successes. As a result, 10 agents lost their lives in one week. He maintains that the SAS was employing Ulster Volunteer Force members to go over the border and carry out covert activity with the approval of MI5.

Last week Mr. Holroyd gave an interview to Radio Ulster on the "Talkback" programme. That was an important interview. The hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) should listen to the tape, as he may learn something from it. I pay tribute to that programme and its producers for the good work they have been doing in the past few weeks. During the course of the interview Mr. Holroyd said that two boys were set up for a murder carried out in the Irish Republic by paramilitaries. One would consider that an allegation of that nature is extremely grave. I do not know whether it is true, but I certainly believe that it should form part of a general statement by Ministers to the House of Commons. In that way we may learn the truth about the affair.

In the interview Mr. Holroyd claims that at least 70 people surround the Kincora and the general dirty tricks campaign——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying again. I cannot relate his remarks to any of the articles in the order before us.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am trying desperately to keep in order; and I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are well aware of that.

Article 22 of the order refers to the carrying of offensive weapons and guns; article 9 refers to threatening behaviour; and article 18 refers to breach of the peace and riotous behaviour. All the articles are to be found in the previous order of 1969—as I understand from my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell)—and the order of 1981 which covers the areas that I wish to comment upon.

Mr. Holroyd said that a number of bizarre incidents followed the tours of duty of intelligence and Army people who have been in Northern Ireland. He says that the security services were sanctioning the use of killer gangs to go over the border in areas reserved, with the agreement of the Republic, for paramilitary activities.

According to Mr. Holroyd, inquiries are taking place. Last week, therefore, I tabled a question asking the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland

"what investigations are currently taking place into murders and kidnappings by paramilitary organisations in the 1970s."

One would have thought that if there was nothing, the answer would have been "None". No, the reply given was:

"I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible."
—[Official Report, 5 March 1987, Vol. 111, c. 658.]

Obviously something is happening, otherwise I would have a negative response. It may be that Mr. Holroyd is correct, but no doubt I shall get an honest answer from honest Ministers in time.

During the interview on Radio Ulster last week, Mr. Holroyd said that on one occasion he met Ned Garvey, a Garda commissioner in Dublin. It appears that he was in contact with his subordinates on a number of occasions. He said that the RUC tried repeatedly to cover up what was happening. I am told that two documents exist that will be of especial interest to hon. Members. They are forged bank statements. I have pressed carefully to ensure that the information that I am being given is accurate. They are forged bank statements in the names of the hon. Members for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) and for Foyle (Mr. Hume). I informed the hon. Member for Foyle a week ago that it was likely that I would raise the matter in the Chamber.

Mr. Mallon: Was that the time they both bought a drink?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I told the hon. Member for Foyle that I would be raising the matter when I was satisfied that the documents existed. I can say that they do exist and that they are forgeries. It is reasonable to ask who forged them. On 28 June 1974, the then Prime Minister announced that he was instituting an inquiry into a forged bank statement in the name of the then Mr. Ted Short. It was felt sufficiently important to warrant a statement to the House. If it was good on that occasion, why is it not equally good and important on this occasion? I hope that the Minister will address himself to that issue when he replies. If I agree to produce the documents, will he agree to make a full statement so that we can establish the truth?

I am now coming to the end of my contribution to the debate, which I have much truncated. Last weekend, The Sunday Times, in a report by Mr. Barry Penrose, stated that Mr. Haughey, who is now the leader of the Republic of Ireland, had listened to tapes on Radio Ulster, and that he had then made a statement to the effect that if he became Prime Minister he would establish an inquiry to ascertain whether there was any truth in the allegations of Captain Holroyd and Major Wallace. We understand that Mr. Haughey has been able to form a Government and is now effectively committed to an inquiry into the allegations of Holroyd and Wallace. It will be most curious if he is allowed to follow that route on his own while the British Government, against whose servants the allegations are being made, refuse to act. The Minister should address himself to that when he replies. It seems inevitable that Mr. Haughey will make representations to the British Government with a view to securing an inquiry in the United Kingdom.

If the Holroyd-Wallace accusations or allegations are untrue, if they are a tissue of lies, we have a duty to discover what is motivating those who are orchestrating the campaign. It might be that they want simply to undermine the Anglo-Irish Agreement, but there are those of us on both sides of the House who want to secure its future, if at all possible. There is, therefore, an even greater obligation placed on the Government to establish the truth. The effect of leaving these allegations unanswered in the public domain is to aggravate the possibility of the agreement working.

I urge the Minister to take the opportunity that is open to him to respond. If he cannot give us an undertaking that an inquiry will be set up, at least let him say that we are considering the possibility of setting one up so that at least Mr. Haughey knows that the British are capable of responding in a responsible manner.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Since it has been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), may I say how warmly we on this side of the House welcome and congratulate Mr. Haughey on his election as Taoiseach of the Irish Republic today? We wish him well in his endeavours on behalf of the Irish people, in relation to the Anglo-Irish Agreement and in relations with Great Britain.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Workington on his grasp of the order. He was able to take us through the amendments and consolidation of the public order legislation, referring to the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 and going as far back as section 9 of the Criminal Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (Northern Ireland) 1968. For that he deserves our congratulations, respect and support. No doubt the Minister will wish in his reply to refer briefly to that speech.

We have often had at the Bar trials within trials. Over the last half hour or so we have had a debate within a debate. I do not seek to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Workington, however great my esteem for him, but I wish to refer to the events which led the Government not only to review the public order legislation but to bring this order before the House.

Two specific events in Northern Ireland over the past year have pre-occupied the people of Northern Ireland, as they have pre-occupied people on the mainland. One, of course, was the marching season, to which the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) referred from his personal experience, and the other was the reaction of the Unionist community to the Anglo-Irish Agreement and their protestations at the time of its signing, and subsequently.

The marching season was long ago turned into a triumphalist parade by the majority towards the minority. The way the marches were routed was not to test the will of the minority but an attempt to impose a will upon the minority. Both sides of the House condemned that at the time and it is one of the reasons why we are considering this order tonight.

There is a curious and paradoxical dichotomy. On the one hand we have the attempt by the Government to bring Northern Irish legislation into line with that of the rest of the United Kingdom. On the other we have the effort to tailor it to the specific conditions that prevail in Northern Ireland. This is taking place without a single representative of the Ulster Unionists in their places. One is entitled to ask why the Unionists are not here. Is it because they do not want integration with the rest of the United Kingdom? Do they not want the laws to be the same in Northern Ireland as they are on the mainland? Are they integrationist? Are they Unionist? Do they really believe in the Union, or do they not? Do they not wish to maintain the specific and distinctive features which exist in Northern Ireland?

It is a matter of regret that they are not here. It is a matter of regret that we have this order rather than a Bill before the House. It is a matter of regret that there is no Northern Irish assembly to scrutinise these orders before they come here. It is a matter of regret that there are at least 14 empty places in the Chamber when matters relating to the rights of individuals within Northern Ireland are before the House.

It takes some little time to disentangle the various aspects of the order. Does it build upon the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 to which my hon. Friend the Member for Workington referred? Can it be reconciled with the European Convention on Human Rights, a point referred to by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley)? Does it add to or detract from the distortions that abound already in Northern Ireland and which express themselves in the Diplock courts, the unashamed use of supergrass evidence in those courts and the emergency provisions legislation which we amended recently in Committee?

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) spoke about the constructive nature of the Committee and described how it went through many of the amendments in a sensible fashion. We pay homage to the Minister of State for his help in that Committee, not only in tidying up the legislation but in seeking to reduce what we saw as some of its worst provisions.

I shall turn briefly to the distortions in democracy as we know it in Northern Ireland. The Army is there playing a peculiar role — that of an army acting in a civil capacity by assisting the police, and also in a military capacity in combating terrorism. The Army is doing that with the assistance of the Ulster Defence Regiment.

No one would wish to see a repeat of the events that occurred during last year's marching season when homes of the minority community were pillaged and looted. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh spoke about the village of Kilkeel in which some of these events took place. In other parts of Northern Ireland members of the RUC were forced out of their homes by intimidation because they had done their duty to the state by seeking to protect people from attack. The police themselves saw their homes attacked and damaged.

In his speech — which seems to have been made a long time ago — the Secretary of State spoke about intimidation. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh also spoke about that. Intimidation is a tragic aspect of life in Northern Ireland and it is certainly heightened during the marching season. As I said earlier, there have also been protests against the Anglo-Irish agreement. The history of that agreement has been a sorry one in the sense of the reaction by the Unionist community, but the Opposition have always maintained, and the Government have said, that peaceful and constitutional demonstrations and actions against that agreement are acceptable. We do not support the aims of constitutional opposition to the agreement, but we understand it.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) spoke about statements from Northern Ireland. Those statements do nothing at all to ease the situation in the Province. The recent statement that constitutional resistance is at an end may be hyperbole or rhetoric, but it does nothing to dampen the sense and the dangerous effervescence of violence that is part and parcel of the Northern Irish community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith spoke about the European Convention on Human Rights. I shall speak briefly about the contention that articles 3, 4 and 5 are a breach of that convention. That view was carefully and solidly put forward by the National Council for Civil Liberties. The Government did the NCCL the courtesy of responding at some length to its arguments. Some of the points made by the NCCL were accepted in the Government critique, some were satisfactorily answered and others remain disputed.

Broadly, the Government's view is that article 11 of the convention specifically accepts that restrictions may be placed on the exercise of the rights of peaceful assembly if they are "necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedom of others."

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith spoke about the dangers that are likely to ensue if the order goes through unamended, as it must, and the danger that in future that might bring us face to face with the European Court of Human Rights. Although the Minister of State may not have a great deal of time available when replying, it would be of specific assistance to the Opposition if he were able to speak about that.

I mentioned earlier the speech by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes about the Committee stage of the emergency provisions Bill. He also spoke about the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh also spoke about that Act and called it an anachronism. Section 2 of the Act empowered a police officer to require the removal of any emblem other than the Union flag if he believed that its display might cause a breach of the peace.

As the Secretary of State said, the Act is redundant because, first, its repeal was recommended by the Standing Commission on Human Rights. Secondly — I have another small plug for the Labour party—it has long been advocated by the Labour Opposition. I shall let the Secretary of State and the Minister into a little secret. It was part and parcel of our 1983 manifesto. We are glad that the Government are pursuing their own election commitments and those of the Labour party.

The essence of the order deals with the serious problems of Northern Ireland—problems such as public disorder, serious property damage, and serious disruption to community life of which we are aware and which we regret. Those matters were touched upon by the hon. Member for Mossley Hill and by other hon. Members. It is a great sadness for Opposition Members to know that the democracy that those in Northern Ireland should have and do have cannot be enjoyed to the full because of such disruptions.

The Opposition ask whether the order represents an accretion of greater power to the state. Does it take too much away from the individual? The hon. Member for Mossley Hill called it a curate's egg. That phrase went through my mind when I read the order and the notes. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West said, many matters in the order are acclaimed and supported by Opposition Members, but we must look at two fundamental points. One is the balance of individual civil rights in relation to the powers of the state. In this connection, I refer to the Secretary of State, who has greater power in Northern Ireland than in this country. If we were dealing with a public order Act in our country, one might have recourse to local councils, but in this case one's recourse is to the Secretary of State.

The first matter that greatly concerns us is whether we have tipped the balance away from the individual in Northern Ireland towards the state. The second is whether the order should have been in the form of a Bill. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West made—without flattering him in any way—a remarkable speech. He had to encompass what, in effect was a Second Reading speech dealing with the principle, Committee stage speeches on various aspects, a speech on Report and a Third reading commendation. To do that in half an hour was a parliamentary feat. As the Secretary of State said, we lawyers will and should stick together.

The two questions that we have asked—first, whether the order goes towards the state as against the individual and, secondly, whether it should be a proper Bill—lead us to the conclusion that it is right and appropriate for the Opposition to divide the House.

11.8 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Nicholas Scott): At the outset, I echo the congratulations expressed by hon. Members on the Opposition Front Bench and by my right hon. and hon. Friends to Mr. Haughey on his election as Taoiseach. I look forward to working with the new administration in Dublin, in the interests of all the people of Northern Ireland, and indeed, of the people of the island of Ireland.

I shall respond to most, if not all, of the points that are relevant to the order. Obviously, I mean no criticism of the Chair when I say that, at times, hon. Members seemed to stray slightly beyond the bounds of the matters that are directly relevant to the order. Before I refer to the detailed points that were raised by right hon. and hon. Members, I shall address the question why we are considering an order rather than a Bill. Of course, I recognise the legislative advantages that can flow from consideration of a Bill.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) and the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) kindly referred to the Committee stage of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill. I think that this is the first time that homage has been paid to me on the Floor of the House; I hope that it will not be the last. I am grateful for the tribute. We had a good Committee stage on that Bill, and it has come out of Committee better than it was when it went in. However, we have to decide whether it is right in all the circumstances to legislate for Northern Ireland by Bill. On balance, the answer has to be no, not least because Parliament would be overwhelmed by that procedure.

Mr. Archer rose——

Mr. Scott: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me to finish this point, and then I shall certainly give way to him.

The difference between the emergency provisions legislation and this order and other orders that come before the House is that the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill comes into the category of legislation that has to be dealt with by Bill. Were we to deal with transferred and reserved matters by means of Bills rather than orders, we should be overwhelmed with them. In 1983, for example, there were 17 affirmative Northern Ireland Orders in Council; in 1984 there were 14 ; in 1985 there were 13; and in 1986 there were 19. Most of them made substantially different provision for Northern Ireland than for the rest of the United Kingdom. It would be quite impossible to ask the House of Commons to deal with all those matters by means of Bills.

Mr. Archer: We on these benches are certainly not saying that all Northern Ireland legislation should be dealt with by means of Bills. Our complaint is that the Government have failed to distinguish between the legislation that should be dealt with by means of Bills and the legislation that quite properly could be dealt with by order.

Mr. Scott: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman should ever come to this side of the Dispatch Box, he would find that it is not easy to draw a distinction between those matters that are dealt with by means of Bills rather than orders. We may all have different views about the relative importance of individual pieces of legislation. Very careful consideration would be needed before one began to go down that road.

Mr. Michael Brown: I take my hon. Friend's point that many additional burdens would be placed upon the House, but will he speculate on how many Scottish Bills have come before the House during the Sessions to which he referred?

Mr. Scott: Mercifully, that is not my responsibility. However, I take issue with my hon. Friend and, indeed, with the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West who defined this as a take-it-or-leave-it procedure. I accept that now that we have reached this stage of the order it is unamendable and that the House has either to take it or leave it, but it is right to draw attention to the consultation procedures.

I do not believe that six weeks is too short a period. It is the normal consultation period on orders. Organisations and individuals who fall just outside the period of six weeks before they put forward their views always have them taken into account by Ministers before decisions are taken about the final shape of the orders.

I regret very much that there has not been the benefit of consideration of this order by the Northern Ireland Assembly. An important part of the consideration of this order ought to have been undertaken by that assembly. It was not our wish that the Government had no alternative but to dissolve the Northern Ireland Assembly.

There are opportunities to discuss in Committee forthcoming legislation affecting Northern Ireland. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland have made it clear on a number of occasions that we are prepared to consider ways in which we can improve the consideration of Northern Ireland legislation by Order in Council. We are open to suggestions, through the usual channels, from Northern Ireland parties and from others. We understand the resentment that can arise about some aspects of the present procedures as they affect important pieces of legislation.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West and a number of other hon. Members referred to the requirement to give notice of the number of people who are likely to take part in any procession under the parades and marches provisions of the order—article 3, which also deals with offences. This requirement is not unique to Northern Ireland. It is to be found also in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. The whole purpose of the information about the numbers likely to take part in a parade is to assist the police in planning the policing of processions and to give them advance notice of the organisers' judgment about the numbers likely to take part.

Article 3(5)(a) makes it an offence to take part in or organise a procession of which the required notice has not been given in the time and manner required. Article 3(5)(b) makes it an offence to organise or take part in a procession held on a date or at a time or on a route different from that given in the notice. Those matters are under the control of the organisers of a parade. We fully recognise that the numbers taking part are not under the control of the organisers. Therefore, it would be wrong to penalise the organisers if, for example, more members of the public turned up than they had estimated. That would not be an offence, but the other matters clearly would be under the order.

A point has been raised about including those who take part in the sanctions provisions of the order which, in a sense, is directed mainly against the organisers. However, in the special circumstances of Northern Ireland—the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) will certainly recognise this — it is necessary to make participants liable for an offence as it may well be impossible to identify the organisers of illegal processions. It would then be appropriate for the police to seek to make amenable any ringleaders whom they could identify in any particular parade. That is not a new provision; it has been part of Northern Ireland legislation since 1970.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West and others have raised the question whether the police should be prepared to give advance notice of their intention to impose conditions. As a variation on that, some hon. Members raised the question whether it was appropriate that the police should be the people to impose those conditions and whether my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or some other authority should have that duty put on them. However, that would be totally impracticable in the circumstances of Northern Ireland. Not infrequently, the police have to impose such conditions at the last minute, taking into account all the circumstances of the march, the likely reaction of the local community, the numbers assembling for the march and a whole range of other matters that only a senior police officer on the spot could properly take into account. It would be impossible to provide that flexibility of response if those decisions were to be taken in advance by policemen, and still less by Ministers or some other tribunal who might have that responsibility put upon them.

[Mr. Scott]

The right hon. and learned Gentleman also raised the issue of the wearing of political uniforms in a public place. Again, I make it absolutely clear that article 21 makes no change in the existing law in Northern Ireland. The wearing of political uniforms in public places or at public meetings has been an offence there since 1970. Indeed, the provision is based on the Public Order Act 1936. It would be for the courts to determine whether any particular item of clothing constituted a uniform within the purpose of legislation. The discretion and common sense of the courts about such matters is well recognised in the United Kingdom as a whole, and to seek to define rigidly what a uniform does or does not do would swiftly be overtaken by events.

Several hon. Members have referred to the European convention on human rights and its relevance to the order. As the hon. Member for Middlesbrough made clear, article 11 of the convention specifically recognises that restrictions may be placed on the exercise of the rights of peaceful assembly, if they are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, the protection of health or morals or the rights and freedoms of others. The Government's clear view is that the draft order is within the terms of the convention.

Mr. Soley: Will the Minister tell us what he thinks would not be breached under article 5, which states that undue demand could be made on the police or military forces?

Mr. Scott: I am not a lawyer, but where the demands of policing particular demonstrations or processions were likely to divert the police from other duties in the interests of public safety, we would have a good case for arguing that we were acting within the terms of the convention.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked whether the recital by the Secretary of State should be conclusive in terms of the courts. We are not fearful of any judicial review of a decision on these matters. In the special circumstances of Northern Ireland—this has happened more than once since I have had responsibility for these matters—it may be necessary to take decisions about political processions on the basis of information which it would be impossible to produce in court. Therefore, this is a proper provision in the order.

I was asked whether it would be right that notice by organisers should be served by post or in person. The legislation on this side of the water provides for such notice to be given by post rather than in person because a procession may well go through more than one police area. The whole of Northern Ireland is a single police area, so it is right that the notice should be given by the organisers to the nearest appropriate police station to the beginning of any procession, not least because that gives the organisers of the parade and the RUC a chance to get together and have an initial discussion about the parade, the likely scale of policing and the possibility of perhaps arranging with consent, rather than imposing, any conditions.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh said that he had to swallow hard about some of the provisions, but that on balance he came down in favour of them. All of us are nervous when we legislate on public order. Several times the point was made about the balance between individual freedom and the need to preserve public safety. We know how the parades and marches in Northern Ireland can lead to disorder, disruption, intimidation and damage and I believe that we have the balance in response to those dangers right.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the question of the exemptions for the BBC and IBA under broadcasting provisions and asked about their application to Radio Telefis Eireann. The offence in relation to broadcasting under article 12 occurs at the point of transmission, not reception, so RTE broadcasts from the Republic are not within the jurisdiction of the Northern Ireland courts.

Mr. Mallon: The Minister will be aware that RTE also broadcasts and transmits from Belfast.

Mr. Scott: Although RTE records and transmits in Belfast, it transmits the programmes back to its headquarters in the Republic, and the actual transmissions emanate from the Republic. That is my understanding of the technical aspect of that question.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) said that he shared the general concern for human rights expressed by several hon. Members and went on to ask about the importance of the RUC's liaison with the local community. I wholeheartedly echo his anxiety and I long to see the early introduction of liaison committees between the police and the elected representatives and to see them flourishing and playing a useful part. However, until the elected representatives of the two main Unionist parties are willing to resume their full range of responsibilities in local government, those developments are unlikely to occur.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about street names and, by implication, wider matters about the role of the Irish language in Northern Ireland. The Government are still considering those matters.

Mr. Alton: The Minister will recall that I asked about the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (Northern Ireland) 1947, which outlaws the use of Gaelic signs on the streets of Belfast and is often linked with the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954. Can he tell us when he may introduce an order to deal with that prohibition?

Mr. Scott: It is not as simple as that. If one were to repeal that Act without introducing any sort of scheme, there could be anarchy in these matters. That merits careful consideration and we are giving it careful consideration, but it is too early to say exactly how we may move.

Before I close, I want to take issue with the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). He was generous in his praise of the RUC and the way in which it performed in scenes of public disorder last summer. It is not true to say that that was the first time that the RUC had behaved in such a way. Throughout recent years, in the marching season, the RUC has distinguished itself and made enormous efforts, in an impartial way, to maintain public order on both sides of the community. It should not be suggested that that is a recent development in terms of the RUC's behaviour.

I should make it clear to the hon. Member for Hammersmith that pickets fall within the definition of open-air meetings. A police officer would be able to impose conditions in the likelihood of serious public disorder if the rigorous tests in article 4(2) were met. That would apply to picketing and other matters.

The order addresses three important matters in Northern Ireland. It seeks to establish a set of conditions and responses for the police to the problem of parades and marches, which my right hon. Friend outlined at the outset of the debate. The vast majority of parades and marches in Northern Ireland pass off without serious disorder, but a minority can cause acute public order problems. The Chief Constable of the RUC has drawn attention to that in all his reports during this decade.

Part II of the order seeks broadly to follow the British legislation with regard to incitement to hatred, and in particular to remove the need to prove intent. We are seeking to remove from the statute book the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954, which is redundant.

I am as conscious as anybody that, when considering public order legislation, we have to find the right balance between individual liberties and giving the police the powers that they need to protect society or substantial minorities in a particular society, from disorder, disturbance and distress. In Northern Ireland the balance must be struck at a slightly different point. We all regret that, but it is a fact of life. The penalties of striking the wrong point on either side are great.

The debate has demonstrated the concern that is felt by hon. Members about the need to get the balance right. It has been a constructive and useful debate. However, I have not been persuaded that we need to withdraw the order because I do not believe that we have got it wrong.

I regret that it looks likely that we shall have a Division. I believe that there is a great deal of common consent in the House about what we need to do in the best interests of the people of Northern Ireland on the three matters under consideration. I hope that it will be possible for us not to divide the House because of the importance of this matter and the need, wherever possible, for the House to come to a consensus view about the actions that we should take in this sensitive area of individual liberty in Northern Ireland. I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Let it be shown that the Minister has refused to answer any of the allegations that were made during the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): That is not a matter for the Chair.

Resolved,

That the draft Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 19th February, be approved.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at to-morrow's sitting, the Motion in the name of the Prime Minister relating to the Motor Vehicle Industry may be proceeded with, though opposed, until half-past Eleven o'clock, and at that hour, if proceedings thereon have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall put any Questions necessary to dispose of them; and if the Motion in the name of Mr. Secretary Channon relating to Industrial Development is then made, Mr. Speaker shall, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business), put forthwith the Question thereon. — [Mr. Portillo.]

PRIVILEGES

Ordered,

That Mr. Solicitor-General be discharged from the Committee of Privileges and Mr. Attorney-General be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Portillo.]

Casualty Unit, Ancoats Hospital, Manchester

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Portillo.]

11.40 pm

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): I welcome the opportunity provided by this Adjournment debate to raise the future of Ancoats hospital in my constituency.

On Monday 11 August 1828 Ancoats hospital opened its doors and established itself as a medical centre. On Sunday 1 February 1987 at 9 am the doors closed on the casualty unit, thus ending a magnificent period of medical history in that part of Manchester. Simultaneously, a number of local residents made the spontaneous gesture of occupying the waiting room and declaring a sit-in in an effort to save a hospital that was dear to their hearts and recognised as part of their heritage.

When one reads the history of Ancoats hospital, one finds that it was set up in 1828 for the purpose of providing a medical dispensary. The reason for that was that the poor had been subjected to the expense of their time and financial loss by having to travel considerable distances to the Manchester infirmary. That loss almost equalled the value of the medicine that was dispensed. Therefore, by establishing a medical dispensary in Ancoats that severe inconvenience for a deprived population would be removed.

Now, in 1987, the area is still suffering from acute deprivation and the people occupying Ancoats hospital are fighting for the same cause. They are fighting for the provision of a casualty unit for people who can ill-afford to travel long distances to receive medical treatment.

Those people have an affinity with Ancoats hospital. They are well aware of its magnificent reputation and are willing to foresake their normal everyday living activities just to sit-in and sleep in cramped conditions. Their purpose is to save a hospital of which they are proud. Those actions and their voices should be taken into consideration. They have a right to be consulted. Regrettably, consultation is not the strong point of the district health authority, and the local community and other interested bodies, including the trade unions and local elected representatives, were not consulted. Closure was a fait accompli.

It has always been recognised and accepted policy that adequate alternative arrangements would be made before the closure at Ancoats took place. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) would readily inform the Minister that that is far from the case and the casualty provision at North Manchester general hospital is, to say the least, in an appalling condition and totally inadequate.

The chairman of the district health authority has written to inform me of the intolerable burden now being imposed on the Manchester Royal infirmary and emphasises that this hospital cannot cope with the extra workload since the closure of the Ancoats casualty unit. The closure has inevitably increased the workload of the Manchester Royal infirmary, which has now become the only remaining city-centre accident and emergency department.

In 1986 the Manchester Royal infirmary treated 43,286 new patients and 7,071 follow-up patients—a total of 50,357 patients. In the same year Ancoats accident and emergency department treated 25,656 new patients and 11,611 follow-up patients — a total of 37,267. It is estimated that the additional resources needed by the Manchester Royal infirmary will cost about £189,000 if that hospital is to meet the extra commitments. Additional funding will be essential for new nursing, medical and clerical staff, security, consumables, wardrobes and extra beds for the in-patient facilities.

Sir John Page, the chairman of the regional health centre, informed me by telephone that he was urging the Royal College of Surgeons not to withdraw its licence from Ancoats, and that he was also consulting Professor Moore, the chairman of North Manchester district health authority, in an effort to delay the closure until alternative and adequate arrangements had been made. Regrettably the closure went ahead.

It is the easiest thing in the world to run down an activity by just starving it of resources. This is what happened at Ancoats hospital. Closure took place in spite of the fact that the building of a nucleus hospital on the site of the North Manchester general hospital, intended to provide a new accident and emergency department, will not commence for four or five years.

Closure went ahead in spite of a number of ambiguities in Professor Sherrard's report to the hospital recognition committee, which advocated the withdrawal of recognition. The report, seen from a different perspective, could have suggested that the upgrading of Ancoats hospital was essential. In any case, we submit that the Royal College of Surgeons took a hasty decision. Have they gone into it in depth and taken into consideration the view of the ambulance emergency service, which is in full support of the action of local residents?

In the past the ambulance emergency service relied upon Ancoats hospital, which had a stabilising unit and staff on hand specifically for such cases as heart failure. Regrettably, the ambulance service will now have to travel far longer distances and patients will have to be attended to while they are actually in the vehicles. It will be a struggle for ambulance crews to care for patients because they do not have trained staff and because they have depended on the existence of Ancoats emergency hospital to provide this back-up service.

Another stipulation that was laid down by the representative from the Royal College of Surgeons for approval of the casualty unit was the amount of time considered necessary for the arrival of an ambulance in response to a 999 call. This was given as 15 minutes. The ambulance service points out that it is now down to eight ambulances right across the city operating from 6 p.m. to 8 a.m., including weekends. The ambulance service states categorically that, with its limited number of vehicles, it could never guarantee arrival to a call within the time specified by the RCS.

I have received many letters of support for this aim. Mr. Dafforne, who was general superintendent and secretary of Ancoats hospital for 21 years and who feels strongly about the closure, has written:

"The Royal College of Surgeons requires a hospital to give a good general basis of experience to help the young doctors to qualify for the RCS exams if they so wish. Ancoats Hospital has provided that for decades and has thus been recognised in the past by the RCS.

Two or three years ago the so-called planners and bureaucrats removed General Medicine and General Surgery from Ancoats. So for the first time since 1872 Ancoats ceased to be a general hospital.

Likewise, East Manchester has lost its general hospital and had to depend on Crumpsall Hospital for all hospital services except orthopaedics and a little ENT unit."

Dafforne said that north Manchester general — Crumpsall hospital—

"serves North Manchester well, but never has it and never will it serve East Manchester."

In a foreword to a booklet to mark the 150th anniversary of the hospital, the revered Sir Harry Platt, professor of orthopaedics surgery, president of the Royal College of Surgeons and honorary surgeon of Ancoats hospital, said:

"I count myself one of those on whom, in his formative years, Ancoats conferred many blessings. So, with others, I salute our hospital in this year now one hundred and fifty years old; but young in spirit and in endeavour, and with a great future before it."

Another contributor to the foreword said:

"Finally, I hope and pray that Ancoats Hospital will maintain its spirit of "care" and long remain to serve the people of Manchester."

Sir Harry died recently, but I should have loved to know his thoughts on the closure. That pride continues with the latest generation. Young and old, people from all walks of life, are imploring the Minister not to hide behind the autonomy of the Royal College of Surgeons—the cover behind which the management has taken refuge—but to take action to re-open Ancoats casualty unit so that it can offer a vital service to an area of great deprivation and to the industrial and commercial sectors of Manchester. We trust that the Government will not do a Pontius Pilate on this matter and say that they have no responsibility over the Royal College of Surgeons. The Government have a responsibility for proper health care. There is tremendous unity of will to keep the hospital open. Thousands of voices are echoing to Harry Platt's wish that Ancoats should have a great future before it. The people will look carefully at the Government's proposals. They will look carefully at the Government's reaction to this debate and to their plea. Ancoats still means a lot to many people. I ask the Minister to use her office to get the bodies involved together to consider re-opening Ancoats hospital.

11.53 pm

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Does the hon. Member have the agreement of the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) and of the Minister to intervene?

Mr. Litherland indicated assent.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie) indicated assent.

Mr. Eastham: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) for his vigilance and attention to the difficult problem with which he has been dealing over the past few weeks. The dedicated staff of Ancoats have shown, with my hon. Friend, their determination to fight this battle with the Department and the regional health authority. My hon. Friend has received little consideration from the regional health authority in the representations that he has made. We are extremely disappointed and our only option is to turn to the Minister in the hope that there will be some form of reconciliation and reconsideration.

[Mr. Eastham]

The closure of Ancoats hospital will not improve the casualty services for the central or northern part of Manchester, which I have the honour to represent. The Minister will be aware from the brief that casualties will be transferred to the Crumpsall hospital in north Manchester, in my constituency. Crumpsall hospital is over 110 years old. It is obsolete and has many problems.

The closure of Ancoats hospital will compound those problems. It will also cause problems to casualties because of transfer difficulties. Time is of the essence when people are in desperate need of medical attention. When one considers the peak periods of traffic and the normal congestions, the resultant delays to some of the emergencies may be extremely important. There may be a price to pay—fatalities.

If the regional health authority decided to go ahead to close Ancoats, one would have thought that proper prior arrangements would be made. However, no such arrangements have been made. All that has been said is that Manchester Royal infirmary and Crumpsall will take the extra casualties.

In my correspondence with the regional health authority I have already pointed out the problems at Crumpsall. It has said that it intends to allocate an extra £250,000 to improve the inadequate casualty provision at Crumpsall. It would have been logical if, first and foremost, the authority had made arrangements concerning the building needs and then made the decision to transfer casualty services. Unfortunately, the authority has allocated the money far too late and one wonders what will be obtained for that £250,000.

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): The Minister will not have much time to reply.

Mr. Eastham: The Minister will have plenty of time; we are dealing with only one hospital.

I hope that the Minister will not say that the Government have allocated £17 million for the first phase of the rebuilding programme. We already know that. But it will be two or three years before Crumpsall will be in an adequate state. We are worried about the present position. Provisions are inadequate at the MRI and at Crumpsall and thus all kinds of stresses and strains are being placed on the services in Manchester.

I hope that the Minister will not say that the Government are improving the National Health Service in Manchester and the north-west — that is not true. Everyone in the city will condemn such a statement from the Minister. I hope that he will reconsider this matter with a view to saying that a mistake may have been made and a new instruction will be given to the regional health authority.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) on his success in the ballot that gives us a brief opportunity to discuss what is happening at Ancoats and what the district and regional health authorities are proposing.

I join the hon. Gentleman in his tribute to Sir Harry Platt, who died recently. He was probably one of the most distinguished people in medicine and surgery that the country has ever produced. He was held in great affection and will be sadly missed.

I appreciate also the comments of the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham). I am sure that the issues that he has raised will be taken into account by the district health authority and the regional health authority in the formal consultation, which is yet to begin, on the proposals that are now before them.

Ancoats hospital was opened in 1828 and has seen various changes during its lifetime. The accident and emergency department was opened in 1971 and, as has been rightly said, in 1985 there were about 27,000 new attendances there and nearly 40,000 attendances in all. However, A and E is not the only work done at the hospital. The bulk of the work done there is trauma and orthopaedic, with over 100 beds, and it is highly valued. It is linked with the rheumatology work.

The problem that faces the district and regional health authorities is to determine how Ancoats is to continue serving the community of the hon. Member for Manchester, Central. It is a small site, and it is bounded on three sides by factories and the Rochdale canal. There are major roads—Old Mill street and Pollard street—at the back and the front of the hospital, and that rather limits what one might like to do in a modern hospital on any rebuilding. Secondly, although a housing estate is across the road, the area is zoned by Manchester city council as an industrial and commercial improvement area. Therefore, one might expect that the population shift that has rather denuded some of the area will not be halted and may well continue.

Most important, the hospital lacks the back-up facilities that a modern accident and emergency facility requires. There is no intensive care unit, no coronary care unit and no blood bank. There are no general surgery beds or general medical beds. All such patients requiring hospitalisation require transfer to other hospitals if they come in through the A and E department at Ancoats. They have required such transfer for some time.

There are other A and E departments in the north Manchester district, especially at North Manchester general hospital and Booth Hall children's hospital, both of which have been quite busy. Booth Hall typically deals with about 22,000 or 23,000 attenders and the North Manchester general hospital has been dealing with over 40,000. The facility at Ancoats has been one within the area but not the major one.

Ancoats cannot admit emergency cases to medical or surgical beds and the ambulance service tells us that it cannot guarantee that roads will be clear and that swift transfer will be possible. This obviously might involve some risk to patients. I take the points that the hon. Member for Manchester, Central has made about the ambulance service, and I have no doubt that any permanent closure proposals will take that into account.

In 1969, as the hon. Member for Manchester, Central probably knows, the DHSS issued a hospital building note. That was done under a Labour Government. The note gave guidance to health authorities on the planning of accident and emergency services, and there are two particular things that are of interest. It reads:

"An accident and emergency department should be part of a hospital which also provides supporting inpatient beds. The department is primarily concerned with patients who are victims of accidents, including head injuries and burns, locomoter injuries, thoracic, abdominal and vascular injuries, sudden illness and poisoning . . . Many accident and emergency departments also deal at present with large numbers of casual attenders suffering from minor illnesses or injuries, though care of these should come increasingly within the province of the work of the general practitioner."

That was the guidance that was being issued nearly 20 years ago by a Labour Government. It still seems sensible, and it was an issue before the Ancoats A and E department opened in 1971.

Subsequent reorganisation, which the hon. Member for Manchester, Central rightly described, ended up with the swapping around of beds from the orthopaedic department at the North Manchester general hospital, with the general medicine and general surgical beds going to that hospital instead. As a result, the Royal College of Surgeons, over a period of about 18 months, has been protesting and stating that the surgical facilities are no longer up to the training standards that it would expect.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Central talked about the report of Professor Sherrard including ambiguities and being hasty. I think that the Royal College of Surgeons and I would reject those criticisms. It was hardly hasty as the discussions have been going on over about 18 months. As for ambiguities, I can do no more than quote exactly from the report that Professor Sherrard sent to the Royal College hospital recognition committee, which met on 30 September 1986. He started by describing the A and E department position as "somewhat anomalous". He said that it is "well furnished and equipped" and that it "is clearly a happy department and the junior staff do acquire knowledge and experience largely by virtue of seeing many patients, together with some minimal tuition but the teaching is not adequate. It may well be improved when the new consultant comes into post"— of course, we now have that—

"but the situation as the whole of the department is a very unsatisfactory one. At the weekends the SHOs are virtually on their own, and if they receive General Medical or Surgical patients in dire straits, there is no one but them to look after them or keep them alive, or even to decide about their transfer. I was told that ambulances could take as long as 2 hours to come for such a patient. The A & E SHOs themselves were very unhappy about the situation and it is probably only a matter of time before a serious problem occurs that might have medico-legal consequences. There is no feedback mechanism by which the Casualty Officers know whether the diagnosis and management they have made was correct in respect of non-Orthopaedic cases. There is no observation Ward . . . A possible rotation between the A & E Department at Ancoats and North Manchester General Hospital would improve things, but would still not make the Ancoats section acceptable or satisfactory."

He concluded his report as follows:

"Recognition should be withdrawn forthwith from the A & E posts when the holders who are about to commence in August 1986 have completed their term of appointment. The A & E service should cease by the closure of the department for that purpose and the patient load transferred, either to Manchester Royal Infirmary or to the North Manchester General Hospital. North Manchester General Hospital will need to have an immediate temporary expansion and SHOs at Ancoats could transfer to that hospital — which would be an improvement, both as regards training and economy."

Mr. Litherland: I also have the document from which the hon. Lady has been reading. Has she seen the letter which highlights the ambiguities in that report? If not, shall I send her a copy?

Mrs. Currie: I would be delighted to receive anything that the hon. Gentleman wants to send me. I merely say that what I have read is about as unambiguous as anything could be.

As on 25 November 1986 the Royal College of Surgeons withdrew recognition for the training of junior medical staff from 1 February 1987, the district health authority had very little choice, except as an emergency and on the temporary procedures, but to close the A and E department from 1 February 1987. Procedurally the closure is temporary while consultation takes place. I understand that the district health authority hopes to approve a document about the form of consultation at its meeting tomorrow.

I have to say to the hon. Gentleman that in these circumstances no junior doctor in those specialties can work in that A and E section. The only way it can be staffed with medical staff is by consultants and by general practitioners. Both of those possibilities, I understand, are covered in the consultation document of which I have had foresight.

It follows, therefore, that the old A and E department is not an option. No responsible authority and no doctor would or can ignore the Royal College of Surgeons. It is not a question of absolving myself from the responsibility. The Royal College of Surgeons sets the standards for us and we have to take note of them. We should be looking to the future and trying to ensure that the legitimate needs, requirements and requests of the hon. Gentleman's constituents are met, both for accident and emergency provision and for everything else.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State was apprised of the position when he was in the neighbourhood on 10 February. He met the leader of the protest group, Mrs. Anne Dobson. He is taking a close interest in what is going to happen.

The hon. Member for Blackley asked me not to say that we have a lot more money going into the neighbourhood. He knows that that is true. He knows that spending in North Manchester has grown from £47 million to £54 million last year. I believe he knows that £50,000 extra has recently been allocated for waiting list money in that neighbourhood, which will help a large number of patients, and £450,000 extra from the RAWP bridging fund to enable that district, and many other districts in that region, to catch up better than they have been able to do.

Last week my hon. Friend the Minister of State announced the approval in principle of a £17·5 million phase 1 redevelopment at North Manchester general hospital, and part of that redevelopment will be the new accident and emergency department. The extension will be opened in September, and in its consultation document the DHA proposes that that development should be its top priority. We hope that the result will be a vastly improved accident and emergency service for the north Manchester district that should take into account many of the worries of the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in the debate.

SCOTLAND

Golden Wonder Factory, Broxburn

1. Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what reply he has received from the management of the Dalgety group to his expression of concern at the social consequences of the closure of the Golden Wonder Factory at Broxburn.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): The managing director of Dalgety UK Ltd has made it clear that the company is not prepared to reverse its decision. However, he has expressed a commitment to considering alternative uses for the Broxburn facility which would alleviate the unemployment consequences of the decision to cease crisp manufacture.

Mr. Cook: Will the Minister recognise that many of us find it distasteful that a new management which has owned the company for only three months should, without consultation, dismiss a work force, some of whom have served the factory for 20 years? In his discussions with Dalgety, will he make it clear to the company that if it does not intend to run the factory as a crisp-making centre, it would be wholly unacceptable for it to refuse any genuine offer to take the factory over as a going concern and thereby save 350 jobs in a travel-to-work area where unemployment is already over 20 per cent?

Mr. Lang: I shall happily relay that message to the company. Like the hon. Gentleman, I regret the lack of prior consultation which is always desirable in such circumstances. However, I am glad to be able to remind the hon. Gentleman that there has been a net increase of 3,000 jobs in the Livingston area in the past two years, and that manufacturing employment remains at the 1979 level.

Sir Alex Fletcher: Does my hon. Friend accept that although Dalgety has every right to rationalise its own manufacturing capacity, it has no right to attempt to stifle competition by refusing to entertain offers from potential competitors, particularly in an area of high unemployment? Has my hon. Friend had a satisfactory response from Sir Peter Carey, the chairman of Dalgety and a former champion of regional policy?

Mr. Lang: I have been in touch with both Sir Peter Carey and with Mr. Maurice Warren the managing director of Dalgety UK Ltd. I must say that I have not had a satisfactory reply. I share my hon. Friend's view that it is desirable that the facility should be made available to an alternative user who will maintain employment in the area.

Mr. Dalyell: What exactly did Sir Peter Carey say?

Mr. Lang: Sir Peter Carey passed the matter over to Mr. Maurice Warren.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Dalgety group also owns the Spillers factory in Barrhead which has an outstanding record in production, industrial relations and new investment? In his discussions with Dalgety, will he reinforce the Scottish Office commitment to the success of that factory and explore possibilities for expansion?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the successful factories also operated by the group in other parts of the country. Major companies of this kind have made notable contributions to the Scottish economy.

Mr. Wilson: Is this not yet another case of a company in Scotland being closed down to facilitate company strategy elsewhere to the disadvantage of a Scottish work force? What industrial strategy do the Government have to deal with such cases?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely wrong. Golden Wonder — Dalgety — also closed a factory at Long Buckby in the south.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Minister not agree that it would be shameful if Golden Wonder was to block any offer for the factory as a going concern? Will he take it from the Opposition that it is not good enough simply to say that he will relay the message from my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook)? That is all right as far as it goes, but we want that same message to come very forcefully from Ministers. It is quite unsatisfactory that the fate of 350 employees at the plant should be passed around like a paper parcel between executives in the way that the Minister has described. Can he assure us that he is making the point strongly to the company that the Government will deeply resent any attempt to block any purchaser who wishes to maintain the factory in its present industry?

Mr. Lang: I am sure that the company is in no doubt about the Government's view of the matter. My officials and the local authorities remain anxious to consult the company on the best alternative use of the facility.

Springburn

2. Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to bring more employment to Springburn.

Mr. Lang: The full range of the Government's employment, enterprise and training measures, which have recently been extended, are already available in Springburn. In addition, good progress is being made with discussions on a local economic intiative, involving the Scottish Development Agency, based principally on measures intended to create new employment in the area.

Mr. Martin: By the end of the month, the work force in the main industry — railway workshops — will be reduced to 300. That contrasts with the community of 10,000 people who used to work in that industry. Last year, the Minister promised an initiative for Springburn, but not one job has come to my community. In Springburn and the surrounding areas, there are young people who have never had decent jobs. If the Minister will not deliver jobs, he should resign.

Mr. Lang: We are anxious to get the initiative off the ground and have been trying to do so. Broad agreement has now been reached on the component parts of the initiative, but as the hon. Gentleman knows it involves not only the Scottish Development Agency and British Rail Engineering Ltd, but the local authorities, the Manpower Services Commission and the Glasgow Opportunities Enterprise Trust. It has been difficult to get the scheme off the ground, but I hope that progress can now be made.

Mr. Henderson: In view of the long and historic association between Springburn and the railway system, does my hon. Friend believe that employment there would be greatly improved if British Rail would run an efficient, reliable, and clean service that met the needs of the people of Scotland?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. It is also fair to say that the running of the engineering workshops must be a matter for BREL, and it is right for that company to try to provide a competitive and efficient service. It is the intention that part of British Rail's light maintenance of rolling stock should be carried out at BREL after 1 April.

Caterpillar Tractor Co.

3. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the up-to-date position regarding the proposed closure of the Caterpillar Tractor Co, Tannochside; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I regret to say that the company's decision to close the plant remains unchanged. Work is in hand aimed at exploring all possibilities for retaining manufacturing operation and employment facility. In this connection, officials of the Industry Department for Scotland and the Scottish Development Agency are discussing with Caterpillar the preparation of a detailed profile of the facility with a view to marketing it, if this proves necessary, to potential users within the United Kingdom and abroad.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the Secretary of State aware of reports that a circular letter has been sent to all the employees in the factory saying that if they do not stop their illegal sit-in they will receive notice to quit their jobs without redundancy payments? When will he have the meeting which he promised the workers he would have outside the factory? As it is in my constituency, I want to be at that meeting. Lastly, it is reported that two companies are interested in the factory. What is the truth of the matter and what are the prospects?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not recall agreeing to a meeting outside the factory. I told the workers whom I met last week and who invited me to visit the factory that I have no objection to visiting the factory but cannot do so while the unlawful occupation continues. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands the relevance of that consideration.

I am aware of the circular that has been distributed by the company. Obviously, the work force will wish to consider that factor. We must also consider the extent to which the attraction of alternative users of the plant, should that prove necessary, is being helped or hindered by the continuing occupation of the plant.

Mr. McQuarrie: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the Caterpillar management's treatment of the work force, the Government and him especially, is disgraceful? Does he further agree, with regard to the comments that he made when he was subjected to that disgraceful treatment, that if there is any possibility of an offer being made from the work force or any other source, he will consider sympathetically giving Government aid towards getting the project off the ground and saving those 1,200 jobs?

Mr. Rifkind: The company's attitude to the work force is the cause of greatest concern because it was informed by the company that the plant had a future. I can happily confirm that if there were alternative proposals for the continued use of the plant, which would give it a prospect of viability, obviously the Government would be willing, in the normal way, to see whether some financial contribution through regional policy was able to assist the fulfilment of that objective.

Mr. Strang: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that there was some surprise at the reported remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) that the workers should give up their occupation so that officials could visit the plant? Is he aware that when he spoke of the determined efforts of the work force when he met it last week, he was reflecting the aspirations of all Scottish people? Will he assure the House that he stands by what he said to the work force last week and will continue to support the whole of Scotland in its support for the work force's stand?

Mr. Rifkind: I stand by everything that I said to the work force last week. Indeed, there was nothing inconsistent between that and what my hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale has also said. We have emphasised that if it should prove necessary to seek to find an alternative user of the plant, the presentation of a profile of the plant becomes extremely difficult if it is not possible to visit the plant because its lawful owners are denied access to it. I know that the work force is having to consider the implications of those considerations. We are all anxious to make progress in this matter and one has to consider a sensible judgment as to whether continuing occupation of the plant is in the interest of the work force itself with a view to alternative users being identified and attracted to Uddingston to provide long-term employment.

Mr. Hirst: I assure my right hon. and learned Friend that the whole of Scotland admires the vigorous way in which he has stood up to the Caterpillar management. However, if the United States management of Caterpillar does not change its mind about the closure, can he remind the House yet again that the Government will spare no effort in making resources available to find alternative employers to come to Uddingston? Does he agree that in those circumstances a prolonged occupation of the factory could deter an alternative employer?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his opening comments and would add only that Mr. Gavin Laird and Mr. Jimmy Airlie expressed similar, if not identical, observations after my meeting with them. I certainly confirm the additional points made by my hon. Friend.

Sir Russell Johnston: May I press the Secretary of State on the question of assistance to alternatives? If, for example, no alternative buyer was found and a workers' takeover was demonstrated to be a commercial proposition, would the Secretary of State, in those circumstances, be prepared to produce money? Will he say to Caterpillar that it would be a clement act, considering the genuine criticism to which it has been subjected, if it released the tractor over which it is playing silly legal games?

Mr. Rifkind: The ownership of the tractor is a legal matter and it is not for me to comment on it. On the hon. Gentleman's earlier comments, we are interested in a long-term commercially viable proposition for the continuation of the plant and we would be interested in assisting any proposal that was likely to prove commercially viable so far as it was within our power to do so.

Mr. Dewar: In his initial reply, the Secretary of State said that the position of the employer, the Caterpillar Tractor company, remained unchanged and put considerable emphasis on the work being done to prepare a profile of the plant. Does that mean that he is still pressing the company for a change of mind? As a static position is of little help in that respect, is he taking any positive initiative to try to bring it about? As the time scale is important, given the genuine and general anxiety and, indeed, anger at the way in which the company has acted, will he undertake to come back to the House and, in the form of a statement, report progress so that we may know how negotiations with the company, if any, are progressing and, if the reply is disappointing, so that he will have a chance to outline the alternative proposals he has for the plant?

Mr. Rifkind: I have not accepted, and still do not accept, the inevitability of Caterpillar's withdrawal from the plant and I shall continue to use every opportunity to try to persuade Caterpillar to reconsider its decision. However, clearly, it would be foolish to suggest that it is likely to do so in the absence of any new information or new consideration. Nevertheless, one will seek to use any opportunity to persuade it to reconsider the decision it has reached.

It is also in the interest of the work force and suppliers to that plant to explore simultaneously other possible uses of the plant, because we must accept at least the strong possibility that there will not be a reversal of the decision by the ownership of the company. To put all our eggs in that particular basket might be an unwise proposition, most of all from the point of view of the work force itself.

North Lanarkshire (Unemployment)

4. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland by how much unemployment in North Lanarkshire has risen since May 1979.

Mr. Lang: Between May 1979 and January 1987 unemployement rose from 15,531 in the former North Lanarkshire travel-to-work area to 35,089 in the new Lanarkshire travel-to-work area. As a result of changes in the travel-to-work area boundaries and in the method of the count, those figures are not comparable.

Mr. Robertson: While the outrage of Caterpillar dominates the dismal picture that the Minister has highlighted, is he aware that there are other examples in that area of conglomerates pulling out and abandoning ship, for example, Reyrolle Belmos in my constituency, where Northern Engineering Industries is simply abandoning the area, and 40 years of local history, and taking with it all the tools, machinery, drawings and brand names, as well as 300 jobs? It is also blocking any possibility of anybody else taking over the factory. For how long will the Minister and the Government allow our industrial life-blood to drain away before taking any action to stop it?

Mr. Lang: The company has taken a commercial decision based on its perception of the demand for its products in power stations, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that our attempts to help the area are reflected in the substantial Motherwell and Coatbridge projects, with a budget of around £57 million in the Motherwell project, which has been extended to 1990. That has attracted £80 million of private sector finance and helped to create or safeguard more than 4,000 jobs.

Dr. Bray: Did the chairman of the British Steel Corporation volunteer the closure of hot-rolled coil capacity at Ravenscraig in the present Eurofer round? Has that offer now been withdrawn as contrary to the Government's commitments at Ravenscraig and elsewhere?

Mr. Lang: I am not privy to the deliberations of Eurofer, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware of the commitment given again recently by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, that we remain committed to a five-integrated-plant plan for BSC, and that nothing can be done to prejudice the subsequent decision before 1988.

Crofters (Community Charge)

5. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the financial effect on crofters arising from the introduction of community charge.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has received representations on that matter from the Western Isles islands council, the Crofters Commission, the National Farmers Union of Scotland the Scottish Crofters Union and the Harris Council of Social Service, as well as from a number of individuals in the crofting areas.

Mr. Stewart: Is the Minister aware of the concern and resentment felt throughout the crofting community at the imminent disappearance of the rating control concession under the poll tax legislation? Is he further aware that the factors that gave rise to that in the first place still exist to the same extent, and were accepted by a previous Conservative Administration and, indeed, have been by all Governments since? Are we to believe that the present occupants of the Scottish Office are more hard-nosed and uncaring than the Conservatives in 1956?

Mr. Ancram: I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his mischief in raising the issue, which he knows from the Standing Committee on the Abolition of Domestic Rates etc. (Scotland) Bill splits the Labour party in three ways. The present relief attaches to property rather than to the individual. The new charge that is being introduced is a personal charge, and the rebate system that we intend to introduce will make sure that those on low incomes are sufficiently protected.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Will my hon. Friend confirm that when it comes to being hard-nosed towards crofters, the policy of a local income tax that is espoused by the Scottish nationalists and the Liberals would be far more damaging than the community charge because of the narrowness of the tax base? Is it not double standards on their part to complain about something that will be to the benefit of their constituencies?

Mr. Ancram: I agree with my hon. Friend. I would go further and say that the type of relief that is being sought by the right hon. Gentleman and by other hon. Members would be given to people in a specific category. Some of them might benefit from it and some of them would not need it. I call in evidence the words of Mr. Brian Wilson, who I believe is a Labour candidate. Writing in the West Highland Free Press on Friday 27 February, he said:

"It simply is not on to introduce, in 1987 a new scheme which gives the well-paid schoolteacher with crofting status a 25 per cent. tax rebate, while the pensioner next door in a non-croft house is hit for the full whack."

That is a sensible approach.

Mr. Wallace: Does not the example that the Minister has given underline the indiscriminate way in which the poll tax will affect people? A local income tax is by far the fairest way by relating liability to one's ability to pay.

Mr. Ancram: I should be interested to hear what figures the Liberal party can produce about how a local income tax would work. On the figures that we have produced, the impression is that anybody earning over £112 a week as a single earner would end up paying more in local income tax than he would in community charge.

Gross Domestic Product

6. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion public expenditure represents of the Scottish gross domestic product.

Mr. Rifkind: Identifiable public expenditure in Scotland in the financial year 1985-86 was 48 per cent. of Scottish gross domestic product at factor cost in the calendar year 1985.

Mr. Fallon: Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that for every £4 of public expenditure south of the borders about £5 is spent north of the border? [Interruption.]

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman should get his hands out of his pockets.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has as much right as a Scottish Member to raise this matter.

Mr. Fallon: To what does my right hon. and learned Friend attribute this extraordinary difference? Is it the automatic element in the block formula, or is it his own formidable lobbying skill at the Treasury?

Mr. Rifkind: I know that my hon. Friend visits Scotland quite frequently. He will know that although the population of Scotland is a relatively small fraction of that of the United Kingdom, the land mass of Scotland is a far higher proportion than the population would imply, and therefore requires somewhat disproportionate expenditure on, for example, roads and transport, and because of the special circumstances of the islands of Scotland, which have specific requirements. Therefore, rather crude comparisons of the kind that my hon. Friend makes are not entirely appropriate.

Mr. Roy Jenkins: As it is the Government's desire to reduce public expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product, and as the Government regard public expenditure as an albatross around the neck of private industry, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman regard the public expenditure level in Scotland as an achievement or as a failure?

Mr. Rifkind: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that the proportion that I mentioned has actually gone down over the last few years. Therefore, I consider the level an achievement.

Mr. Fairbairn: Does my right hon. and learned Friend appreciate that one reason for the excellent level of public expenditure in Scotland compared to that in England is that the mother of my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) lives in my constituency, and it is spent on her? I do not understand his complaint. Will my right hon. and learned Friend make sure that the message is spread that the quality of life in Scotland is infinitely better, thanks to him and his fellow Ministers, and that more people could live there and commute to the south than the other way round?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. and learned Friend is correct. The definition of public expenditure that I used in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) is of identifiable public expenditure as a whole and not merely that of the Scottish Office, and does include transfer payments of the kind to which my hon. and learned Friend refers.

Mr. Douglas: Can the Secretary of State confirm that we are talking about public authority current expenditure on goods and services and, of course, about gross domestic capital formation, and part of that is public expenditure?

Mr. McQuarrie: That is big talk.

Mr. Douglas: The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) says that that is big talk, but he ought to remember that, like me, he is only a wee fellow.

If the Secretary of State wants to go further, will he tell us about the jobs related to that public expenditure and the essential services and about the infrastructure that is created by it and which is essential to Scotland's economic progress?

Mr. Rifkind: Throughout the United Kingdom, public expenditure supports a certain level of employment. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that a previous Labour Government came to the conclusion that one could not expect public expenditure to answer the questions of unemployment. The country as a whole now fully appreciates that.

Scottish Development Agency

7. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total expenditure by the Scottish Development Agency since its inception.

Mr. Rifkind: On the assumption that provision for 1986-87 is fully spent, the Scottish Development Agency will have spent at the end of March a total of £1·03 billion in the period since it was formed.

Mr. Knox: Can my right hon. and learned Friend say how much the agency has spent on average, each year, since the Government came to office and how that expenditure compares with the amount spent on average, each year, under the Labour Government?

Mr. Rifkind: I cannot immediately give an average figure, but what I can say is that, in constant prices, the gross expenditure of the Scottish Development Agency has gone up both in cash terms and in constant prices. I believe that that is a measure of the great significance that the Government attach to the role of the agency in dealing with the economic and infrastructure problems of Scotland. That important role was recognised in a recent review of the agency carried out some months ago.

Dr. Godman: It is reported that, following the deal with Trafalgar House over unused land, the Scottish Development Agency will spend several million pounds on the redevelopment of unused land for new industrial sites. I take it that that money is in addition to the financing of the Inverclyde initiative. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman now sanction an increase in the staff of the Inverclyde initiative? Will he now respond to my request for consultancy support for the Inverclyde initiative?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's latter point concerns detailed matters that are currently under consideration. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman joins me in expressing pleasure that the discussions, which the Government authorised the agency to have with Trafalgar House, have led to such a great success. I am aware that when the Inverclyde council came to see me it correctly pointed out that the availability of land for potential investors was the single most important consideration in achieving the regeneration of Inverclyde. Now that over 40 acres of land have been released as a result of the arrangements with Trafalgar House, it will enable the SDA, which in agreement with the Government, attaches great priority to the regeneration of the area, to prepare the land for potential investors from other parts of the country and from overseas.

Mr. Pollock: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the SDA has an important, positive role in rural coastal seats, such as my constituency, and in the central belt? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, at present, the SDA has undertaken to help to try to regenerate the somewhat parlous economy of Buckie, which is facing problems? Will he ensure that the agency is given adequate resources to do what it deems to be necessary?

Mr. Rifkind: I happily confirm what my hon. Friend said. The SDA has a role to play throughout the whole of Scotland. Indeed, it is estimated that some 25 per cent. of its expenditure is within the rural as opposed to the industrial areas of Scotland.

Mr. Canavan: What proportion of SDA expenditure has been spent on environmental, tourist, hotel and prestige projects, such as the garden festival, and how much has been spent on genuine public investment in industry? Such investment was one of the key roles for the SDA when it was set up by the Labour Government.

Mr. Rifkind: I believe that the hon. Gentleman is mistaken in trying to draw a distinction between what he chooses to call the genuine role of the SDA and that which he presumably believes to be of no great significance. He should be aware that, to many parts of Scotland, the tourist industry is of great economic significance. He will also appreciate that people are interested in finding jobs and his rather superficial and spurious distinction is of little relevance to the needs of Scotland.

Mr. Maxton: In view of the answer that the Minister gave to his hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) can the Minister explain how it is that at 1986-87 prices SDA expenditure was £133·2 million, for the coming year it will be £131 million, while in 1979-80, the last year of the Labour Government, expenditure was £134 million? How does the present figure represent an improvement?

Mr. Rifkind: I must say to the hon. Gentleman that the last full year of the Labour Government was 1978-79 and the figure then was £124 million. I hope that the hon. Gentleman has noted the remarks made by a large number of American companies which have studied the role of the SDA and identified the SDA, as reformed by the present Government, as the most successful agency of its kind anywhere in western Europe. Those companies went on to say that the prospects for further investment in Scotland were splendid and could only be marred by the return of a Labour Government. That was not the view of politicians, that was the view of overseas business men whom we are seeking to persuade to invest in Scotland.

Mr. Kirkwood: In the absence of any properly co-ordinated rural development agency north of the border —as the Secretary of State will know, such an agency is available to places such as Northumberland south of the border — will the right hon. and learned Gentleman consider giving the Scottish Development Agency a modest increase in funds so that it can begin to play a part in the current debate in Scotland about new development and alternative uses of land in rural areas? With modest funds, a rural development agency in Scotland could provide significant help.

Mr. Rifkind: The Scottish Development Agency already carries out such a role. The hon. Gentleman should be aware of two proposals, development of rural area workshops — DRAW — and programme for rural initiatives and developments — PRIDE — which have already involved significant investment in various rural areas in Scotland, including, I suspect, the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Mrs. McCurley: I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on yesterday's announcement about the Inverclyde initiative. I add my warm congratulations in respect of the part played by the SDA in breaking the logjam in Inverclyde, which will enable the initiative to take off at a great rate.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend. She is absolutely correct. All those who know Inverclyde know that non-availability of land was proving to be one of the most serious obstacles to progress. That obstacle has now been removed.

Fine Defaulters

8. Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the present prison population is made up of fine defaulters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The latest available figures are for December 1986 when approximately 4·5 per cent. of the average daily population in Scottish penal establishments were fine defaulters.

Mr. Hogg: I thank the Minister for that reply, but does it not show that there is a continuing crisis in the Scottish prison system? What steps is he taking to ensure that this problem is met, so that the offenders are dealt with under the original sentence that they receive and not under this secondary imposition? Surely, this displays a very unhealthy situation in the prison system.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman may know that about 78 per cent. of sentences passed in 1985 involved fines. The vast majority of those fines are paid. But it is necessary to preserve some sanction of imprisonment to sustain the credibility and effectiveness of fines. We have introduced fine enforcement officers in sheriff courts, and it is hoped that this will relieve the problem arising from fine defaulters.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that fine defaulters are customarily given every tolerance by the courts, so he can safely say that those who are in prison are those who are defiant or even contemptuous of their liabilities?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend has underlined the point that I made. We need the sanction of imprisonment to support the effectiveness of fines. Only about 7·5 per cent. of those who are fined end up in prison and they are there for only short terms.

Mr. Hugh Brown: Given the recent serious disturbances in the Scottish prisons, would the hon. Gentleman agree to some kind of inquiry — public or otherwise — to investigate the possibilities of reducing the number of fine defaulters in prison and of imposing more non-custodial sentences?

Mr. Lang: That point certainly justifies further exploration. As I have said, we have introduced fine enforcement officers. So far, there are 12 in place and there are to be three more. The success of this arrangement will be evaluated by the Scottish Office central research unit. During the past three years, community service orders have been used increasingly, and they should also help to relieve the problem.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend look urgently at the possibility of having a much simpler regime for fine defaulters so that they do not have to go through the rigidity of admission and release, which is absurd for people who are merely being detained until they pay a fine?

Mr. Lang: Yesterday, my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland explained in some detail how the Debtors (Scotland) Bill, which is before the House, will provide for more efficient methods of arresting the earnings of a debtor in the hands of his employer. I hope that this, too, will help to relieve the problem.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Has the Minister considered the important report on this matter by the Association of Directors of Social Work in Scotland, which takes into account the fact that nearly half of those admitted to prison come from this category? Is the hon. Gentleman prepared to consider the alternatives proposed by the association?

Mr. Lang: I have just received that report, which is being closely studied. As the hon. Gentleman knows, it was published only a couple of weeks or so ago.

Food Aid

9. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has of the costs incurred by voluntary organisations in Scotland on the administration, distribution and handling of free food for the needy from European Economic Community intervention stocks.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): Costs incurred for the delivery of foodstuffs to the charities' distribution points are, within limits reimbursable. I have no estimate of the other costs incurred by the voluntary organisations.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister aware that we welcome the admission by the Government that there are a lot of needy people in Scotland? We also welcome the principle of distributing the surplus food. Obviously we are all grateful to the voluntary organisations for the splendid job that they have done. However, will he accept that there have been significant problems in the distribution? In view of the substantial cost and the workload involved in the exercise for voluntary organisations in Scotland, will he make contingency plans for public agencies to fund and co-ordinate any future distribution?

Mr. MacKay: Perhaps I may first join the hon. Member in congratulating and thanking the voluntary bodies which have done such a splendid job in distributing the food. I have to remind him that it was a decision of the Commission that the best, quickest and most effective way of distributing the food would be through voluntary bodies and that FEOGA, for example, will reimburse the charities at a rate of £159 per tonne for the repacking into small packs and the transport of butter. There will also be reimbursement for the transport of boneless beef. The charities knew when they took over the job that they would be involved in costs. I believe that they have seen it as a worthwhile job and I do not think they will complain too much about the success of the venture.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am sure my hon. Friend will accept that the voluntary organisations, while they undertook willingly to carry out the work, have not got a bottomless purse. Will he try to ensure that the costs are reimbursed to the Salvation Army, Age Concern and similar organisations, because they do not have funds other than the voluntary contributions of many people? FEOGA and the Commission have plenty of money to reimburse these organisations.

Mr. MacKay: I repeat the point that I made in response to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) that there will be reimbursement for the cost of distribution to the main distribution points. That is probably the major part of the cost. The Commission has made it clear that the limited costs thereafter will have to fall on the charities themselves. As my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said in the House the other day, we will be prepared to talk to any charities that have trouble.

Mr. Ron Brown: The Government believe in market forces. If we believe the various statements by individuals who allege that the EEC is wonderful, surely these foodstuffs should be made available in village shops. It is a question of cost. Surely prices should come down. Would it not be better if we withdrew completely from the EEC?

Mr. MacKay: I am not sure whether I have fully understood the hon. Member's question. The Government have long argued for a reduction in support prices under the common agricultural policy, but other member states have not been prepared to agree. Even if we got that, the elasticity of demand for foodstuffs in the European Community would still mean that we had a major surplus problem.

Mr. Bruce: Will not the Minister acknowledge that the problem is not simply one of cost but of physical human resources and that in many areas distribution has been patchy or non-existent because the charities did not have people on the ground? Will he recognise that in future it would be better if such distribution was co-ordinated by local authorities? Further, what will he do for those areas that missed out altogether, and for those individuals who were denied participation?

Mr. MacKay: I am sorry to hear that the hon. Member representing the Liberal party has so little confidence in the voluntary organisations. While I accept that distribution started off rather patchily my information is that it is now in full swing and that many people are giving a lot of time to getting the butter and so on to elderly people. I am sorry to see the hon. Member dissenting because in his constituency, as in others, many volunteers in, for example, the WRVS are doing an excellent job. I am prepared to pay tribute to them, if he is not.

Labour Statistics

10. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the five travel-to-work areas in Scotland currently with the highest levels of unemployment; and what special initiatives his Department or the appropriate Government agency has set up in each of the five areas concerned.

Mr. Lang: The five areas are Cumnock and Sanquhar, Forres, Girvan, Irvine and Skye, and Wester Ross. A special initiative for the Cumnock and Doon area is now well under way. All the other areas are assisted areas under the Government's regional policy.

Mr. Foulkes: That is certainly a list that one does not wish to be on. I regret to say that two areas in my constituency are in the top five. Does the Minister appreciate that 400 jobs in the mining industry in Cumnock and Sanquhar have been lost over the past seven years? Although we welcome what is being done following the Coopers and Lybrand report, it is in no way enough to tackle the enormity of the unemployment problem in the Cumnock area. Will the Minister ask the Scottish Development Agency to adopt one of the special initiatives that have been instituted in other areas in Scotland? Girvan, which is No. 3 on the list, does not even have development status. Will the Minister give serious consideration to Girvan's problems, make sure that it is awarded development area status as a matter of urgency, and find some special initiative scheme for the area?

Mr. Lang: I must tell the hon. Gentleman that we have no plans to reconsider the map in the immediate future. The maps were drawn up only two years ago. There is a necessity for stability to enable the situation to be properly assessed. The Cumnock and Sanquhar travel-to-work area straddles the boundary between the hon. Gentleman's constituency and my constituency. I know that he is appreciative of the speed with which the SDA has responded in the case of UK Opticals in Mauchline. I am sure that he will join me in welcoming the successful takeover of Brocks Fireworks in Sanquhar, which has secured a number of jobs, and the establishment of Fisher and Holden in Kirkconnel in my constituency, which has brought 100 new manufacturing jobs to the area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Will my hon. Friend confirm that unemployment in each area would be much higher if we were to follow the advice of the Labour party and close down nuclear power stations, thereby putting up electricity prices by 25 per cent., and to allow rates to rip?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Indeed, almost all the policies of the Labour party seem to be designed to raise unemployment and cause problems for the economy. I have not yet been able to see details of its policy for jobs, announced today. As far as I understand it, the Labour party relies largely on artificial, unproductive public sector jobs, which may be best characterised as postmen going around in pairs.

Mr. Lambie: As the urban travel-to-work area in my constituency is also on the list read out by the Minister, will he see that his officials in the Scottish Office and officials in the Scottish Development Agency realise that something is still needed for the Cunninghame area? Is the Minister aware that the Irvine area received a further blow to unemployment during the week, and one at the weekend, when Marlow Textiles went into receivership, causing the loss of another 100 jobs? Today I heard a rumour that Dawson International, in carrying out the process of rationalisation, is considering closing McKinnon's Textiles in Irvine, which will involve the loss of another 100 jobs. That cannot go on. I do not want the area to top the unemployment list. In spite of all the initiatives coming into the Cunninghame area, the Minister must ensure that officials do something, go to Irvine and try to get more jobs.

Mr. Lang: As the hon. Gentleman may know, I recently had the pleasure of visiting Irvine new town. I spent a considerable time in the area. The hon. Gentleman may welcome the fact that, last month, Scottish-based companies announced projects promising almost 2,000 new manufacturing jobs as a result of orders received. One major inward investment that was recently announced was the establishment of the Finnish paper mill at Irvine, which will create up to 1,000 direct and indirect jobs in his constituency and a further 1,000 or more jobs in the construction period.

Mr. Pollock: Does my hon. Friend accept that the figure that he gave for Forres is artificially high because of the distortion caused by the presence of RAF Kinloss in the travel-to-work area? Apart from the assisted area status to which he referred, does he recall that, in Elgin last year, our right hon. Friend announced the extension of the Highlands and Islands Development Board boundaries to embrace the Forres travel-to-work area? That was a clear sign of the positive steps that the Government are taking to battle with the problem.

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome to our response in extending the Highlands and Islands Development Board area. It will enable the Forres area to have access to all the resources of the board. I hope that it will assist the unemployment problem in that part of his constituency.

Dundee

11. Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he intends to take to maintain investment and employment in Dundee following termination of the Dundee project.

Mr. Lang: Development area status, supported by access to the full range of the Government's employment, enterprise and training measures, will help Dundee to attract new investment and jobs. Enterprise zone benefits remain in force until 1994 and major investment by the Scottish Development Agency in projects such as the technology park and the waterfront development guarantee substantial agency resources well beyond the end of the project.

Mr. Wilson: Is the Minister aware that the Dundee project, which is a major investor, comes to a close at the end of this year and that there is considerable worry in the city about what will happen after that event, in terms of the level of cash and the degree of attention that the Scottish Development Agency will give to the city? Does he not realise that unemployment is still at about the 15·5 per cent. level, which is extremely high, and that there is no sign of it abating?

Mr. Lang: The Dundee project has helped to create over 2,000 new jobs and bring over £40 million of private investment into the city. It has undoubtedly been a successful venture. The hon. Gentleman knows that the agency has already stated its intention to maintain an office in Dundee for the foreseeable future. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will give consideration to the Scottish Nationalist party standing down its candidate in Dundee, East as a contribution to its realistic approach to Dundee's problems.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Solicitors (Public Service)

37. Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what responsibility he has for the professional conduct of Scottish solicitors working in the public service.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): Criminal conduct apart, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I are responsible only for the professional conduct of solicitors employed in our own Departments.

Mr. Foulkes: Although I accept that the conduct of solicitors in the Solicitor-General's Department is impeccable, I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman will share with me the concern about disciplining solicitors in private practice. He will be aware that many complaints have been made for over a year against Mr. Graeme Adam, a solicitor, but that despite all these complaints Mr. Adam has consistently refused to turn up at auditors' hearings to deal with them. The Law Society has been totally powerless to act. In the meanwhile, Mr. Adam is practising as a solicitor. Is it not about time that the complaints procedure against solicitors was taken out of the hands of the Law Society and dealt with by a proper, independent complaints procedure?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am aware of the case to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I think that he readily appreciates that that is not a matter that comes within my area of responsibility. If there are problems over Mr. Adam's attendance before the auditor, I think that there are steps that can be taken. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that the Law Society is not anxious to pursue the matter. I understand that it is looking at the complaints that the hon. Gentleman and others have made about this particular solicitor. It is for the Law Society to deal with the matter rather than me, unless of course there are indications of fraud by him or any other solicitor.

State Security

38. Mr. Dalyell asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will make it his practice, when the Crown Office or procurators fiscal are applying for search warrants in relation to offences under the Official Secrets Act, that all applications be made to a justice of the peace.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: No, Sir.

Mr. Dalyell: May I ask the Solicitor-General a question of which I gave the Crown Office notice on Monday, to which I hope that there will be a considered reply? By what statutory provision or principle of the common law does he assert that the sheriff has legal authority to grant a warrant that Parliament specifically stated should be granted by someone else? [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] Yes, I am reading, because I had the courtesy to give the Crown Office notice.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate indicated in another place last week, the sheriff possesses magisterial powers under the common law and statute in relation to the issue of warrants. He also said that he was satisfied that the proper procedures for obtaining a search warrant were followed in this case and that the involvement of the procurator fiscal and the sheriff was in accordance with the established law of Scotland. It is true that the hon. Gentleman gave something of advance and public notice of his supplementary question——

Mr. Dalyell: And to the Solicitor-General's Office.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Yes, and to my Office, but he went on to say that it was improper or wrong to go to sheriffs because they were beholden to Law

Officers and that it would be more appropriate to go to a justice of the peace. On proper reflection, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will realise that that was a wholly unwarranted slur on the sheriffs in Scotland.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. and learned Friend advise the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that if all warrants were granted by justices of the peace rather than by sheriffs they would be very much easier to obtain than they are now?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I do not know whether that is so, and I do not think that I can comment on my hon. and learned Friend's point. However, I have already said that I find it extraordinary that the general view seems to be that there is something improper about going to a sheriff to obtain a warrant. That is wholly in accordance with our law. What surprises me is that south of the border, when Opposition Members were contemplating the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in relation to journalistic material, they sought to ensure that warrants were obtained from more senior judicial office holders rather than from lower ones.

Mr. Dewar: As the Solicitor-General said something rather sharp about the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) concerning sheriffs, will he take just a second to disassociate himself from the remarks made about justices of the peace by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn)? With hindsight, does the Solicitor-General not accept that there are lessons to be learned from the raid on the BBC premises? Was that not heavy-handed, coloured by political considerations and seen by many people as intimidatory in character? Does he agree that, in terms of the independence of the BBC, it is important that "The Secret Society" series of programmes should be screened as soon as possible?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The screening of the BBC's programmes "The Secret Society" is entirely a matter for the BBC. As my noble and learned Friend and I have already stated, all the material that the BBC requires for the screening of those programmes has been returned to it. The BBC accepts that fact. If, for some reason or other, the BBC chooses not to screen one or more of those programmes, that is its business. I do not accept that it was intimidatory. The hon. Gentleman first made those remarks when he had not even looked to see what the terms of the petition and the crave were.

On the first point that the hon. Gentleman raised, in relation to the granting of a warrant by justices of the peace, I accept that under particular statutes and, more generally, on occasions it is appropriate to go to justices of the peace. However, I dissent from the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that there is something improper or wrong about going to a sheriff. Where a procurator fiscal is involved, that would be the most appropriate course to take.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory non-reply to that question, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise this matter on the Adjournment.

Forensic Science Services

39. Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he expects to receive the report of the Crown Agents' working party on forensic science services in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It is expected that the report will be submitted to Ministers by late summer. Given the ever-increasing importance of forensic science in the successful detection and prosecution of crime, I await with interest the conclusions and recommendations of the Crown Agent's working party.

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that information. Can he say anything more about the focus of the working party's report? Will it concentrate on forensic science services in relation to drug offences or will it cover more general matters?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The working party will look at the arrangements for providing forensic science services in Scotland more generally. Clearly, with the increase in drug cases of which my hon. Friend is aware and concerned about, there has been some anxiety that there may be some delay. That matter is being examined as part of the working party's remit. However, I should like to emphasise that it is not a question of the standard or quality of the forensic scientists in Scotland. Rather it seeks to ensure that the provision is as adequately and satisfactorily provided as possible.

Dr. Godman: What part do the police surgeons play in the forensic science services? Is it not time that more women doctors were trained as police surgeons?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The specific matter of police surgeons is not part of the working party's considerations. However, I am aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) has given a parliamentary answer to the effect that although there are only a limited number of women police surgeons in Strathclyde, the Strathclyde police have taken steps to ensure that an additional number are acquired to assist in those sensitive cases in which it would be more appropriate for a woman doctor to undertake the examination.

Licensing Courts

40. Mr. Henderson asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions have been mounted in the last 10 years against councillors who sit on licensing courts despite their spouses being licence holders and who fail to declare an interest when speaking against approval of a licence from another establishment in the same town.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: There have been no such prosecutions under section 2 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. Such councillors are not disqualified by virtue of that section from acting as members of licensing boards or from taking part in proceedings before them.

Mr. Henderson: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his reply. However, does not that suggest that the position of licensing courts may be slightly different from other activities in local government? Will he bear this in mind when future legislation is considered to bring them into line, including cases in which a councillor may live with someone who is not their spouse, in another town?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Certainly the position under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 is different from that which obtains under the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, where, in the case of married persons living together, the interests of one spouse, if known to the other, shall be deemed for the purposes of the section also to be an interest of the other. However, as my hon. Friend will appreciate, any change in local government legislation or in licensing legislation would be for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State.

Sheriff Courts (Reckless Driving Charges)

41. Mr. Robin Cook asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he has any plans to review the role of sheriff courts in hearing charges of reckless driving resulting in a fatality; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Crown counsel carefully consider every case and decide, not only whether proceedings should be taken, but whether the case should be indicted in the High Court or the sheriff court.

Mr. Cook: Is the Solicitor-General aware that last year 601 people were killed on Scottish roads but that only two cases resulting in fatality were brought before the High Court? Will he acknowledge the widespread feeling in Scotland that this offence is not being treated with sufficient gravity by the Scottish courts? Will he take this opportunity to remind the courts that any legal proceedings arising from a fatality should be handled with dignity and respect for the feelings of the relatives of the victim?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I know that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that sentencing is not a matter for me. Following a recent meeting with him and a representative of the organisation SCID, I am aware of the concern that proper allocation of cases should take place, making sure where it is appropriate that they are heard in the High Court or before a sheriff and a jury. As I said then, that matter will be considered carefully by Crown counsel. I also said previously that steps will be taken to see what we can do to ensure that the parents and families of victims are dealt with sympathetically when cases come before the courts.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the application under Standing Order No. 20 first.

Westland plc (Share Transactions)

3.31 pm

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for an inquiry by the Director of Public Prosecutions into share transactions in Westland plc."

The matter is specific because it refers to share transactions at a particular point in time which determined the outcome of the Westland deal. It is important because the voting decision, influenced substantially by anonymous shareholders, determined the future shape and ownership of Britain's only helicopter manufacturer, with all the implications for defence. It is urgent, because the House cannot wait for normal processes to elapse before a Select Committee report is debated, which could take several months.

Two elements arise in the Select Committee report. The first is the long-term issue of legislation; and the second —my reason for raising the matter—is the question of illegality and criminality, on which urgent Government action is required. I refer the House to the evidence to the Select Committee given by Mr. Wills, a member of the Stock Exchange Council, when he said:

"it screams concert party to me", and to further written evidence from the Stock Exchange Council which stated "that they found it difficult to credit that overseas buyers should consider it worth their while to pay much more than what a company appeared to be worth without some collaboration with one or other of the parties involved."

I submit that the latter issue of illegality and conspiracy requires urgent action and investigation by the police. I had hoped that there would be a statement today to say that criminals had already been called in, but it seems that the Government are unwilling to treat the criminals in the City of London in the same manner as other criminals. In the face of a commercial mugging, the Government apparently want to do nothing. Because of that refusal to act, I submit that the House needs to debate this matter under its emergency procedure.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of disccussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for an inquiry by the Director of Public Prosecutions into share dealings in Westland plc."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Member has said, but I do not consider that the matter which he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20; therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

3.36 pm

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take Mr. Canavan first.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which concerns an abuse of the procedure for tabling ten-minute Bills.

On Monday 23 February I went up to the Public Bill Office, and while waiting I discoverd that the hon. Member for Fife, East (Mr. Henderson) was sitting there. He informed me that he was waiting with the intention of presenting a Bill the following day for presentation on 17 March. It will not have escaped the attention of the House that 17 March, as well as being St. Patrick's day, is Budget day. The hon. Gentleman is a PPS to a Treasury Minister.

On the following day, no motion appeared in the name of the hon. Gentleman, but a motion relating to the Airports (Discriminatory Charges) Bill appeared on the Order Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern), who, by coincidence, is also a PPS to a Treasury Minister.

If the events of last year are repeated, the motion will be withdrawn before Tuesday, thus allowing the Chancellor of the Exchequer a free run, and allowing him to kick off at 3.30 pm without interruption. It will then be too late for any hon. Members to fill the vacant slot.

What protection can you give, Mr. Speaker, to genuine Back Benchers against this abuse of the system, whereby Tory Cabinet Ministers are using their lackeys on a rota basis to outdo other hon. Members and put down bogus motions which they have no intention of moving? That is a dog-in-the-manger attitude, which deprives genuine Back Benchers of the limited time that is available for Private Members' business. I ask you to look into that.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the same point?

Mr. Marlow: No, Sir—a different point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I shall deal with one point at a time.

The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) has given notice of a motion under the ten-minute Bill procedure. I am informed that that is still on the Order Paper. The House will understand that I cannot look behind the notice of a motion and rule on the motives which may have caused the hon. Member to put it down.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The rules of the House must be obeyed. There are traditions in the House, which, with its long tradition, are of profound importance. There are certain areas in the House, are there not, Sir, where conversations that occur are meant to be private? Many of us were distressed to hear yesterday that conversations, in which comrades grabbed each other warmly by the throat, became public knowledge. Is it not an outrage that these friendly chats, which take place in the private areas such as the Tea Room or Annie's Bar, become public knowledge? Will you stop this abuse from occurring?

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Further to the point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not responsible for conversations in the tea rooms or outside this Chamber. I hope very much that the conventions and traditions of the House will be kept by hon. Members.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising out of questions. You will recollect that, about three weeks ago, a certain difficulty arose about a second Adjournment debate, for which I had applied, and there was a question of notice. On that occasion, Mr. Speaker, you said that you deprecated very much the fact that proper notice was not given.

Thinking that the business of the House would collapse yesterday, as, indeed, the Whips said that it might, I applied for a second Adjournment debate to give the Solicitor-General an opportunity to explain in detail the legal background on which he based his——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I heard the hon. Gentleman say that he would seek to raise this matter in an Adjournment debate. I know about his application for a second Adjournment debate yesterday, to which I agreed. It would have come on had the business of the House allowed. As it happened, the hon. Gentleman knows that the Northern Ireland order continued until 11.30 pm, which was its allotted time. There was nothing out of order in that. The hon. Gentleman must now try for another Adjournment debate, and he has already given notice that he will do so.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that I can help the hon. Gentleman. He correctly applied yesterday for an Adjournment debate, which was not reached. He says that he will apply again, and jolly good luck to him.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Are you satisfied about the extent of confidentiality of meetings held in the Committee Rooms of this building? You will be aware that there was a crisis meeting of the parliamentary Labour party in Room 14 this morning. Are you fully satisfied that such matters as, for example, the reported threatened resignation of the Leader of the Opposition at that meeting this morning cannot possibly be leaked or overheard during the conduct of such meetings in Committee Rooms? Are you prepared to look into this, Mr. Speaker, so that when the Labour party, or any other party, holds such a crisis meeting, the matters conducted in the privacy of such rooms are kept absolutely secure?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that crisis meetings are occasionally held in Room 14 on a Thursday. I read about them in the newspapers on Friday morning.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know that you have already said that what goes on in the Tea Room or anywhere else is not really a matter for you, but you have claimed to be a fair man and we have heard the reports from Conservative Members. I rise in the interests of party balance.

I happened to hear the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) on the radio the other day—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman, who is becoming an important figure in the House on procedure, must know that he must not refer to a matter that happened several days ago unless it happened in the Chamber or other areas of the House over which I have control; I have no responsibility for what is said on the radio.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman was repeating what he was alleged to have said in the precincts of the House — that he is fed up to the back teeth with his hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie)——

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: That was today.

Mr. Skinner: That is right.

—preaching to him and to other Tory Members about almost everything else under the sun. He said, "I am fed up to the back teeth with her telling me who I have got to take on holiday. I am fed up to the back teeth with her telling us about not smoking when she can't control her husband." Then he went on to attack the Prime Minister. That is an even better story. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have an important series of debates before us today and there is great pressure from hon. Members who want to speak in them. I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's questions. On grounds of balance I have heard him, but I cannot hear any more.

Mr. Marlow: On a completely different point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that on Monday night there was a particularly important debate about the regions which was shunted into a fairly short period. Three quarters of that time was taken up by Front Bench spokesmen. I was one of those who was fortunate enough to catch your eye, so I have no personal axe to grind. But my point is that the first speech, which came from the Liberal party, took something over 25 minutes. The second speech, which came from my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General, took a similar period. Then there was another speech from the Labour Front Bench that took a similar period.

Mr. Speaker, we have a divided Opposition. We know that the Labour party is poised on a precipice of terminal decline. We are not quite sure as to the potential fortunes of the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party. Surely in these circumstances and with a split Opposition, it is sufficient for one opposition party to put the Opposition case and then for a Minister to put the Government case — [Interruption.] — and then allow Back Benchers a proper time to speak. I stress the point that only 25 per cent. of the time in that important debate was allowed to Back Benchers. I was one of the fortunate Back Benchers, but on behalf of other hon. Members, I wonder whether you can comment on that, Mr. Speaker.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has raised a chivalrous point of order. I can tell the hon. Gentleman and the whole House that I am concerned about the time that is left for Back Benchers. The average Back Bencher will not speak more than four times in a Session—in a major debate. Last Session, thanks to the operation of the ten-minute limit, that number rose to six. However, I am very concerned about the time allowed for Back Benchers.

I frequently appeal to hon. Members to keep their speeches brief, and that especially applies to the debates that we are to have later today.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Am I not right in thinking that you have a responsibility to defend the dignity of the House and the dignity of hon. Members? When there is an attack upon the Father of the House, as there has been by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have already heard about things that happen in rooms over which I have no control. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) quite rightly said that we have conventions in this place, that conversations in tea rooms and dining rooms do not become public. I agree with that.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I refer you, to the strictures that you have often made in the House about the correct use of parliamentary language? I ask you to make a ruling on whether it is correct in parliamentary terms to talk about the ego and vanity of the Labour party as the leader of the Labour party did in a private Committee Room this morning. Is that parliamentary language?

Mr. Speaker: Ego and vanity have been perennial attributes in this place. Presentation of Bill.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to raise——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Just let me deal with the Presentation of a Bill.

BILL PRESENTED

PRESCRIPTIONS (SCOTLAND)

Mr. Michael Hirst, supported by Sir Alex Fletcher, Mr. Donald Stewart, Mr. Allan Stewart, Mr. Hugh D. Brown, Mr. Albert McQuarrie, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mr. James Wallace, Sir Hector Monro, Mr. Alexander Pollock and Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn, presented a Bill to amend Part I of the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time, upon Friday 3 April and to be printed [Bill 112.]

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to raise matters which have already been covered with regard to private conversations in the Tea Room. However, a point of order was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). The point is that the Father of the House was attacked in public, in Truro, by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who described the Father of the House — whom I regard with the same respect as you do, Mr. Speaker — as "an old man". Surely the right hon. Gentleman should come to the House and apologise to the Father of the House?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that that is unparliamentary. I consider myself to be an old man.

Coal Mining Subsidence

3.48 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to change the system of compensation for coal mining subsidence.

Mr. Speaker, Sir — [HON. MEMBERS: "Speak up."] I know that I have a loud voice and that it can be heard from the Committee Rooms upstairs. I also know that it can be heard from here in the Tea Room — or so I am told. That does not make any difference with regard to the bogus points of order that were raised not many moments ago.

As a lad, in 1944, I started work at the pit. At that time, the workings of the pit were very old fashioned and there was not much mechanisation then. Advances were made in the removal of coal from the coalface. However, the old-fashioned system was good in respect of mining subsidence. Former colliers who serve in the House understand—[Interruption.] I wish that you would close the mouths of those public schoolboys over there, Mr. Speaker. The only noise that I can hear is coming from across there.

At that time, there was a certain amount of packing underground behind where the coal had been taken out, and it supported the ground about it. The result was that the ground did not fall in too much. Then we had high mechanisation for increasing productivity. Indeed I was one of those who enjoyed larger wage packets, because it all went together. The trade union and the National Coal Board used to work together in the interests of safety, production and earnings, but that got worse as time went on. Following the mechanisation of the pits, there was no packing behind after the coal had been shifted, so we had total caving in when everything fell. It was even felt on the surface. We were told at the time that it would all fall together, but it did not. It fell unevenly, and many properties in the mining communities were seriously damaged.

There is a serious problem of mine subsidence in Ashfield. I am pleased that the Under-Secretary of State is here to listen to what I have to say about this serious problem, because the Government encourage people to buy their homes. If mine subsidence affects a local authority property, the tenant will have no financial problems because the local authority will carry out the repairs after negotiations with British Coal. But the home owner must take the initiative if he wants to carry out repairs and obtain compensation.

I remember the Widdicombe report, which dealt with people in that category, suggesting that there should be much more fairness in the system. What is happening is that British Coal, and the National Coal Board before it, has for some time been telling claimants that they are out of time and that they will obtain nothing. It is shameful. After all, the industry caused the problem and I, my constituents and other hon. Members' constituents believe that it is the board's responsibility to put it right. I understand that the Government will introduce a White Paper on the matter. I should have thought that they would have done so before I introduced this Bill, but they have decided not to release it until after the Bill has gone through, as I hope it will, this afternoon.

I know of umpteen cases of people who have been refused compensation to repair their homes because the board says that they are out of time. In the Nottinghamshire area, people were allowed to claim within 12 years following the ceasing of coal mining under their properties. Not long ago, the board shortened the period to six years. That reduction left people outside the limit, and now the board is telling people that they will obtain nothing. The Government should have made some representations to British Coal about the problem, bearing in mind the number of cases of which I, never mind other right hon. and hon. Members, have heard.

I have a whole file of cases which the Coal Board has refused. I can give two classic examples. There is a road in my constituency with about 100 properties on it. Claims on every one of those properties have been settled, except two, which have been refused. They were damaged at exactly the same time, but their owners are being told that they are out of time. That is one example of unfairness about claims. The other is an 82-year-old lady who, 10 years ago, made a claim to the board. The board said that it was no good settling because it was coming back. The result was that it did small repairs and, in the meantime, a new face was opened. The lady got in touch with me nine years and nine months after the board, after visiting her again, had told her that it would settle up. She got in touch with me because the board told her she was out of time. That is ridiculous. The board has already accepted liability.

All those claims should be settled in a proper manner. The board should accept its responsibilities and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy, on behalf of the Government, should be telling British Coal in no uncertain terms to get off its backside at Hobart house and get stuck in to sorting out the problems. I do not want to be running around my constituency doing the work of the Under-Secretary of State and British Coal. They are well paid. I hope that, following the Minister having listened to what I am trying to introduce today, the Coal-Mining (Subsidence) Act 1957 will be amended so that the problems can be sorted out and we will have a much fairer deal for the people that many mining Members of Parliament represent.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Frank Haynes, Mr. Ray Powell, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Jack Ashley, Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. Martin Redmond, Mr. Michael Welsh, Mr. Allen McKay and Mr. Terry Patchett.

Coal Mining Subsidence

Mr. Frank Haynes accordingly presented a Bill to change the system of compensation for coal mining subsidence: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 May and to be printed. [Bill III.]

ESTIMATES DAY

[1st Allotted Day] [1st Part] considered

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1986-87

Class VI, Vote I

Coal Industry (Grants)

[Relevant document: First Report from the Energy Committee (House of Commons Paper No. 165 of Session 1986-87.]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £166,300,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Department of Energy on assistance to the coal industry including grants to British Coal and payments to redundant workers.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

3.57 pm

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): I was a little surprised that the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), whose every word reaches its intended destination, should have risked referring to the analogy of caving. So fragile is the geological and political underground structure that I would have thought that he would have preferred not to do that today. However, without wishing to disparage the serious points of his speech, some of which are likely to be referred to during this debate, I wish him well with his Bill.

I should perhaps ask the House to retune from Radio 2 to Radio 3. We are about to consider a series of Supplementary Estimates which occupy a fairly thick volume. That, as we all know, has for long been a rather impractical obligation, so we are obliged to pick and choose the items of expenditure that we subject to close scrutiny. Today it is the item of some £166 million of further assistance to the British coal industry. That not inconsiderable sum is in itself noteworthy, for the coal industry has had and continues to have a gargantuan appetite for public funds.

Technically, it is usual to move a nominal reduction in the amount, and it would have given me greater pleasure to do that, for our ultimate objective must be the elimination of all public support for an industry which, in due course, and sooner or later, has to become completely self-sustaining. Alas, that would have been inconsistent with the general thrust of the report that my Committee, the Select Committee on Energy, has just made to the House on the coal industry. In it we argued that if financial provision is to be consistent with the consequences of policy, that provision should be increased from its already formidably high level. As that was the case, it seemed to my Committee that we were justified in seeking this opportunity to explain to the House precisely why we had reached what, at least for some of us, was an unpalatable conclusion. The coal industry will continue to demand and justify such consideration and analysis while it continues to make such a large claim on the nation's resources.

Before coming to my main points, I wish to make two general observations. First, I should like to thank all the members of my Committee, its Clerks and advisers, who laboured so diligently, travelled so far and argued with such conviction to produce the report. Whatever our knowledge of coal mining may have been — some members of the Committee had spent half a lifetime at least in the industry—our perspectives were widened. Those of us who saw a coal face or a longwall system in operation for the first time acquired a real respect for those who undertake that arduous, dirty, demanding and dangerous work. All of us were dismayed by the visible evidence of industrial dereliction and an almost tangible sense of despair in abandoned or declining coal mining areas. All were heartened by the sense of purpose and opportunity that new technology provided in mines both old and new.

Secondly, I should like to stress the general sense of disappointment over the highly selective and misleading way in which our conclusions were reported in some of the press, which seemed concerned only with those phrases or paragraphs in which the evidence that we received compelled us to reach conclusions critical of British Coal, the Government or the Secretary of State. It is not that we are unwilling to justify such conclusions, which came mostly from direct evidence rather than from our analysis or unchecked political prejudices. That is not the point. Such emphasis, however, detracts from the main analysis and conclusions of our report, which is but the tip of a very large iceberg of evidence.

I shall give the House but one example. The Daily Telegraph, referring to the Committee criticising the Coal Board for starting the 1985 pit strike, said:

"The . . . committee . . . united in a scathing attack on the handling of pit closures which led to the bitter year-long dispute."

Not so. Our emphasis was on all parties learning lessons and avoiding mistakes. There was no scathing attack. Our words, in paragraph 133, were:

"The 1985 strike was precipitated by the decision to bring forward the closure of Cortonwood colliery where the NCB was regarded by miners as having broken an earlier promise".

We say, in effect, "Avoid that in future if you can." We suggest attaching to that problem a notice saying, "Explosives: handle with care".

The press was also excited by the fact that the Committee was unable to agree all the analysis or conclusions. That, too, was incidental, for what we agreed was both substantial and significant, and provides a context in which the whole matter of current and future financial support for the coal industry can be judged. If the press seeks constantly to sensationalise Select Committee reports, it will trivialise them in the eyes of the public and Government. Governments of all parties, understandably, will react to the hostility of unfavourable press comments rather than the constructive analysis that such reports generally contain.

I do not ask the press to sugar the pill. What I ask is that it does not always coat it in cyanide when no cyanide is present. The system has strong critics, and some would gladly hasten its demise. It is my personal judgment that that would deprive the House, Government and the country of a valuable source of knowledge and objective policy appraisal.

So what did the Committee agree, as it is relevant to the Supplementary Estimate? I shall endeavour to summarise our main conclusions. First, after examining the market for coal—we realised that it is an immensely difficult task for all those who undertake it professionally—we agreed that the reduction of costs was critical and that it depended on three things: the continuing availability of large sums of capital; an adaptive and co-operative work force, which both sides of the Committee regarded as crucial; and the abandonment of those faces, seams and mines where, for one reason or another, the new management rules cannot be met. That was unanimous.

Secondly, we pointed out that major unresolved uncertainties dominated the industry's future and that the major uncertainty was "the extent to which, and the speed at which, it will be able to grasp the further economies that are undoubtedly available to it."

That was also unanimous.

Thirdly, we agreed that the price of coal must respond to market realities in a market that included not only competitive coal but competitive energy, which is perhaps even more significant.

Fourthly, we concluded that British Coal's cost level target of not more than £1 per gigajoule for new capacity will, in all probability, have to be moved downwards. That has the consequence that more collieries will be at risk and that there will be greater social risk of closure.

Fifthly, we concluded that the present plans will produce a net increase in deep-mined capacity of 8 million tonnes by the early 1990s and that there was no convincing evidence of increasing demand. We looked at that very carefully. That led inevitably to our main conclusion that capacity reduction would exceed 2 million tonnes per annum. From that followed our next conclusion that the industry would have to manage a controlled reduction in its work force, with predictably large effects on both British Coal's corporate finances and the Treasury's liabilities. I shall return to that subject.

We concluded that British Coal's capital would have to be restructured and that, in the light of that analysis, a deficit grant in the range of £100 million to £200 million per annum would not be adequate; nor would a provision of £300 million to £750 million for the continuation of the redundant mineworkers payment scheme, because, if our analysis is correct—I believe that we were justified in it—we expect a higher level of redundancies. That lengthy analysis culminated in our conclusion that the Government's policy was "not fully credible". It is important to emphasise that the difference between "credible" and "fully credible" is small but important.

A further unanimous conclusion of the utmost significance was that British Coal should not be asked to evaluate pit closure economics from a social standpoint, which, we argued, must be the responsibility of central Government. We made further suggestions about the organisation of that assistance and its scale, but pointed out that, whatever the present mismatch between resources and problems might be, a resolution of the problem would require in addition a commitment of energy, imagination and purpose. Those three qualities are not financial, but they are in equally short, if not shorter, supply.

All that was the unanimous view of the Committee. Where did we disagree? We disagreed on what were in my judgment—hon. Members may have a different scale of values—two minor issues and one major issue. The first minor issue was whether the French power supply by the cross-Channel link should be terminated to help bring demand and supply into balance. The second was whether the adoption of new mining techniques, which we all witnessed in the United States, would prejudice safety. On both, we understand but do not share our colleagues' reservations. Doubtless they will say something about that if they catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

[Sir Ian Lloyd]

The major disagreement was on a largely theoretical assertion of principle. The majority favoured the principle of opening the industry in due course, and in a marginal sense, to private mining. For the minority, that ran counter to deeply held political convictions. Nevertheless, the Committee's unanimous recommendation was:

"For the immediate future . . . BC should remain in the public sector."

One would not necessarily have judged that from some of the press reports. Obviously, there is no realistic prospect of a substantial supply of privately mined coal in the United Kingdom this century.

I shall now return to finance. Despite all the encouraging progress in the industry—and it is indeed encouraging—we are staring at an alarming slough of despond. If capital investment is included, the net cost to the taxpayer of coal mining in the United Kingdom was over £1·6 billion in 1984-85; well over £2·1 billion 1985-86, the strike year; still over £2 billion in 1986-87, and likely to remain there this year if the estimate is passed.

Inflation and all sorts of other things have produced an age in which large figures followed by noughts have almost ceased to have meaning. The net cost to the taxpayer of coal mining in the United Kingdom represents about £40 per head per annum for every man, woman and child in the country, or about £160 per annum per family. The total loans to the coal mining industry amount to £77 per head of population, or £308 per family. That helps to put the figures into perspective.

The achievement of true viability will require a turnaround of some £1·8 billion on a turnover of £5 billion. Despite truly remarkable progress since the strike, that remains a formidable challenge. It will not be met unless two things happen. The first is that the present rate of progress must be sustained and, if possible, accelerated. Secondly, there must be confidence within the industry and the coal mining communities that the social costs will be fairly assessed and generously provided. In saying that, I do not for one moment wish it to be inferred that I do not believe that the scale of provision has been very generous.

However defined, this is a colossal burden, but if, as has been argued, the yoke of support can be lifted, if the cost of that relief is a small further increase in a very large sum and if that will supply both the confidence and the resources required to achieve a final and permanent turnaround of this very expensive industry, then we must find the resources to do the job. I believe that that is the unanimous view of the Committee. Failure will leave the British people with this massive subsidy burden in perpetuity.

The acceptance of that burden would imply that British Coal should become a permanent section, not of the Department of Energy but of the Department of Health and Social Security. That would be the reality. It would be as painful as it is unnecessary. It would establish an alarming and most dangerous and controversial precedent. Today coal: tomorrow, who knows what? On what grounds would a Government be able to discriminate if they once accepted the principle that one industry, because of its economic position, its political clout or the social consequences of its decline, should become a perpetual pensioner of the state? There is no answer to that question, and that should be our warning.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I am pleased to speak in this debate, which will be short. I should like hon. Members to reflect on the fact that the Select Committee on Energy has had time away from the miners' strike to consider the arguments that were made at the time of the strike. It was with some disappointment that I left the Select Committee just as it was about to turn to that subject and to draw up the report that we are debating. I read with great interest one or two sections of the report that relate directly to that 12 months from March 1984 to March 1985 that will be remembered, perhaps for ever, or while there is a British mining industry.

I should like to examine the conclusions of the report about things that happened during that strike. The first matter is the colliery review procedure. I am sure that many people will know that trade unions in the mining industry argued that that procedure should have been introduced before the strike. The strike was sparked off at a colliery in south Yorkshire in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy). Hon. Members will be aware that if the review procedure had been in place the strike might never have happened.

During the strike, a colliery review procedure was introduced and the trade unions said that they did not believe it went all the way towards settling the problems in mining communities that were threatened by closure. This report says little different from what the unions said then. If the case that British Coal put throughout the strike was as good as the Coal Board said it was, then by now, away from the emotion of that strike and what was happening in the British coalfields, we should be able to say that one side was right and the other side was wrong.

The report says that due weight should be given to decisions. Two colliery group procedural reports on two working collieries, Bates colliery in Northumberland and Cadeby colliery in south Yorkshire, have found that those coal mines should have remained open. However, the colliery review procedure did not give that due weight before and during the strike.

The other interesting sector of this report is in relation to what should happen about closures. The hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) mentioned two things that had struck him when his Committee was taking evidence. One of them was about what happens at the coal face. He said that many members of the Committee saw for the first time working conditions underground. I should like to pull the memories of hon. Members back to the phrase that the hon. Gentleman used. He spoke of the despair in the British coalfields about the decline in the industry and the scars created by that decline. That is certainly not new and has not happened just since 1984. Perhaps one of the major causes of the miners' strike was that nothing was put in the place of coal mines that were closed.

Government Members have spoken many times since the strike about the decline in the coalfields, but the Government have done little to bring jobs to those areas. British Coal Enterprise Ltd. is expanding and I am pleased about that, but a very small number of jobs are being created to replace the ones that have been lost, even in the last two years. One of the most interesting parts of the report is its references to the economic decisions that British Coal has to take before closing a coal mine.

Social cost is the nub of what the miners' strike was about. Mining communities have been arguing about this not just for one or two years, or since the strike, but for decades. They argue about the economic consequences of colliery closures and about how decisions are reached. I am pleased that the Select Committee decided to look into this in some detail. The Committee concluded that social costs should be part and parcel of colliery closures in the colliery review procedure, and should be a major part of the economic equation when deciding whether mines should be closed. I would have liked to see the Committee go further than that, but even that is welcome. However, at least the Committee looked into the matter.

In paragraph 131, the report says:

"although BC should be allowed to continue making decisions on pit closures on commercial grounds after a thorough and comprehensive review of the decision with other interested bodies, this should be done in the closest consultation with Government departments. If the macro-economic and social disbenefits of the policies of the management of a strategic industry like coal outweigh the benefits to society of those policies, then it is the job of government to right the balance by fiscal or other means."

It is my contention that that has never been the practice. That is why we had the miners' strike, which was all about the gap that is left when coal mines are closed. It was a lot easier in the 1960s, when employment prospects were so much better. At that time, people were not worried about redundancy or lack of job prospects. However, in the 1980s — especially the past eight years under this Government — there has been a massive increase in unemployment and obviously a decrease in job opportunities, especially for young people. Under those circumstances, it is part and parcel that any decisions on closures should be taken in consultation with Government Departments. I am afraid that the Committee's recommendation is not as strong as I had hoped.

Paragraph 133 of the report states:

"the board must recognise the special vulnerability of mining communities which we outlined in the introduction of this report, and must take local authorities" into account. British Coal was a massive ratepayer to my local authority. It put tens of thousands of pounds into the local authority each year. The rundown of the coal mining industry in south Yorkshire, together with the accumulated cut in rate support grant, has meant that the local authority had to cut services in many areas. Thus the rundown of the coal mines has had an effect not just on coal mining families but on everyone throughout the community. That should be taken into account.

The Select Committee recommends

"that a special ministerial Cabinet Committee be set up and charged with this task—cabinet committees have been set up for many less urgent tasks in the past".

The task in question is the rundown of the British coal mining industry and its effect on regions and communities. I believe that that is one of the major conclusions from the report. The rundown of the industry affects the lives of thousands of people who work in the coal mines or who live in coal mining areas but are not directly employed in the mines. I hope that the Minister will spend a few minutes discussing that recommendation.

I do not intend to discuss the work practices in America. Those practices have been the subject of ample discussion in the House and in the Standing Committee on the Coal Industry Act of which I was a member. One of the most urgent matters for consideration relates to the new grant for coal conversion schemes. That grant is supposed to finish in April this year. The scheme represented a lifeline to the coal industry because it created new markets for coal, especially in industry.

The sad part about the ending of the scheme is that the grant has never been made available to the public sector. Paragraph 44 of the report contains an important recommendation:

"not only . . . that the Government reconsider its policy of discontinuing the coal firing grant, but that the scheme should be extended to the public sector so that hospitals, schools, swimming pools and other potential coal users can be aided in converting their old boiler stock to burning British coal."

A great deal of research has been carried out at Stoke Orchard by British Coal, as well as by the manufacturers of boiler equipment to ensure that coal is clean burn and easily usable and also to improve storage facilities. As a result, less work is involved in keeping the boilers going. The Government's failure to extend the scheme to the public sector is a sad judgment on the Coal Board and those in the industry who have been working to perfect the use of coal in boilers. I hope that the Minister will tell us what will happen in April.

Many hon. Members, on both sides of the House, believe that it is wrong to discontinue the grant on the basis of the recent drop in oil prices. Such a position may alter. Although I accept that the take-up of coal has reduced because of the oil price drop, to discontinue the coal-firing grant to all sectors is a disservice to the community. I hope that the Minister will consider the recommendations in the report.

I do not wish to go into great detail on the Select Committee report as I believe that other hon. Members will have the opportunity to discuss the different aspects of it. It is a wide-ranging report—indeed, we could talk all day about it.

The most important thing that we must do is to look after the well-being of the coal communities. That care has not been given for many years. It behoves us all to take cognisance of the paragraphs that I have mentioned—they are not as strongly worded as I would have liked—and to ensure that a Cabinet Committee or something similar is set up. I hope that such a Committee offers not merely words to the communities but action and grants to create job opportunities. Those opportunities are badly needed throughout British coalfields.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I could not miss the opportunity to pay tribute to all those who work in the coal industry for achieving present productivity records that would have been considered unobtainable only 12 months ago.

The productivity increase of 23 per cent. in the past year is unmatched by any other industry, giving us unprecedented national levels of production, at over 3·68 tonnes per man shift. In my constituency of Sherwood, a productivity level of 5 tonnes per man shift has been reached. Those levels meet the objectives of the Select Committee report. The results ensure that the operating costs for this year will be 20 per cent. lower, in real terms, than they were before the damaging industrial dispute. They give us a guarantee of long-term success in the future.

Only last week, the chairman of British Coal announced that we are now the lowest cost producers in Western Europe, and that West Germany is our nearest rival with 75 per cent. higher costs. The Coal Board has now recognised the need for competitive prices in relation to other energy suppliers. Therefore, it has reduced the cost of coal to the Central Electricity Generating Board by £4 per tonne. That has cut its sales realisation by £400 million, but it has meant that industrial manufacturers have found that their energy unit costs will be frozen once again. That will give manufacturers the opportunity to be successful against their international competitors.

British Coal hopes to contain its loss this year to £300 million. That shows that, without the dramatic cuts in oil prices, British Coal would actually have shown an operational profit of £100 million this year. There is no doubt in my mind that oil prices will rise rather than remain at their current level for any considerable time. That ensures and endorses my optimism in the future of the coal industry.

Nine major industrial companies share my confidence, since in the space of eight months they will confirm their proposal to convert to coal. In the light of that, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider the continuation of the 25 per cent. grant for conversions of coal boilers for industrial use. Perhaps he would be persuaded if he knew that the recent proposals by the nine industrial manufacturers will result in the security of 1,200 jobs in the coal industry and many more in other industries as the conversion to coal will result in £90 million investment in British-made boilers and plant technology.

In addition, British Coal has recently placed orders with British manufacturers for contracts to the value of £50 million, including £1·5 million for safety boots and shoes. On my recent visit to Bilston Glen in the constituency of the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) I discovered that Scottish boots are better than those issued in Nottinghamshire. If we had better boots, I wonder whether our productivity would rise even further.

We must not forget that industry is not the only sector to benefit from lower costs. In the weeks of severe weather during the winter, much concern was voiced for our elderly citizens, and it is important to note that frozen electricity prices will give much benefit to them as well as to other private consumers.

The National Health Service will also find the current prices advantageous, since British Coal is to continue to supply some 200 NHS hospitals. Energy requirements are high and it is vital that there is economy of use and strict cost control.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): Would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on the use of imported coal by the NHS in hospitals in Yorkshire rather than British coal, to which the hon. Gentleman has been referring?

Mr. Stewart: I cannot comment on what is happening in Yorkshire. I have a big enough job commenting on matters relating to my constituency, which is the largest coal producer in Britain. There are 200 hospitals in Britain using British coal. This will save the NHS well over £2 million, which will be used for other patient care. If Yorkshire hospitals are using foreign coal, it is for the hon. Members who represent those areas to raise the matter with my hon. Friend the Minister.

I have illustrated the benefits that we all enjoy as a result of a successful coal industry, not only for consumers but for those who work in British Coal. Their financial rewards are complemented by the knowledge that they are enhancing job opportunities for others in the community. I am convinced that, if at the end of the coal dispute a certain political persuasion had prevailed over the miners in this country, electricity prices today would be at least 30 per cent. higher, with all the serious repercussions to the economy that that involves. Today's Estimates would not only be higher but would be totally unacceptable to the House.

The miners have demonstrated the way forward for the industry into the next century via the actions of the Union of Democratic Mineworkers and recently by the actions of the Welsh miners, accepting in principle 18 coaling shifts a week. They recognise that the £5 billion of capital investment in the mines must be utilised effectively. However, there is concern that localised stoppages lost British Coal 700,000 tonnes of coal last year. Surely the example set by the UDM and the Welsh miners is the way forward.

I strongly repudiate the Select Committee's view that there is uncertain long-term demand and its belief that structural change towards higher productivity and lower costs have some way further to run. I recognise that much of the report was written before this new era of prosperity for the coal industry had arrived. Nevertheless, the Select Committee introduced an element of doubt, quite unnecessarily. I want my hon. Friend the Minister to show his confidence to those who have brought such benefits to this country by ensuring that the CEGB places its new coal-fired boilers in position as soon as possible. We have a site in Nottinghamshire; the planning permission needs only to be resurrected; the coal is there; the infrastructure is ready; and the UDM will make it work. We need positive action now.

Those who work in the coal indusry have so far recognised the personal commitment that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy has given to the industry's future by his positive actions. The industry's excellent condition is a sign of his success. The future for coal is guaranteed not by wishful thinking but by the positive action of those who work in the industry. Scientific knowledge shows that coal will replace other finite fuels in years to come. We must ensure that the industry is ready to meet that demand. Today's Estimates show that British Coal is heading in the right direction.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I think that hon. Members agree that, despite the difficulties facing the British coal industry, it is more robust than many people would have thought even a year ago. The Minister will not be surprised to hear that, although the alliance was rightly critical of the way in which the strike was conducted, it agrees that elements within the coalmining industry which were destructive to its future had to be defeated. They have been defeated and, therefore, the climate is much more favourable. We look to the Government to give British Coal the maximum following wind.

The Select Committee did a good job and, although there clearly were divisions, it managed to reflect in its report the genuine difficulties and dichotomy in the industry and the choices that must be made. Coal is a major resource for the United Kingdom and will be for generations to come. It is a strategic resource and therefore requires strategic forward planning. As the Select Committee acknowledged, it cannot simply be left to the whim of market forces. The Committee said that to differentiate between simple planning and simple market forces is, by definition, to take a simplistic view of the coal industry. The Committee did a good job in identifying that.

The Government face choices with serious implications which must be taken fully into account. The most immediate one is obviously the future of generating capacity in the United Kingdom. Recently, the House debated the possibility of building Sizewell B. It would be foolish in the context of this debate to suggest that the building of Sizewell B and of a range of PWRs, which is clearly what the CEGB wants, will not have significant effects on the coal industry, just as any commitment to pull back nuclear capacity would have significant implications, in the other direction, for the coal industry. As the Committee rightly pointed out, this action cannot be taken in the short term because the industry cannot respond in the short term to such changes.

The circumstances and competitiveness of coal have changed substantially in recent months. Of course, this is only a short-term change — we do not know the long-term implications. Simple economics suggest that coal as a source of generating capacity looks very much more competitive than it did six or 12 months ago. The coal versus nuclear debate is not entirely realistic. I think that most hon. Members recognise that, even if the emphasis shifts, there will be a significant nuclear capacity and a coal-burn capacity for a long time to come. It is not clear what the real costs will be. The nuclear industry must take on board many significant changes concerning safety, which could seriously affect its costs. By contrast, the coal industry must take on board environmental protection from flue pollution, and costs are associated with that.

Reference has been made to the world market for coal, but the House should treat that with a little caution. The concept of a world market for coal is misleading. I understand that only 4 per cent. of world steam coal is traded and that, in polite parlance, this is known as overflow coal. Many of us would regard it as dumped coal. That is not a realistic point. But the comparative costs of producing the coal, most of which is traded domestically rather than internationally, are realistic.

I tried to find out from British Coal the extent to which it thought that it was faced with unfair competition. Although it was aware that certain countries such as South Africa and South America were said to be unfair — I have strong reservations for political reasons about whether we should trade in coal with South Africa — British Coal believed that there was insufficient evidence to be satisfied that competition was fair in regard to Polish coal. Poland is desperate for foreign currency and we cannot be confident that the price of Polish coal reflects the cost of its production. British Coal believes that in that context it is subject to unfair competition. The Government should investigate that to the extent that it is possible.

The other problem that affects coal and other energy commodities is the exchange rate. It was pointed out to me that the change in the value of the pound in recent months has affected adversely — by £3 a tonne — the competitiveness of British Coal. Given that coal is priced in dollars, the coal industry regards an exchange rate of about $1·40 as more congenial than the rate for the last few months.

As an aside — but an important aside because Ministers know that my colleagues and I have made the point frequently — I suggest that the argument that we cannot build a significant number of power stations based on too great a dependence on one fuel should be countered by moving much more rapidly into alternative energy sources.

I draw to the Minister's attention a report from the British Wind Energy Association. No doubt the Minister has seen it because it came out at the end of January. It claims that the experience of wind energy, which regrettably has been used more outside this country, particularly in California, than inside it, has proved that it is as cheap, if not cheaper, than other forms of power generation. The cost is as low as 2p per unit compared with 3p for most other forms of energy. As much of the technology associated with wind energy is British, we should be going further and faster in that direction.

Another sphere in which the coal industry needs to improve its competitiveness, and where the Government have a role to try to ensure that, is research into new methods of coal combustion. Clearly there is potential there. Benefits are being achieved but more resources could produce greater benefits faster. That would alter substantially the ability of the coal industry to compete. Given its constrained resources and its deficit financing, there is evidence that that area is underfunded.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) referred to the phasing out of allowances for conversion to coal which the Government are suspending in June. The House should ask why this is so, what will follow and whether the Government are prepared to consider extending the scheme or introducing an alternative scheme which would extend to the public sector the option for conversion. Paragraph 44 of the report refers specifically to that and is worthy of being put on the record. It states:

"We not only recommend that the Government reconsider its policy of discontinuing the coal firing grant, but that the scheme should be extended to the public sector".

I ask the Minister to address himself to that in his reply. It would help the coal industry significantly and would be a legitimate way of giving an invigorated coal industry more help when it most needs it. It would also benefit the users and consumers of energy.

The Select Committee recognises, and I think the Government recognise, that our coal resources should be accepted as a strategic long-term asset which will require Government involvement at least for the time being. The House may be divided about how long that involvement should continue, but Government responsibility is clear. They must ensure that long-term considerations triumph over short-term pressures and that the coal industry is adequately funded. They have a responsibility to coalfield communities which are facing such painful readjustments. Many such communities need substantial investment to improve the environment and to be promoted as attractive areas. The dereliction of many of these areas does not make them attractive for alternative investment and they need resources to enable them to respond.

The House is pleased that there is a more positive frame of mind and a more positive attitude within the coal industry. It believes that the Government have a duty to give the coal industry proper and adequate support and to recognise that, whatever their medium to long-term objectives, right now they must give coal a realistic and positive chance to compete effectively and to provide the nation with the proper energy mix which it deserves and expects.

4.45 pm

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): I enjoyed the constructive contribution by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). I agree with much of what he said. I was surprised to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) say that our report perhaps painted too pessimistic a picture of the future market for coal. I suggest to him that he should reconsider the report because there is a great deal more in the small print than the media have picked out.

We made a detailed analysis and took a great deal of evidence about the future range of the market. My conclusion was that we drew an optimistic picture of the future of the British coal industry, provided that it accepts a more realistic market climate and provided that the enormous progress in greater efficiency continues. That more realistic assessment of the industry came through strongly in the report. We took account of the latest developments and found them most encouraging. We acknowledged the success of the industry, the fact that management was able to manage, and the more constructive support from the miners themselves.

Certainly we acknowledged in the report the long-term importance of the coal industry. Indeed, if anything, we over-emphasised it, in that we believed that our coal resources have not been fully exploited and that the coal industry has not had the opportunity to develop as some of us believe it could have developed. The industry has not made the contribution to the economy or benefited consumers or those who work in it to the full extent of its potential. That was why as part of the inquiry we examined the structure of the industry. For example, we considered whether it was time to look again at the statutory constraints of the original nationalisation legislation passed in 1946. We came to some conclusions about that.

I hold the strong view that the coal industry need not necessarily and exclusively be within the nationalised sector. I support the main recommendation of the Select Committee that for the immediate future the industry should stay within the nationalised sector, but that does not mean that we should not at the same time stimulate and encourage the evolution and development of a private sector coal industry. The majority view was that the nationalised sector would benefit from the development of a little more competition from the private sector and from the participation, on a partnership basis, of private investment.

I maintain that if the Government's policy is to promote competition, private enterprise, employee share ownership, incentives and motivation, and to improve industrial relations—which I accept has been successfully pursued by the Government in the rest of its privatisation programme—surely, if that policy applies to Jaguar, British Aerospace, British Airways, British Telecom and so on, it should apply to the coal industry. The privatised coal and gas industries are successful. The electricity industry is no longer a state monopoly. The Energy Act 1983 freed the private sector to develop in competition with the nationalised industry. Why has British Gas been privatised? It is because the Government believe that that privatised industry, as with other privatised industries, will better serve the consumer, will give a better deal to those who work in the industry and will benefit the economy. Let us at least hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will look seriously at the constructive proposals in the report about restructuring the statutory framework.

In particular, the Select Committee cannot understand why the licensing of the private sector coal industry—such as it is allowed to exist—should continue to be under the patronage of British Coal. We believe that it should be within the power of the Department of Energy to issue licences, in the same way that it issues licences to the oil and gas industries. Moreover, we cannot see how one can justify the limited private sector that is allowed to exist having to pay royalties to British Coal. If royalties are to be paid, they should be paid by all coal producers—nationalised and private—to the Treasury. The limited and restrained private sector should not, in addition to having to obtain a licence from British Coal, have to pay royalties to its main monopoly competitor. The majority recommended that the present restrictions on private operators should be lifted.

I shall give one example of my experience. I apologise to hon. Members who may have heard it before, but it does not hurt to repeat it. One or two of the Select Committee members visited a private deep mine in Stoke. The company wants to operate two or three shifts in 24 hours to make the operation more viable. It cannot operate more than one shift because it is restricted to employing only 30 people. It is not viable to operate more than one shift in that mine unless the company is allowed to employ more than 30 miners. Meanwhile, ex-British Coal miners have been made redundant. They are willing and able and want jobs in the private sector, but cannot be employed. Thirty or 60 potential jobs are going begging in that area. Extra coal production at lower cost is being frustrated. That is just one of many examples. It seems to be economic Luddism of the sort that one would perhaps expect the Labour party to continue to encourage.

I hope that my hon. Friends will agree that that is not the sort of policy that we would expect this Government, of all Governments, to continue to promote. The Government are doing nearly all that they can to encourage private enterprise, the growth of the economy and job creation. That is just one example of how, if restraints were removed, the private sector could expand — modestly but constructively — and provide some competition to British Coal. It would help the consumer because it would offer an alternative source of production and would certainly help to lower coal prices.

There is a further example. The Select Committee recommended that if the British coal industry is to remain nationalised, we must encourage private investment. Again, it seems illogical for this Government, of all Governments, to continue to support a situation in which private British mining expertise must go abroad to invest in the coal industry because our legislation prohibits it from participating in the British coal industry. However, we know that, despite the enormous resources that the Government are injecting and have injected for new capital investment in the nationalised industry, it is still not enough and more could be provided.

New coal fields could be developed more quickly and more economically if the private sector—coal mining enterprises that have expertise that, at the moment, they must use abroad to create jobs and wealth abroad—could contribute to the British coal industry. I urge my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to take that recommendation seriously.

No hon. Member—least of all myself—would argue other than that the coal industry is absolutely central to our future energy means. Indeed, we have the only major coal industry in Western Europe. We could play a bigger role in exporting coal to European countries, as we did many years ago, if we could only make our industry more competitive. We could expand production. It is short-sighted to hold back the industry by restraining it exclusively within the nationalised monopoly.

Let us remove some of the restraints, liberate the industry, let private enterprise play a partnership role, and let the private sector develop alongside the nationalised industry so that we can genuinely reap some of the advantages that this enormous resource could provide. The extra competition that it could create would help energy prices, the industry, the consumer, and, therefore, the whole economy. It would certainly benefit those who work in the industry. They would have an alternative source of employment. It would help the viability of jobs in the longer term because the industry would be given an opportunity to expand and to meet its full potential.

4.57 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I listened carefully to the speech by the hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd), who introduced the report of the Select Committee. He began his remarks by stating that we cannot have a coal mining industry that has to be subsidised. He used words such as gargantuan. He gave the clear impression that the coal industry, of all industries in Britain, is using taxpayers' money. It comes very ill from Tories to attack the coal mining industry for being subsidised to some degree when, only in the past few weeks, they wrote off £750 million for the Rover Group. Hon. Members must not get me wrong. I am not against the write-off of the £750 million. I know that it means jobs in the midlands and in other parts of the British Isles. I know that workers risk being thrown on the scrap heap. I know that they must call at the employment exchange and the jobcentre and that they must receive taxpayers' money from another source. It has never made sense to me to say, "Get rid of the subsidies. We want more people on the dole." Tories do not say that, but that is roughly what they are talking about. It is monetarism gone mad.

I want to dispose of the argument that we should assume in this debate that only the mining industry has had Government subsidies since the end of the second world war. When the hon. Member for Havant was supporting the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—I do not think that he supports him now—when he was the Prime Minister of the day, many hon. Members will recall that one day the right hon. Gentleman came along to the House and said, "Oh, by the way"—I do not think he used quite these words but this is what he meant—"Rolls-Royce has gone bankrupt. I'm afraid we shall have to subsidise it, chaps." The Tories trooped through the Lobby to support the right hon. Gentleman. Some of them tried to escape. Some of the purists said, "I'm a monetarist. I'll have nowt to do with this." So some of them disappeared—but not many.

We on these Benches stayed behind that night because we thought that that was not a bad idea. A lot of jobs were affected in Derby, the midlands, Scotland and north-west Lancashire. We said that we would save those jobs, because we believed that if private enterprise could not do the job we should have to get Rolls-Royce into the public sector—and sharp. So let us have none of that nonsense about only the mining industry being subsidised.

Not so long ago the Government handed over roughly £5 million to Murdoch of the Wapping press so that he could go down into the enterprise zone. Was that a proper use of taxpayers' money? Was it right to hand over £5 million to Murdoch, who has made £50 million out of The Sun and invested it in Hollywood films? Was it right to hand over taxpayers' money to Murdoch to slag off the Government with the News of the World publication about Peter Archer and Victoria station? It is bizarre, but it was taxpayers' money. [Interruption.] I apologise; I should have said Jeffrey Archer. Let us get that straight.

Is it not bizarre to say that we cannot subsidise people's jobs? Fancy Members of Parliament saying that we cannot subsidise people's jobs. This place would close down tomorrow without taxpayers' money. The Prime Minister often refers to the next door neighbour as the one we collect the taxes from. Not so long ago on television she said, "Remember that the taxpayer is your next door neighbour." I wonder what would be the result of one of those clever opinion polls—or perhaps a real opinion poll—if people were asked, "Who do you think you ought to subsidise—miners or MPs?" It would be dodgy.

Sir Ian Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman would be out of a job.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman says that I would be out of a job. The reason I understand his argument is because I do not want miners, steel workers, railwaymen, social workers and the hundreds of thousands who ought to be working in local government to be sacked. So let us have no more of that nonsense. The hon. Gentleman was one of those who cheered his Front Bench when they handed over £100 million to save Johnson Matthey Bankers—a big, fat subsidy. There has been no Select Committee. No hon. Member has got up and said, "Let's have a Select Committee to see whether the £100 million that was handed over to Johnson Matthey Bankers was well spent." No, of course not. There was no Select Committee on that, or even on the tax relief that the banks get.

Why are the Tories not complaining? The National Westminster Bank will shortly produce profits amounting to more than £1 billion, to be followed by Barclays Bank. They are friends. When I was looking at the small print I wondered how they had made all that money. It says that £160 million is being written off the National Westminster Bank's accounts because it is not going to pay tax; it has been put down to bad debts. Bad debts? So the British taxpayer—the next door neighbour that the Prime Minister talks about—is ladling out £160 million to the National Westminster Bank so that it can write off bad debts in this country and abroad.

If it had not been a Scottish Bill that was discussed yesterday, I should have raised the issue on that debtors Bill. But that is enough of that. Let us have no more talk about subsidies being paid only to the coal industry, especially when the Prime Minister has caused the cost of running 10 Downing Street to rise from £1·3 million in 1979 to more than £5 million now. She can talk about subsidies! She has caused the running costs of 10 Downing street to rise by up to 300 per cent.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Skinner: Only very briefly, because my hon. Friends want to speak.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman fails to point out that in respect of the accounts for No. 10 there is a new accounting practice that includes counting as the costs of No. 10 the costs of other Departments. That was not formerly the case.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman means that the Prime Minister became so wary of these other Departments that she decided to have a foreign affairs adviser and another kind of adviser in No. 10. Why? She also has Bernard Ingham and his staff there, full time. The result is that No. 10 is costing the taxpayer—the next door neighbour taxpayer—300 per cent. more under the Prime Minister's administration than it cost under Uncle Jim Callaghan's—the man who has a book coming out very shortly, they tell me, but I do not want to advertise that fact.

I see that the Select Committee has dealt with the effects of nuclear power and with the side issue of a smaller work force and less production in the mining industry. Those who believe that the way forward is nuclear power must bear in mind that the cost is met by the taxpayer via the Ministry of Defence, but that cost is never calculated. I know that my hon. Friends will take up with zeal the point that the next Select Committee on Energy should consider how much taxpayers' money is going into the nuclear power industry.

I am pleased that my hon. Friends who served on the Select Committee divided the Committee on this issue. Many hon. Members know that I am not keen on Select Committees. They tend to be very sloppy, consensus-type Committees. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) decided, along with his two colleagues, to oppose certain measures and recommendations. I applaud them for doing so. They managed to drag themselves away from the idea that they are all pals together, waltzing down the yellow brick road.

The Select Committee said that the coal mining industry cannot be privatised until the year 2000. I thought that that was rather surprising, when one considers some of the hon. Members who serve on the Select Committee. Therefore, I wondered whether it was possible that some of them had mining experience and whether they had been able to influence the Committee to a far greater degree than is usual. I agree with my hon. Friends that there should be no privatisation. That is why the Committee was divided. We have only to consider what happened in the mining industry before the war when it was privatised and to listen to the old people who are still around. They would tell us.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): And so would some hon. Members.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend says that some hon. Members would also be able to tell that story. I went into the industry in 1949, after nationalisation. They could tell us what happened under privatisation. The safety standards were abysmal.

Mr. Lofthouse: They were shocking.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend says that they were shocking. He went through it. The owners did not care about life and limb. That is what would happen in future if the mines were privatised. We want no more nonsense about privatisation being the salvation of the mining industry, because it would result in more deaths and injuries than in any other British industry.

What else would it do? Those who have worked in the pits know the answer. The owners would immediately say, "Here's a nice easy seam, only 300 yards down." But looking at a coal mine a real planner would say, "If we are to maximise the output in this coal mine, we must think about the seam that is 400 yards down, and the next one that is 800 yards down, if we are sensibly to extract from the earth what has lain there for thousands of years."

Privatisation would mean easy profit and easy killings. The attitude would be, "Let us mine what we can get hold of first and to hell with all the rest of it." There would be exploitation, but a lot of coal would be lost for ever. Safety standards would fall and easy seams would be taken on.

As my hon. Friends know, we in the mining industry have had to fight for compensation for colleagues who have been injured and for widows of colleagues who have been killed. One can just imagine how, in this new, privatised, monetarist world, attempts would be made to get rid of trade unions—those which have represented the miners over the years—altogether. Imagine what paradise that would be for the lawyers——

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Skinner: No. My hon. Friends must have a chance to speak because they served on the Committee.

If the mining industry were privatised, there would be more casualties and longer hours——

Mr. Brown rose——

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman threatened to pack in his seat if it was decided to go ahead with the dumping of nuclear waste on his back doorstep. The threat is still hanging over his constituency, but he is still here. I would be more inclined to give way to him if he showed a bit of principle for a change but, like his hon. Friends, he does not.

There would be longer hours in the new privatised mining world. What else would ensue? More people would be on the dole, and more youngsters on tin-pot youth training and other Thatcher-devised slave labour schemes. In addition, more South African coal would pour into the country to service hospitals. Indeed, some South African coal is already going into Nottinghamshire and depriving Nottinghamshire miners of their jobs. [Interruption.] Some members of the UDM have said that that is happening, and, incredibly enough, they supported a motion that I tabled a few weeks ago. South African coal would be cheap to begin with, but once South Africa had seized the coal market it would call the price, as did the oil industry in the 1950s and 1960s. There would be no more nuclear power.

The report also recommends the allocation of an additional £166 million for the coal mining industry. The hon. Member for Havant said that that was a gargantuan amount, but I do not believe that. I would support the proposals more readily if I knew that more money was to be allocated on top of that to ensure that those who live in Coal Board houses and who are being preyed on by the speculators could live in better conditions. More money should be allocated to further the cause of those of us in this House who since 1970 have represented the pre-1968 miners who are still doing without concessionary coal. Why does not the Minister get stuck into that? There are not many left in the country; a few in Lancashire, a few in Derbyshire and a few in other coalfields. We should make sure that those people — widows and ex-miners who were made redundant—are treated the same as the rest.

There should be more money to compensate for subsidence, as my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford said earlier. In addition, there should be action on the issue of the 450 sacked miners. I should like to think that we were going to support in the Lobby today a decision that those 450 miners should get their jobs back, as they undoubtedly will under the next Labour Government.

Mr. Bruce: It will be a long wait.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman comes from Scotland. I have been looking at the polls and statistics for Scotland, and I can tell him that if he does not watch his back, the speach he made today may be his last speech. My information is that Labour is riding very high indeed in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman is a Liberal, and I note that his SDP colleagues have not graced us with their presence. I think that I know why. The SDP is not very keen on getting rid of nuclear power or on the hon. Gentleman's ideas about mining as expressed in his speech. In fact, they are not very keen on the Liberals. Members of the SDP are using the Liberals, and when they have used them they will dump them, just as the Tories want to dump the miners. The hon. Gentleman has plenty on his own plate, and he should deal with that before talking about the Labour party.

As my hon. Friends have said, unless some changes are made, our union representatives will have to go to court. The problem stems from the Government's sequestration policy. They say that they are at arm's length with the courts, but I do not believe that.

I want the Minister to bear in mind what the Lord Chancellor said last week about another issue. Unimar, one of the firms involved in Lloyds, cheated more than 1,000 people—nearly all of them Tories—out of their money on the insurance market. The Lord Chancellor—the top Tory in the other place — said, "We cannot really pursue this very complicated and complex financial matter." Millions of pounds were involved.

That was one of the biggest scandals in the City during the past 10 years. More than 1,000 people were swindled out of their money, but there is to be no sequestration. There is to be no hunting or hounding or rushing to Switzerland, because the Lord Chancellor believes that it would cost too much time and money to pursue the matter. This wonderful British justice of ours is to allow all those in Unimar and PCW to escape. They will not get their collars felt, or be hauled before the courts. If the Government can do that for City crooks, who represent the underbelly of the Tory party, they should stop this nonsense of dragging the NUM through the courts.

We have heard today about soaring productivity, a wonderful golden future for the mining industry and conciliation. If those words mean anything at all, the Minister and his right hon. Friends should stop their witch hunt of the NUM.

5.17 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): We have been entertained by a good rant from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who has clearly been practising in the Tea Room.

Mr. Skinner: Not with jackboots on.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman does his practice with jackboots outside the Chamber. Clearly, the Tea Room provides the Labour party with an alternative to the hustings. They cannot face the people; they can only fight one another.

It will come as interesting news to the Leader of the Opposition that the hon. Member for Bolsover has made a most compelling case that, far from deserting manufacturing industry in this country, the Conservative Government have littered taxpayers' money throughout manufacturing industry. That was the point that he made. Perhaps he had better rush round to Miss Patricia Hewitt's office, or somewhere else where they specialise in leaking letters, and have a few words. The Leader of the Opposition should be aware that it is no good berating this Government for not supporting manufacturing industry, because the hon. Gentleman has produced a veritable catalogue——

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): A cornucopia.

Mr. Howarth: As my hon. Friend says, we have heard a cornucopia of examples illustrating the extensive support given by the Government to manufacturing industry.

The hon. Member for Bolsover was ranting, rather than delivering a speech, so let me tell him now that the figure for which he was searching was £2,900 million. That is the amount of money that has been diverted from the taxpayer to British industry in respect of the aerospace, steelmaking, shipbuilding and vehicle industries. Later this afternoon we shall no doubt debate the excellent support that Her Majesty's Government have given to the British vehicle industry.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. However, can he explain how much of that £2·9 billion has been spent in the coalfield community areas, because that is what the report is about? Can the hon. Gentleman explain how much has been spent in west Yorkshire to replace the coal industry that has been devastated by the Government?

Mr. Howarth: I am not here this afternoon to be responsible for west Yorkshire. However, I advise the hon. Gentleman that the Government have made substantial contributions, in one form or another, to alleviate the distress——

Mr. O'Brien: In the south.

Mr. Howarth: British Coal Enterprise Ltd., with capital of £40 million at its disposal, is doing a fantastic job to try to regenerate jobs. Nobody underestimates the difficulty in those areas where there have been major shutdowns in coal capacity. The hon. Gentleman should explain and be aware of the fact that the coal industry is not alone in having to undergo restructuring. It has had to take place throughout British industry, largely as a result of the post-war conspiracy between previous Labour Governments and the trade unions, which has prevented the introduction of new technology and the elimination of overmanning that has so beset British industry since the war. It is only now that those structural changes are taking place.

If the hon. Gentleman comes to the west midlands, he will see that the area has suffered more than anywhere else. It has gone from the top of the earnings league to the bottom, but nobody in the west midlands complains. Instead, people say, "We recognise that we have a problem, but we are tackling it and, what is more, we are coming through it." The good news about this report is that the coal industry itself is tackling the problems. I shall discuss that later.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bolsover cannot take any more of my speech. He is not in his usual seat. I am delighted that he has moved to higher ground, next to the seat occupied by his right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), a former Prime Minister, who will undoubtedly be a friend of his in the next general election. I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman has not deserted us, but will remain to contribute to our discussions because he asked for more money for the coal industry. I find it extremely odd—I am sure that I am not alone among my hon. Friends in finding it so—that he wants more money for the coal industry. He has been a Member of the House for a long time. In those ancient, dim and distant days when there was a Labour Government—I cannot remember it but I believe that there was a Labour Government at one stage—the hon. Gentleman supported them.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can explain, not only to his constituents but to the country as a whole, why there were more pit closures when there was a Labour Government and why more people were put out of work in the coal industry when the Labour party was in office. Perhaps he could also advise us why the terms of compensation for redundant mineworkers were so poor. The answer is that Opposition Members are a bunch of hypocrites and that when in government they did not do half the job that this Government have done.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Howarth: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. I continue by reminding the House—I am sure that hon. Members need to be reminded of this, after what they have heard this afternoon from Opposition Members—of the immense turnaround that there has been, thanks to the leadership of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and the Government.

Mr. Barron: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was present earlier when I spoke. However, I should like to say briefly that, when the mining industry went through restructuring because of the increase in the import of oil because it was so cheap abroad, there was a Government scheme for 26 weeks training for those who left the industry. Under the National Coal Board's enterprise scheme set up in the coal strike, three weeks' training is provided. For most of that time unemployment in coal mining areas was below 3 per cent. It is much higher now; the hon. Gentleman should know that before coming to these debates.

Mr. Howarth: I was here for the hon. Gentleman's speech and I do not disagree with much of what he said. I know that he makes strong representations on behalf of his constituents. I understand that he has been elevated to higher things and was unable to remain on the Committee. I am sure that the Committee was the poorer for the lack of his deliberations.

However, the hon. Gentleman has ignored the part played by British Coal Enterprise Ltd. to deal with the problems in the coalfield communities. As my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) and others have said, it is not the responsibility of the coal industry to consider all the social consequences of its decisions. Of course it must take them into account, but it is there to run a business and it is the duty of Government to see where the commercial operation of a business so inflicts damage on local citizens that action needs to be taken. The Government have taken that action, and will continue to do so.

That seems to have disposed of the hon. Member for Bolsover, although I hope that he will come back and regale us with further comments.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Before my hon. Friend leaves the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), I should like to say that he criticised people who receive subsidies, while his own brother is taking voluntary redundancy from the coal industry. Is not that taking a subsidy?

Mr. Skinner: He is a fireman.

Mr. Howarth: I am sure that the hon. Member for Bolsover will want to tell the House about that in his own time.

I move on, because I know that some hon. Members have not had a chance to speak yet who wish to do so. I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Havant and his Committee on producing an excellent report which, in my view, ranks alongside the 1983 Monopolies and Mergers Commission report as one of the great works on the coal industry—[Interruption.] If you think, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I am only now embarking on my speech, I hope that you will——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman said that he was just starting his speech. I thought that he had been talking for nine minutes.

Mr. Howarth: I undertook to make a short speech but the hon. Member for Bolsover enticed me down an avenue which perhaps I should not have gone down. I hope that I have been able to put the record straight about some matters that would not otherwise have been dealt with.

One of the features of this Parliament is the fact that so many coal miners and mining communities are represented by Conservative Members. It is now often the case that the Conservative party speaks for the miner more than the Labour party does. I have every confidence that, after the next general election, that will continue to apply. That is not a reflection on individual Labour Members who work extremely hard in their constituencies. Indeed, there is a certain camaraderie among those of us who have an interest in the mining industry. Opposition Members speak as sincerely about their views of the industry as I do about mine. It is more a reflection of the present state of the Labour party, which no longer speaks for the English working man, or for the many miners who now seek to buy their own homes, or who have bought their own homes, and who have benefited from the Government's policies on the mining industry.

The first success of the Government's policies can be seen in investment. The hon. Member for Bolsover should listen to this. It is no good his making a speech and then not listening to what other hon. Members have to say. From 1974 to 1979, total investment in the industry by the previous Labour Government was £1·5 billion, whereas between 1979 and 1986 this Conservative Government invested no less than £5 billion. Nothing so demonstrates the commitment of this Conservative Government to the coal industry than the efforts by the Department of Energy during the past eight years. Investment in new pits is now running at more than £2 million every working day and we know that in Margam there is to be a new £90 million drift mine which I hope will come on stream soon.

Secondly, productivity has increased by no less than 50 per cent. since 1979. Each year under the Labour Government productivity fell, despite the fact that in 1974 in the much-heralded "Plan for Coal" the target was a 4 per cent. per annum growth each year. Therefore, productivity is increasing dramatically, so much so that we are now the lowest cost coal producer in western Europe. Nevertheless, there is further to go.

I draw attention to the remarks of the chairman of British Coal to the Coal Industry Society:

"Out-moded restraints such as the 1908 Hours of Work Act and the 40-year-old five-day week agreement mean that highly expensive equipment is only operating for a third of the maximum time available. This is in sharp contrast to the position in other highly capitalised industries such as chemicals and steel."

It is greatly to the credit of the men in South Wales who have gone back on long-standing practices that they recognise that new investment will come only where there is a change in working practices to conform with those in other industries.

Thirdly, the Government should be given credit for the pay that miners now enjoy. It is much higher than it was under the Labour Government. Fourthly, and not least —I do not wish to be unduly divisive about this—the Government are to be given credit for standing firm in the face of industrial intimidation from the NUM. It was a tyranny and the Government did a great service to the country and indeed to the coal industry in standing firm against it.

I have no deep pits in my constituency and there have not been any for some time. My constituents work at the pits of Littleton, which is represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), and Lea Hall, which is represented so ably by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle). The increase in productivity at Littleton has been 38 per cent. and at Lea Hall 24 per cent. Those figures compare with an average for the western area of 22 per cent. That is no mean achievement. At the same time, they have been able to reduce costs at Littleton by 16 per cent. and at Lea Hall by the same figure. The overall figure for the western area is 10 per cent. Output has increased by more than 20 per cent. at both pits. I am pleased to inform the Minister that Littleton colliery has just achieved a 1 million tonne per annum output for only the second time in 85 years. Output per man shift is averaging 3·44 tonnes, and in February 4·44 tonnes was achieved.

Most important, Littleton and Lea Hall are both profitable. The message to Opposition Members is that that is good news for the industry. My constituents are to be congratulated on their efforts, not only to withstand the strike, but to recover from it and produce those magnificent results. It is good news when men can see that, as a result of their efforts, it is not necessarily to dip into taxpayers' pockets, when they can say, "We can stand on our own feet. We are profitable. We are showing the way to recovery for the whole industry." It is a measure of the success of the industry in the western area that total output from its present 11 pits is approaching 10 million tonnes —just 1 million tonnes short of the output 12 years ago, when there were 24 pits. The western area is heading for a profit for the first time in 14 years.

I know that I have spoken for some time and I shall conclude by making two further points. I endorse the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) about the need to introduce private sector involvement into the coal industry. There is nothing incompatible with congratulating miners in the nationalised British Coal on their achievement and welcoming the involvement of the private sector. Throughout industry, we have seen that private sector involvement and the move towards privatisation have had a galvanising effect on the work force. British Airways was a moribund, sleepy, nationalised state airline, losing £500 million, but now the work force is motivated to an extent which was unimaginable five years ago. It is greatly to their credit that the airline is now doing so well. I would like to see that ethos and esprit de corps introduced into the coal industry.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will discard some of his caution, welcome the introduction of more private sector involvement and say that the way ahead for the coal industry must involve the maintenance of the highest standards, coupled with a determined and inexorable move towards privatisation in one way or another.

Subsidence affects all mining constituencies and is a major problem for British Coal. In paragraph 160 of its report, the Select Committee rightly states:

"British Coal currently pays some £90 million a year in repairs and compensation for all those affected . . . BC cannot plan sensibly either its finances or its mining developments with no idea of the size of the subsidence compensation payments for which it may be liable."

In paragraph 161, the Committee recommends

"that BC should no longer be liable for subsidence caused by historic mining operations."

I make a vehement plea to the Minister to take note of that. Whatever else he does in response to the report, I hope that he will feel able to act on that forthwith. He knows from my correspondence with him of the anguish of our constituents whose principal asset is their home —which they cannot mortgage to raise funds to invest in a business, to extend their property or for any other purpose that they have in mind because of the blight caused by the uncertainty of mining subsidence.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) for the lead that he has given on the coal industry. There is a long way to go, but the Government have done a magnificent job. If the Minister would tackle subsidence now and privatisation next month, that would be grand.

5.36 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): For many months I have had the privilege of being a member of the Energy Select Committee which produced this report. As the hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) said, we have spent many hours on it and have travelled many miles. Some of our travels have brought me great pleasure. I have seen Conservative colleagues visiting a coal mine probably for the first time and finding great difficulty reaching some of the coal faces. The House will appreciate the pleasure I had in Wales when I watched the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) get halfway through a coal face, but no further. He had to be dragged back. I do not know how they would get on on a 9-hour shift at a coal face which some of them are advocating. They would find great difficulty indeed.

Nevertheless, we have made an honest endeavour to produce a responsible report on the future of the coal mining industry. Some people believe that over the past few years the financing of the coal industry could be described as rigged. Hon. Members will recall that, following the fall of the Heath Government in 1974, the Conservative party set up a nationalised industry policy group chaired by the present Secretary of State for the Environment. The final report was leaked to The Economist in May 1978. Although most attention has been focused on the right hon. Gentleman's plans to defeat strikes in the coal industry, he also proposed two financial rules for nationalised firms.

In particular, the chief inspector said that "totally inflexible" rates of return should be set for the nationalised industries and that these rates should be adhered to even if whole businesses were to be closed down as a result. It is interesting that setting the totally inflexible rate of return of 12·2 per cent. on the Margam project in south Wales was used to force the south Wales miners to accept the concept of a six-day week for coal production at the Margam colliery. I do not think that anybody would refute that. The Government's rigid financial rules became enshrined in a series of coal industry Acts from 1980 onwards. They were reflected in the 1983 Monopolies and Mergers Commission report and were built into the financial objectives for the coal industry, agreed by Ian MacGregor in 1983.

Since 1979, the coal industry's finances have been progressively rigged to make its results appear worse year by year. By 1982, the NCB began making a loss for the first time since 1974. There are three major factors behind that loss. First, the costs of contracting the industry were being loaded back on the accounts—for example, the cost of past employees' pensions.

Secondly, the agreements with the CEGB, cutting the price of coal in real terms, were forced on the industry from 1979. By 1983, the price of coal sold to the CEGB was cut in real terms by £2·25 per tonne. That reduced revenue by more than £150 million a year by 1983. Thirdly, Government grants were taken out of the profit and loss account and added as a deficit payment to the end of the balance sheet, contrary to continuing practice in the private sector. The new agreement with the CEGB has meant the transfer of profits.

The latest agreement with the CEGB, backdated to April 1986, means a cut in the price of coal by a further £3·80 per tonne. Since 1979, therefore, the industry has lost revenue of £6 per tonne on coal sold to the electricity industry—or some £500 million a year. A further £100 million has been lost through knock-on price cuts in other coal markets. If that had not happened, instead of making a projected £300 million loss in 1986-87, the coal industry would be making £300 million profit. Had that been the case, how many pits that were closed because they were uneconomic would have been able to survive because they would have been economic?

Indeed, Sir Robert Haslam has acknowledged that a £300 million annual profit would make the industry fully viable and that it would be able to generate its own investment funds. Instead, the Coal Board had to set off another severe round of cost cutting in the industry to claw back half the loss of potential profit in the current year. Furthernore, he admits that the now notorious Wheeler plan has been drawn up to push the industry past a break-even position into full financial viability. In the chairman's own words, the board wants to remove "outmoded restraints such as the 1908 Hours of Work Act and the 40-year-old five day week agreement."

The board wants to shed another 50,000 mining jobs over five years. If the Minister does not agree, he should say so when he winds up.

The Supplementary Estimates add £95 million to the external financing limit. The Government say that the EFL for the industry for 1986-87 was set at £730 million before the oil price collapse. What the Government really mean is that it was set before the new agreement with the CEGB was forced on the industry. As a result, the industry lost £400 million in revenue. The Government are now proposing to increase the EFL by £95 million. That would add further interest payment burdens to the coal industry.

By contrast, it was announced last week that the CEGB expected to make £750 million profit in 1986-87. It is interesting to note how the Financial Times, published on 4 March, interpreted that announcement. It stated:

"Thanks largely to last June's revised understanding with the British coal industry, the CEGB this year expects to make about £750m profits, after depreciation and before interest."

On top of that creaming off of the coal industry's profits, the Chancellor announced in his autumn statement last November that the amount that the electricity supply industry in England and Wales would have to pay to the Government in 1987-88, through its negative EFL, would be increased by £237 million. For the first time, the electricity industry will make substantial corporation tax payments in 1989-90.

What is now known as the Ridley plan is being operated in top gear to cream off the wealth produced not only by the mining communities but by the electricity workers. It is operating at full throttle because this is an election year. However, electricity consumers have not received full benefits, as the Government pretend. Electricity prices for domestic consumers have merely been frozen, as this policy is aimed at raising Government revenue and destroying mining communities. Electricity prices were increased by 5 per cent. at the beginning of 1986-87. The later price reduction merely offsets that increase. The only real beneficiaries are the big business users of electricity, who have secured, collectively, a £50 million price cut.

Mr. Andy Stewart: And jobs.

Mr. Lofthouse: I am not disputing that. I welcome new jobs.

The Government might object that, if the new agreement had not reduced coal prices, the CEGB would have substituted oil or imported coal. That argument does not stand. Oil prices are so uncertain that Lord Marshall says that the CEGB does not intend to build any more oil-fired stations, and a huge oilburn by the CEGB would have lifted the international price of oil to such high levels that the policy would be counter-productive.

Secondly, as the Financial Times coal report demonstrated, in its evidence to the Energy Committee, imported coal is being sold at $10 per tonne, on average, less than its costs of production and transport. In other words, imported coal is being dumped at around £6 per tonne less than the price that it should have been sold at. At the same time, British Coal has been forced to cut its prices by £6 per tonne. If an import duty of £6 per tonne were placed on imported coal, the coal industry could be freed from the shackles of the CEGB agreement and it would be making a profit of £300 million.

To import massive volumes of coal is economic nonsense for other reasons. Huge balance of payment problems and large costs to the country will result from yet more pit closures, which will cost the economy and the Exchequer dear.

As to the Supplementary Estimate of £71·3 million for the redundant mineworkers payments scheme, the Government are proposing to add that figure to the provisions under the RMPS, because costs in 1986-87 are now expected to be much higher than the original estimate of £540 million. That is because 29,000 miners have been made redundant up to January 1987. The £1,800 million that was provided under the Coal Industry Act 1985 has been exhausted.

As a result of the huge increase in redundancies in 1986-87, the provision in the Coal Industry Act 1987 for the continuing costs of past redundancies will also be insufficient. The public expenditure White Paper has already estimated that, in the first three years, continuing payments will total £514 million. The maximum figure of £750 million which was provided for redundancies and redeployment is meant to last until March 1992. I must ask the Minister, are the Government planning to load yet another burden on the coal industry?

I will cut my speech short because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. Nevertheless, the question appears to be, how many redundancies does the Minister expect over the next three years? The figure that I have been able to work out is about 30,000. I shall give him the opportunity to refute that or agree with it.

What I would call the minority report—the major amendments proposed to the report — was brought about purely and simply by our fear of the prospect of privatisation. People such as myself, who have had experience of privatisation of the mining industry, know a little about it. We fear that dramatic safety problems will be created by the privatisation of the coal industry. We have seen that before and we saw it in our visit to America. We established our evidence that the system in America of roof-bolting roadways was not the safest. That was confirmed by the chief inspector of mines. If British Coal continues its policy of using roof bolts purely for economic purposes, it will be going against the views of the chief inspector of mines, who feels that it is not the safest method, and British Coal always prides itself on providing the safest methods.

5.53 pm

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me in this important debate. I shall be brief because I realise that other hon. Members wish to speak.

In the main this has been a constructive debate, except for the contribution from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who spoke in his customary diplomatic and tactful manner. I am indebted to the hon. Gentleman for his suggestion that I should read the novels of Peter Archer. That was the one constructive suggestion that he made and was, I suspect, about as accurate as the rest of his speech.

However, he raised one fundamental point which underlines what I want to say in the first part of my speech. It is the difference between providing assistance for an industry, even massive assistance, to help it restructure itself so that it can stand on its own two feet, and providing long-term open-ended subsidy without taking the necessary and sometimes painful steps to put that industry right. In industrial terms, it is the difference between the hospital and the hospice. It was clear from the hon. Gentleman's contribution that he did not understand that difference, certainly in the way in which he contrasted the role of Government intervention in different industries.

Let me return to the point that I wanted to make, with what I have said as a preface. I was a member of the Select Committee when it started its report on coal and, like the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), I had to leave it before it reached its conclusion. I am deeply indebted to the Committee for producing a report which will be extremely valuable to those who have the interests of the coal industry at heart. I am sure that the current hon. Members on the Committee will forgive me for saying that it is not so much their conclusions that are important — although they are interesting, but we shall all have our own ideas on them—it is the way in which they have pulled together evidence in such a careful, constructive manner and given their own careful deliberations in weighing that evidence that gives us a valuable source for considering the future of the coal industry. While I missed out on some of the pleasures of visits that took place in the preparation of the report, there is a lasting testimony before us which will act as a bible on the industry for many years.

The message that comes from the report is that there is wide acceptance of the important strategic need for coal at the centre of the country's energy policy. Many hon. Members have touched on that theme time and time again over the years—each of us, perhaps, from a different viewpoint—but it is clear that in a country such as ours there needs to be a diverse policy on energy. Coal must be at the heart of such a diverse policy.

It is necessary to achieve productivity improvements so that coal can compete effectively and be viable in its own right, rather than having to be propped up merely for the sake of diversity. The progress that has been made under my hon. Friend and the Secretary of State has been such that over the last year a month has rarely passed without one reading of a new record level of productivity being achieved in the industry. All hon. Members must congratulate the industry on that.

I am not sure that I go along with the Select Committee on its analysis of supply and demand, in particular on demand, because it is a notoriously difficult thing to predict a long time in advance. The evidence that it collected and its analysis of it is useful, but anyone who looks back 10 or 15 years at the development of energy demand in the world could say only that there are many factors which emerge which could not have been taken into contemplation at the beginning. I have no doubt that in the next 10 or 15 years other factors will arise which may cause us radically to review our assessment of demand.

[Mr. Spencer Batiste]

It is important for the coal industry that supplies should, in the words of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and repeated in the report of the Select Committee, be "adequate and secure". If we have a native energy source which is reasonably readily available, that is its prime selling point to United Kingdom customers. It does not then matter to them whether there is political instability in the middle east; it does not matter whether there are problems with other sources of energy. Coal has the benefit of being here, being locally available and being relatively easy to supply.

It is with some concern, therefore, that I look at the one way in which the coal industry could defeat itself. I look to see what progress has been made in industrial relations since the end of the strike, and how the militancy that was so apparent in some quarters during that strike has been accommodated. On the whole, the industry's productivity record speaks for itself, but I am still concerned. My hon. Friend the Minister will know that towards the end of last year I visited the Selby coalfield so that I could report back first-hand to the House on how well that project was going. To my dismay and surprise, I was greeted by a halfday strike in opposition to my visit. I understand that my hon. Friend has had a similar experience at other pits. I understand that in the last month or so other people visiting the Selby coalfield have had similar experiences. The Opposition laugh at that. That is a tragedy, because not only did those one day strikes take place, but, a few weeks ago, the Selby coalfield went on strike for a week on the basis that the men should have had bonuses for the weeks when they had taken industrial action.

The mining industry should by now realise that its future depends above all upon the support of its customers. Nothing can destroy their confidence more than a reputation for unreliability. Let us hope that that reputation for unreliability has been firmly buried. The voice of realism is increasingly being heard from the shop floor in the mining industry, as it is in south Wales over Margam. I only hope that the invective directed towards south Wales from the president of the NUM, which in some ways is reminiscent of the invective that he loosed on Nottingham some while ago, will not be repeated but will be repudiated by all in the industry who have its best interests at heart.

My second point relates to something that has not been picked up significantly so far in the debate—new jobs. British Coal Enterprise Ltd. was set up to achieve various specific objectives within the coal community. Where there have been closures it was important that funds should be available to assist and help in the creation of alternative employment. There are different problems in different areas. [Interruption.] It is noticeable that whenever one talks about the successes of the mining communities the Opposition do nothing but barrack and harass speakers. They do it here and in the coalfields. It goes to show just how much they are really interested in constructive progress.

Mr. Barron: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Batiste: With great respect, I promised to be brief, so I shall not give way. I must press on.

My point is clear. British Coal Enterprise Ltd. has been successful in bringing investment and jobs to many areas where they are desperately needed. However, the needs of different areas are very different. In some places what is needed is to convert the premises of an old pit or to put up buildings for new business to move into; such is the strength of the business community in some areas that those premises will be taken up. My constituency has two such sites at Micklefield and Ledston Luck close on the A1. The commitment to develop those sites, making them suitable for business, should, because of their excellent siting, enable industry to move in and provide jobs in those areas.

It is equally clear—the Select Committee focused on this point—that in many places more help is needed. The Select Committee says that the Government should invest more money through British Coal Enterprise Ltd., but I recall my hon. Friend the Minister saying during many coal debates that as much money as British Coal Enterprise Ltd. could usefully use would be made available for it. It merely happens that £40 million is the current level of funding because that is what it requires. My hon. Friend nods as I say that and it is something that he has repeated over and over again.

The Select Committee makes an important point when it draws a comparison with the development of the docklands in London. There is a need for a catalyst. We need more than just investment. We need a more wide-ranging approach to the development of some areas. The highly successful mechanism of the urban development corporations in London and in Liverpool, which have recently been extended elsewhere, should not be confined only to city centres. The coalfields are just as worthy recipients of such a package as are the city centres. They have similar problems and the comprehensive response of an urban development corporation adapted to the coalfields would have a great deal to contribute to the redevelopment of those areas. That is a constructive suggestion by the Select Committee and I hope that the Government will take it on board.

6.3 pm

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) referred to the Government's financial support for the mining industry. The inference was that it is not good for the Government to sustain the mining industry. Other Conservative Members also referred to the subsidy which the mining industry receives. However, little has been said about the tremendous subsidy that we give to agriculture, and that is shocking. The subsidy to mining is nothing compared with the subsidy to agriculture. Let us put the record straight.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the dispute in the Yorkshire coalfield which in the main has arisen because of the lack of negotiation and consultation. The hon. Gentleman says that disputes are the responsibility of the men in the industry and that they should know better. Yet when a record is broken no reference is made to the men who work in the industry. Instead, the hon. Gentleman says that the Minister should be congratulated. The record should be put straight on that too.

The Select Committee's Chairman referred to the Supplementary Estimate of £166 million. The industry is worthy of that and the Select Committee did not condemn that assistance to the coal industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said that more money should be made available to meet the concessionary fuel costs on which many widows and retired workers for the industry are losing out because of an ancient agreement.

I want to draw attention to a recent agreement under which widows and retired members are losing benefit because of British Coal's attitude. I hope that there will be a rethink and that the Minister will have a word with British Coal's chairman about the reduction in benefits to widows and retired members.

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) referred, in reply to my intervention, to the need to transfer money saved in the Health Service for more health facilities. If we follow that philosophy and say that imported coal should be used in hospitals throughout Britain, those whom the hon. Gentleman represents will be out of work.

Mr. Andy Stewart: I never said that.

Mr. O'Brien: The record will show that that is what the hon. Gentleman said. That will not be in the best interests of the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

The Select Committee examined the problems and prospects of the British coal industry and reviewed the progress which has been made to set the industry on a sound footing. We had to look beyond the 1990s and make recommendations for the coal industry. Although the Committee's terms of reference suggested that we were responsible only for monitoring the work of the Department of Energy and British Coal, the Government's evidence made it plain that the task of dealing with the consequences of a coal policy to mining communities rests with the Government.

The hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) referred to privatisation—the real issue that divided the Committee. Whether an industry is publicly or privately owned has no bearing on its efficiency. Sir Robert Haslam, British Coal's chairman, who has spent most of his life in the private sector, said:

"the perception that somehow private industry has some great magic wand and can come in and do something which nationalised industries cannot do has not got a great deal of validity."

The Committee believes that the privatisation of the coal industry is an unnecessary and potentially harmful sideshow, which the chairman of British Coal called an "unfortunate diversion".

The real structure of the industry is broadly accepted as it is and its ownership by the public brings real practical and strategic advantages. No case for the alteration of that position has been adequately made, either in evidence to the Select Committee or in the debate this afternoon.

On several occasions the Government assured the Committee that there were no plans for the privatisation of British Coal, although at times we have been assured that that is only for the present. However, we are equally sure that some Ministers remain ideologically committed to privatisation. With regard to coal, we set particular store by the Prime Minister's words on this matter since decisions about the privatisation programme are clearly taken at No. 10 and the Treasury rather than in the sponsoring Departments. We ask the Minister this afternoon and the Prime Minister to give a categorical assurance that privatisation will not take place.

The Government have privatised one fifth of the state sector of industries that they inherited in 1979 and will have transferred a further one fifth to the private sector by the end of this parliamentary Session. It is also the Government's intention to return most of the remainder to the private sector in the next Parliament. However, we have been told that there are no current provisions for the privatisation of British Coal. Do we infer from the answers that have been given in relation to privatisation that there is no future involvement or commitment for the privatisation of British Coal? In the Select Committee report, we recommended in an amendment that the Government should give a categorical assurance that British Coal will not be privatised. I hope that the Minister will comment on that when he replies.

I readily admit that part of my opposition to a privatised coal industry is based on the experience to which hon. Members have referred in this debate of the private coal industry in this country before 1946. Sir Robert Haslam must be one of British Coal's few remaining employees who worked in the private industry and he spoke graphically of some of the problems of the old private system. I do not want a return to the contract system in the mining industry. I have experienced that and I would not wish it on any other person working in the industry. I also believe that in the interests of safety the British coal industry must remain in public ownership. That will secure a safe industry in which people will be proud to work.

A further principal argument for maintaining public ownership of British Coal is my belief that important strategic assets should remain in public control so that the temporary storms in world energy markets can be ridden out and our principal energy assets preserved for the country's future needs. The case for running down the coal industry is based on short-term economic factors. That is not in the best interests of this country.

The Select Committee had no quarrel about the small deep mines in Great Britain. A more rigorous argument was presented for allowing more private sector opencast on bigger sites. That argument was backed by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in 1983. I have argued elsewhere that there should be a limit on the quality and quantity of coal extracted by opencast methods as a means of easing the pace and scale of British Coal's difficulties. We tabled an amendment that was carried in the Committee about restriction on opencast workings.

I want to refer briefly to the references made to the new mine in south Wales and the fact that if it is to achieve the necessary output it will be necessary to break all the existing agreements about working hours and the five-day week. That is not necessary. To illustrate that point, I want to refer to Sharlston colliery in my constituency. The pit at Sharlston was sunk in 1865 and it has been running for more than 120 years. In February this year, the men at the pit achieved one million tonnes output—and that was achieved in an old pit working to the existing agreements on hours and conditions. That pit knocks sideways the Government's philosophy that there must be changes if achievements are to be made. The achievement at Sharlston was made with six weeks still to go in the current year. The productivity at Sharlston colliery in the past two years has risen from three tonnes to five tonnes per man shift. During the year, the workers set a new weekly output of 31,000 tonnes and an all-time productivity best of 5·6 tonnes per man shift.

We do not need the changes in conditions that we have been told are necessary. The men in the industry can produce the output if they are given the resources to do so. The pit at Sharlston has also reduced its costs to £1·20 a gigajoule. No one has mentioned that today. We do not need the changes in the industry that are being propounded by Conservative Members. The men in the industry can achieve that if they are given the resources. The £1·20 per gigajoule at Sharlston is well within the yardstick laid down by the Government of £1·50 a gigajoule. The one million tonnes of coal produced at Sharlston are for power station use. Such achievements can be made at Selby and at any colliery if the men and the management are allowed to work together and if there is the same family atmosphere at other coalfields and collieries as there is at Sharlston.

As time is running out, I shall be brief. There must be a different spirit in the mining industry if it is to achieve the aims that were set out in the Select Committee report. I hope that the Minister will consider the points that have been raised, especially those about the relationship with the industry and the fact that the machinery must be provided for the men to achieve the objectives.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I will finish my speech by 6.20 pm. I am grateful to the Opposition Front Bench for being so generous as to give me the opportunity to participate in the debate.

I was stimulated to intervene in the debate by the remarks made by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is not in the Chamber to hear my comments. I wanted to intervene during his lively speech to ask him whether he felt that, in view of his comments about his hon. Friends quite legitimately dividing the Select Committee because they were unhappy with certain aspects of the report, he regarded the report as giving the green light for privatisation of the coal industry. If he had allowed me to intervene, I would have expected him to answer, "Yes." That is my interpretation of the Select Committee report.

I joined the Select Committee on Energy when it had finished taking evidence, and during the time when it was considering what the report should contain. Like the hon. Member for Bolsover, this was the first time that I had served on a Select Committee and, like the hon. Gentleman, I had my reservations. To be honest, as a member of the Select Committee, I still have reservations about the whole idea of Select Committees.

Nevertheless, the Select Committee on Energy has produced a clear, crisp and concise report which, in my view and I suspect in the view of the hon. Member for Bolsover, points the way to the future. That future contains an involvement of the private sector in the coal industry.

I do not have pits in my constituency. However, the site of the South Killingholme power station is in my constituency. That site was purchased by the CEGB after the second world war with the idea that a power station should be constructed there. As it has this dead land lying around, the CEGB wants to use it, via its subsidiary NIREX, to dump nuclear waste there. The hon. Member for Bolsover made some remarks about that. I am on record as saying that, as long as I am the Member of Parliament for Brigg and Cleethorpes, there will be no nuclear waste there. There is no nuclear waste there, so I am the Member of Parliament for that constituency today, and that will be the case tomorrow, the day after and the day after that.

I say to the hon. Member for Bolsover and to all hon. Members with mining constituencies that I believe that there is a demand for coal if we can get that coal out of the pits at competitive prices. When we get it out of the pits at competitive prices, there is a case for the South Killingholme power station site being used for a coal-fired power station. The CEGB has selected the site for study as a coal-fired power station. It would provide the demand for coal from hon. Members' constituencies. I want coal to be successful. I want it to be mined competitively and cheaply by private enterprise, because that will protect jobs in other constituencies and create jobs in mine. We do not want a nuclear dump in South Killingholme; we want a coal-fired power station.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): It is fortunate that the House is debating the Estimates in the setting of the report of the Select Committee on Energy which was published on 28 January. It would be extremely churlish not to thank the Chairman of the Committee and its members for the report and the two volumes of evidence. They must have spent long, painstaking hours on its compilation. It would be shallow and inaccurate if I suggested that we could do the report justice in three hours, and I apologise in advance for doing it less than justice. I hope that it will be accepted that I am disciplined by the time at my disposal.

On examining the report, one soon observes that the Committee divided along party lines on some fundamental issues. The hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) described them as two minor issues and one fundamental issue. We learn from the report that the British Coal document entitled "New Strategy for Coal" signalled the end of indicative planning in the industry, with the market being left to decide its shape. Some of my hon. Friends have commented on the Opposition's view of that. The new strategy replaces five and 10-year plans with annual reports, including discussion with area directors.

The House will be interested to know how British Coal described the strategy. The report states:

> "Capacity planning is therefore not designed to maintain forward output at a pre-determined level, but by the application of 'minimum regret' rules to make the best decisions possible on a year to year basis."

That raises questions about planning in the industry, which belongs to the people of Britain. How will it be possible to go ahead with the new pits when it is known that long lead times will be involved in bringing those pits into production? The period mentioned is between seven and 10 years, but unless we have new pits the industry will inevitably contract.

What are the cost parameters for what British Coal describes as capacity planning? Its evidence was that it would write off capacity with an operating cost of more than £1·65 per gigajoule. Those pits will be closed. Any additional or incremental output generated during the next few years should have marginal costs not exceeding £1 a gigajoule. British Coal argues that that is what the market says, but the country must be made aware that the policy will mean writing off millions of tonnes of coal, especially in existing pits. The company will take the best seams first and will leave those that it deems uneconomical. It will bring the life of many pits to a quicker end and the coal left will be lost for ever. Even new pits that are sunk could have a reduced life.

The policy is a throwback to the days of private enterprise, which I and many of my hon. Friends believe vandalised our coalfields. The policy was, "Take the berries first and leave the rest." I predict that, before long, British Coal will tell us that we do not have 300 years' worth of coal, that the figure will be slashed to 50, 60 or 70 years. My right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) told us that Mr. MacGregor said that his policy would mean that we were left with only 50 years' worth of coal. That would be a disastrous policy. If Parliament agreed to such a policy, Britain would live to regret it, because coal is the only fossil fuel that we have in abundance, compared with the reducing assets of oil and gas. I agree with those hon. Members who made the same point in the debate, although perhaps in another context.

The Coalfield Communities Campaign submitted stark evidence of the contraction of the coal industry. That evidence went up to 1985, but the position is worse if we take it up to 1987. In 1972, the National Coal Board employed 271,000 wage earners. By September 1985, the figure had fallen to 156,000—a drop of 115,000, or 42 per cent. The campaign suggested in evidence to the Committee that, if present trends continue, the 156,000 people employed in September 1985 could drop to between 62,000 and 109,000—minus 30 per cent. to minus 60 per cent.—by 1990.

The campaign's remarkable evidence to the Committee gave two examples contrasting Scotland with Nottingham. In 1975, Scotland had 22 collieries with more than 24,000 employees. Today, it has fewer than 6,000 employees. The scale of the decline has been dramatic. The multiplier effect has been dramatic job losses in the electricity industry, steel, the railways and mining equipment manufacturers. They have been severely affected by reductions in employment and capacity in the coal industry.

The campaign says that the Nottinghamshire coalfield is generally regarded as one of the most prosperous in the country, with an assured long-term future, yet it is not an area of stable employment. At paragraph 2.8 on page 191, the campaign states:

"In March 1980 almost 42,700 people worked for the NCB in the County. By March 1985 this had reduced to some 34,000. The rate at which jobs have gone has been accelerating with about 7,000 jobs going between 1982 and 1985. Since March two collieries, Moorgreen and Pye Hill, have closed with the loss of a further 950 jobs, though employment at these pits had been substantially higher in previous years. In addition, the amalgamation of the two NCB Nottinghamshire Areas into one administrative unit in August will almost certainly have led to further job losses. The former South Nottinghamshire area has been particularly hard hit, as about 38 per cent. of the area's jobs have disappeared since 1980." It is on record that it lost in the region of 10,000 jobs. We have to place on record the fact that the Select Committee——

Mr. Andy Stewart: Voluntary.

Mr. Eadie: I suppose it is voluntary but, in Nottinghamshire, the same as in any other area, when a job is lost, it is lost for somebody. The community has lost that job. It means that some kid leaving school will have fewer opportunities in his quest for a job. We should never be complacent about the loss of jobs. We should certainly demand that people who lose their jobs should be compensated—to that extent I am at one with the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart).

The Select Committee tried to respond to the evidence of the Coalfield Communities Campaign, because of the scale and likely persistence of unemployment in mining, by recommending that a special Cabinet Committee be set up and charged with the task of dealing with and co-ordinating the work. One will find in the report that the recommendation made by the Select Committee was based on the complacent reply furnished by the Government when they were asked about steps taken to alleviate hardship.

British Coal Enterprise Ltd. was set up to assist in creating jobs. It was a positive recommendation that substantially more resources be committed to match the size of the problem found in mining areas. However, after all the claims made about the organisation and its work on the scheme, it can be observed in the report that the deputy chairman of British Coal said that he did not claim much for the scheme.

We should look with interest upon the recommendation that British Coal should no longer be liable for subsidence caused by historic mining operations. We have had many debates on that in the past. The argument has been, roughly, that it was always unfair that the National Coal Board, and now British Coal, should have financial liability for operations carried on by their predecessors. I know that that is a controversial area but the Select Committee should be congratulated on the other things it said and the way in which it has tried to seize what I would regard as a difficult nettle.

I referred earlier to the change in the redundant mineworkers payments scheme, which is scheduled for withdrawal by the Government from 1 April 1987. The Select Committee has said that it wishes the Government to review that. That matter has been raised previously during debates on orders relating to redundancy and the Coal Board. It will be a litmus test for the Government to look at the recommendation and examine the evidence that led the Select Committee to make the recommendation.

It is no secret that when the Government announced—one may say, timorously—that the existing scheme would end on 1 April this year, managers in certain areas of British Coal were boasting that, because the agreement was being terminated and because British Coal had already intimated that there would be an agreement that would be less financially worthy, they could close any pit in the British coalfield: when the men knew that the existing redundancy agreement was ending, they would decide to take the better of the two schemes. That is a hell of a way to run an industry.

The Select Committee dealt with the financial burden of interest that British Coal has had to meet. That has had many airings in coal debates in the House. I am not sure whether the Under-Secretary of State has taken part in those debates, because he is fairly recent addition. It has been said many times in the House, and it is on record in Hansard, that we starved the coal industry of proper investment until 1974. I said that, in 1974, the undertakers were ready to take away the coal industry. Successive Governments have ploughed substantial investment into the industry since 1974. It has to be said that, as a consequence, it has been the policy of Governments to accelerate investment in the industry.

The Select Committee highlights the burden of interest payments. For example, it mentions the £437 million in 1985-86. It recommends restructuring British Coal and, if necessary, writing down the value of assets in line with the revenue earning potential. It challenges with doubts British Coal's ability to break even financially by the end of 1988-89. Those doubts are shared in many quarters. It asks for a reconsideration of the deficit grant payable. I do not know whether the Minister will respond to that today or whether the Government will respond at some later date, but those are items of tremendous importance and weight. The Government have to consider those recommendations, which could influence the future trends of what we should all regard as "our" coal industry.

I shall be sketchy on industrial relations. Some comments were made on that in debates on the Coal Industry Bill this year. Part of the main thrust of that Bill was to give statutory rights in consultation and conciliation to the Union of Democratic Mineworkers. We tried to introduce a new clause, which in essence meant that all mining unions would get rights. We did not think that the Government had the prescription for better industrial relations. I see that the UDM rejected British Coal's wage offer and British Coal has produced a special issue of Coal News asking the members to vote against the union. It says that £10 a week is fair to everyone.

We are entitled to ask hon. Gentlemen who have been so articulate—I do not quarrel with their articulateness—in defending the UDM, "Whose side are you on? Are you on the side of the membership or British Coal?" [HON. MEMBERS: "Democracy."] If one is on the side of democracy, one will be on the side of the men. It is unique in the history of industrial relations that British Coal should decide to issue a special four-page supplement to try to undermine the recommendation by the men's union in Nottinghamshire. That is important.

The part of the Select Committee's report dealing with the structure and ownership of the industry is the least satisfactory in the report. It is riddled with political ideology. It is an attempt by the Government majority on the Committee to fit out the industry for privatisation. History and experience have been ridden over roughshod. Popular capitalism is supposed to be a different beast from the days of the old ruthless capitalist coal owners. History gives a catalogue of what was nothing less than callous brutality towards miners, their wives and children.

I was pleased to read in the report that my hon. Friends divided the Committee on that matter. One aspect was safety. I remind the House that more than 53,000 miners have been killed in this century in this country's coal mines, and most of that slaughter took place in the days of private enterprise.

Although we have some disagreements with the Select Committee's report, I repeat that we congratulate the Committee. To coin a pun, the report is a mine of information, which I hope hon. Members on both sides of the House will study from time to time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): When coal is the subject of debate, discussion is always wide-ranging and often controversial. This afternoon has been no exception. I have listened with interest and, in some cases, with incredulity to what hon. Members have said.

As I believe hon. Members know, I have been taking every possible opportunity to visit British Coal pits all over the country. I look forward to a visit next week to Ollerton in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart). On those visits, I have spoken to the men, to British Coal management, to representatives of all the trade unions, but in particular to the men working underground. I can tell the House quite categorically that men and management are in good heart. Morale is very high, with men and management looking forward with an optimism now based not on empty words but on solid achievements.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) speaks with a great deal of authority on these matters, not just because he has been a Member of the House since 1964, not just because he joined the Select Committee on Science and Technology as long ago as 1971 and then became Chairman of various important Sub-Committees, but because he has been Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy since 1979.

My hon. Friend introduced the report constructively and positively, in the great tradition of reports of that nature and in the considerable tradition of Chairmen of Select Committees. I thank all those involved in the production of the report. However, I hope that my hon. Friend will not mind if I say that, on a preliminary view, I find myself in considerable difficulty following the train of thought behind several of the recommendations. That may be because the Committee divided on certain portions with certain majorities in control at certain times—[Interruption.]—but I think that the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) would criticise me if I did not make my feelings clear about the report. I saw the report only recently, at the end of February. Obviously, I want to study carefully, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my Department, all the facts and statistics, and all the recommendations.

This has been an interesting debate. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) has a considerable tradition in the industry. I think that he was with the National Coal Board, as it was then, between 1962 and 1983. I respect his views, but, in view of all that has passed between us, I do not think that he would expect me to agree with virtually anything that he said. However, some parts of his speech were constructive, notably when he talked about the recommendations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood has established a reputation as one of the most articulate and able coal mining Members of Parliament. There are nine pits in his constituency, and I look forward to going underground with him next week, following our visit underground in his constituency at Blidworth and Bilsthorpe. He needs no lessons from anybody in the House about how to articulate most effectively the needs and wishes of his coal mining constituents.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said that during the strike there were elements in the National Union of Mineworkers that had to be defeated. I do not criticise him, but he was speaking on behalf of the Liberals and indeed the alliance as a whole in the debate, and I wish that we had had more support from the alliance in the difficult days of that dispute. He is right to point to the importance of alternative energy, but it was in the days of the Lib-Lab pact that we had the lowest expenditure on alternative energy research and development. During all those years it totalled merely £17 million. Now, under this Government, who came to office in 1979, the total is rising this year above £100 million.

My hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) was an original member of the Select Committee in 1979. He reiterated many of his longstanding views. I pay him credit for consistency if he will please give me the opportunity of continuing my disagreement with several of the things that he says.

I am afraid that the debate took a downturn with the speech by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). Our debates used to follow the course that he followed this evening, but the usual coal war has ended and it seems that the hon. Gentleman is the last to realise it. I do not need to go further, however, because my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) destroyed effectively the hon. Member's arguments. I was glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood paid tribute to Littleton and Lea Hall. He will know that I went underground at Lea Hall comparatively recently. The people in those pits have done a remarkable job to achieve above-average increases in productivity.

The hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) has a great tradition of experience in the industry. I think that he was a personnel manager with the NCB. He has been a member of the NUM, the British Association of Colliery Management, and the Association of Professional, Executive, Clerical and Computer Staff. I am sorry to have to tell the hon. Gentleman—it will not come as a great surprise—that I disagreed with much of what he said. He made several important statements about the finances of the coal industry. Just about all of them were wrong. I do not have time now to go through them individually, but I remind him that when British Coal moved into accounting deficit the deficit grant was introduced to deal with the problem. It had nothing to do with social grants.

The joint understanding between British Coal and the Central Electricity Generating Board reflects movements in energy prices, especially international coal prices, and is not some sort of Government-inspired malevolence as the hon. Gentleman sought to describe it. The hon. Gentleman was wrong even about current events. The £95 million increase in the external financing limit will be reflected in higher grants, not higher borrowing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) has also established a reputation as a great protagonist for working miners, and has a depth of knowledge of coal mining that is the envy of many in the House. One of the tasks that he has always undertaken in these debates has been to identify militancy as the great enemy of the industry.

The hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) was a longstanding coal miner. Indeed, I believe that he has been a member of the NUM since 1945. He told us that he would put the record right, and then proceeded to put the record wrong more than I can recall in the House for a long time. I tell him again that as the Minister proud to be responsible for the coal industry I never cease to congratulate men and management on productivity records. He wrongly represented what my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood said.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), who is always robust, continued his tradition by, as the newest member of the Select Committee, already speaking of his doubts about the whole Select Committee system. That is his prerogative. He established in his speech that he is a strong champion of coal and I recognise his interest and that of his constituents in the development of South Killingholme. I hope he agrees that that is more a matter for the CEGB.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Does the Minister agree that now that the mining industry has increased its productivity, is getting coal out of the ground at the right price and is becoming competitive with the rest of the world, that makes imports of coal less likely and assures the future of the mining industry? The industry has now justified capital expenditure on the mines, but has it not taken the defeat of a year-long miners' strike and the stupidity of Arthur Scargill to bring the industry to its senses?

Mr. Hunt: There is a great deal in what my hon. Friend says. In a very short contribution he encapsulates many of the key points about the industry.

The hon. Member for Midlothian has a great reputation spread over many years for service to the coal industry. To utilise a speech in this debate to seek to try to identify Nottinghamshire as an area where British Coal and the Government stand to be criticised is once again operating according to a Scargill brief. His speech was not the sort that he would have made under other circumstances. I know that he takes that as a compliment.

Mr. Eadie indicated dissent.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Other people do not take that as a compliment, and I am glad that he does not. He was very selective in his statistics. He talked about a reduction in the number of people working in the mines since 1970-74. He omitted to mention what happened when his Government were in power during the six years before 1970. In 1965-66, about 455,700 men were on colliery books, and by 1970 the number had fallen to 287,000.

When the hon. Gentleman is giving statistics, he should do the House the credit of mentioning that his Government were responsible, through compulsory redundancies, for a reduction in the coal mining work force — men on colliery books — of approximately 180,000. I know that the hon. Member for Bolsover still worships the ground on which Arthur Scargill walks.

Mr. Skinner: The Minister ought to do his homework. I have been in this House since 1970 and for many years before that I served in local government and in the union. Most hon. Members will know that I do not go in for worshipping leaders of any kind. I am more concerned about principles, and I shall stick to those. I am not prepared to bow down to leaders of any kind. I am not like the Minister who has to scrape and wipe clean the shoes of Madame Dross, the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hunt: It is surprising to find that not only are the miners deserting Arthur Scargill in droves, but Opposition Members are queuing up to join them. The sooner the president of the NUM stops his articulate line of militancy the better it will be for the future of the industry.

Mr. Skinner: Arthur Scargill is right.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman says that he is right. Only this week Arthur Scargill said:

> "Colleagues, I'm sick and I'm tired of listening to those apologists, those advocates of so-called 'new realism'. Their alternative policy apparently is the kind of thing that's taken place in Wales, it's to collaborate, it's to accept, it's to co-operate with the employer or the Government. Well, I wasn't elected President of this Union to do any of those things."

[Mr. Hunt]

That is one of the most disgraceful things that I have heard from Arthur Scargill — and that says something. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bolsover agrees with him, but that only proves that what I say is true.

Hon. Members spoke about morale problems in the industry. However, productivity records have been broken week after week and on the front page of Coal News I see the smiling faces of miners who are proud that they have joined the million club by producing a million tonnes of coal this year and are turning in record levels of productivity. I am proud to tell the House that we thought we had a productivity record of 3·68 tonnes. However the figure has been revised upwards and for the week before last coal productivity was 3·69 tonnes, compared with 3·06 tonnes for the same period last year.

In the weeks to come I shall consider very carefully the Select Committee report. The Chairman and the members of the Committee would not expect me to give an immediate reaction to a carefully thought out report. I disagree with some parts of the report but I shall consider carefully all that it says. British Coal is now the lowest cost coal producer in Europe. It is absolutely vital that British Coal continues to make progress in cutting costs—given the competitive nature of the energy market. The turnround in British Coal's fortunes will take time, especially following the dramatic fall last year in oil prices and the CEGB agreement.

The motion that we are considering demonstrates once again the Government's commitment to supporting British Coal through this necessary restructuring. The Government are seeking Parliament's approval to make a further £166 million available to the coal industry this year —£95 million in deficit grant and £71 million for the redundant mineworkers payments scheme. This brings the amount of Government support to the coal industry this year to a total of £1,380 million.

This latest increase in the amount of grant paid to British Coal this year reflects the increase in the external financing limit — from £730 million to £825 million — announced in the House on 19 January. In the event, the market pressures on British Coal have continued into 1987 and it now expects its external financing requirement for this year to be higher than the limit that was set in January.

British Coal has also said that it is having to look again at its external financing requirement for next year. When Sir Robert Haslam, the British Coal chairman, has given my right hon. Friend his considered view, the Government will consider whether a revision of the external financing limit for 1987-88, presently £727 million, is necessary.

My right hon. Friend today announced the objectives that he has agreed with Sir Robert Haslam. The basic objective of British Coal is that it should earn a satisfactory rate of return on its net assets and achieve full financial viability without Government support. That is vital not so much for narrow reasons relating to public expenditure, but because the future security of the industry depends on it being competitive.

We believe that the industry can be a success. Sir Robert Haslam has committed himself to achieving break even in 1988-89 and thereafter looks to achieving full financial viability. Break even by 1988-89 is a tough target, but the Government and British Coal believe that it is attainable. Moreover, in future the industry's capital requirements will increasingly come from the industry's own resources rather than the industry depending on Government funds. By 1989-90 British Coal is aiming to reduce its operating costs by at least 20 per cent. compared to last year.

Until such time as British Coal is ready to stand entirely on its own feet, the Government are committed to supporting the industry financially. The Coal Industry Act 1987 provides a further £200 million in deficit grant support and up to £750 million in restructuring grant support.

In view of the shortage of time, I shall respond in correspondence to those hon. Members whose points I have not covered. I felt it right to give everyone possible an opportunity to participate in the debate.

In the past two years the industry has gone through a massive process of restructuring. It has been successful in creating and establishing the basis of a stable, viable industry capable of offering long-term employment and contributing positive benefits to the nation. There will always be restructuring in an extractive industry such as coal. The important news is that we now see this vital restructuring coming to an end with a great future ahead for this magnificent industry.

The debate having continued until Seven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to the Resolution [9 March].

Question deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of Estimates).

Motor Vehicle Industry

7.1 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr Paul Channon): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the Government's approval of the Rover Group Corporate Plan; recognises the valuable contribution made by the vehicle industry, both United Kingdom and foreign-owned, to the United Kingdom economy; notes the important role of the United Kingdom component suppliers; welcomes the encouraging outlook for the future of the industry as a whole; and endorses the Government's policies to create the conditions for the long-term success of the industry.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of the business motion passed by the House yesterday, we are to discuss at the same time the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition, together with the third item on the Order Paper:

That the draft Industry Act 1980 (Increase of Limit) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 19th February, be approved.

I must tell the House that very many hon. Members are anxious to take part in the debate, and I appeal for short speeches.

Mr. Channon: Two motions are on the Order Paper for debate this evening—one relating to the motor industry in general, the other to allow an injection of equity into the Rover Group. I shall deal with both in my remarks.

I welcome the opportunity to have a debate on the fortunes of the motor industry. In recent months the House will be aware that the focus of attention has naturally been on the affairs of the Rover Group, culminating in the statement on the group's corporate plan that I made last month. That has tended to obscure other significant and positive developments that have been taking place in the rest of the vehicle and components industries.

First of all, I want to make clear—I am sure that the House agrees—that the motor industry, in its widest sense, is undoubtedly one of the United Kingdom's most important industries. It is a major contributor to the creation of wealth and employment, both directly and through the many supplying industries for which it is a customer. According to industry estimates, it accounts for about 600,000 jobs and represents some 2·5 per cent. of gross domestic product. Last year, its exports were worth nearly £4·5 billion—half from the components sector. The motor industry also occupies a very important place in the technological base of this country, both as a producer and customer. It has been in the vanguard of introducing new manufacturing technology, particularly robotics, and in investigating the potential of new materials such as ceramics.

It is also an industry that has seen considerable change over the last eight years. Eight years ago, the car industry was in a terrible state. Its reputation throughout the world was one of strikes, bad industrial relations, poor productivity and poor quality. British Leyland appeared to the outside world to spend more time on strike than at work and was associated in the public mind only with the pictures on television of the bully-boy tactics of men like "Red robbo" at factory gate meetings. It was hardly any wonder that the most common advice that any potential car purchaser was given was, "Don't buy a British car." As a result, import penetration of the British car market had been growing by leaps and bounds—under 30 per cent. in 1974 to over 56 per cent. in 1979.

Most serious of all, the United Kingdom was no longer seen as a place where it was competitive to manufacture vehicles. That was the legacy of the 1970s—not an accidental legacy. Major investments were taking place abroad rather than in this country. Tied imports by multinationals were growing, whereas these firms have recently been increasing their sourcing from the United Kingdom.

The past eight years have seen a sea change in the industry's competitiveness—promoted and encouraged by the better climate for business that we have created. It is a dramatic example of the change that has taken place under this Government. It is no longer strike-ridden, paralysed by wildcat strikes and endless demarcation disputes. Austin Rover enjoyed over 99 per cent. strike-free working in 1985 and 1986. Similar improvements have taken place all over the industry.

There has been an equally dramatic change in the industry's productivity record. With investment in new manufacturing technology and improvements in working practices, the United Kingdom is now on a par with the best and most efficient plants in Europe. As the professor of motor industry economics at University college, Cardiff has said recently:

"Britain is becoming a highly efficient place to manufacture cars. The underlying productivity is as good as anything on the Continent".

There is also a renewed recognition of the vital importance of quality for success in the market place. We have been particularly keen to emphasise that through my Department's national quality campaign. All manufacturers have greatly improved their quality performance. Hertz, the world's leading car rental company, has recently said that it now feels that Austin Rover meets the high standards it requires for its fleet in terms of reliability and value for money. It has placed a £36 million order with Austin Rover for 1987. Peugeot-Talbot's determination in this area has taken its Ryton plant to the top of the Peugeot Group's international quality league. Nissan consider that the quality of the cars produced at its new Sunderland factory is at least as good as in its equivalent Japanese plant. The component suppliers have also made tremendous strides in improving quality—as all the vehicle manufacturers will acknowledge.

The Rover Group obviously occupies a central position in the United Kingdom vehicle industry. I have already told the House that the Government have approved the Rover Group corporate plan in full. That means that the Government have backed the strategy which the company's management, following a thorough examination, has formulated. It is a positive strategy for the continuation of Austin Rover Group as a major producer and leading exporter of cars made in Britain. An important feature in that strategy is developing the model collaborative programme with Honda with a new medium-sized car, the AR8. Austin Rover Group and Honda have both determined that their relationship should be a long-term one whose exact form will develop in the light of experience. The corporate plan also provides for a £200 million investment to take the new K series engine forward to full production. That is evidence of ARG's commitment to developing the small car range as a vital part of its marketing plan.

[Mr. Channon]

The sharper commercial approach of the Austin Rover Group is already showing up in increased fleet orders and in improved United Kingdom market share. In the first two months of the year that has been running at just under 17 per cent.—significantly up on the levels in the last months of 1986. The export performance will be further boosted by the American launch of the Sterling, and therefore Rover Group's prospects are encouraging.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I have the genuine privilege of possessing one of the first Rover Sterlings in the country. I have had it since June and I have not had a moment"s problem with the car. Does my right hon. Friend accept tht the most important change that has taken place at Austin Rover is improved quality control, good labour relations and high quality? Having regard to my right hon. Friend's recent statement, and whatever the problems at Leyland Trucks—we all understand those problems—does my right hon. Friend agree that Austin Rover has a genuine, high flying progressive future that augurs well for the manufacturing and motor industries of the midlands?

Mr. Channon: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have also had a Sterling for a considerable length of time and I endorse what he says. The importance that my hon. Friend attaches to quality and industrial relations are two of the key factors in Austin Rover's future success. With regard to the corporate plan, the Government have given the Rover Group what it asked for and it is now up to that group to win its share of the market place; I see no reason why it should not.

Many hon. Members are interested in Land Rover. It is important, but I need not take up the time of the House in speaking about it in detail. The launch of Range Rover in the United States and steps to broaden the company's product base are key features in a strategy to take Land Rover into a position where it can successfully take its rightful place in the private sector.

Many hon. Members are interested in the commercial vehicles businesses. We obviously have had to take into account the fact that the whole sector faces very difficult market conditions not just in the United Kingdom but throughout Europe. The sector faces massive over-capacity, low profitability and a fall in demand for commercial vehicles, especially in developing countries to which British firms had traditionally exported a significant proportion of their output.

Throughout Europe, the response has been a mixture of rationalisation and increased co-operation. Following years of losses, General Motors has decided to cease production of heavy trucks in the United Kingdom. Iveco's French subsidiary has ceased truck production and last year Ford merged its truck operations with those of Iveco.

I told the House on 19 February of the plans for Leyland Trucks, Freight Rover and DAF to form a new joint company. The aim is to create a single, strong European joint venture able to move forward positively in a difficult market.

All right-hand drive trucks will be built in the United Kingdom, as will be the successful Roadrunner light truck which will be distributed throughout Europe. Freight Rover will continue to develop its van business in Birmingham, building on the opportunities of using DAF's distribution outlets in Europe. DAF will manufacture medium and heavy trucks for left-hand drive markets. This new joint venture with integrated manufacturing and distribution facilities throughout Europe will enable Leyland Trucks and DAF fully to develop their business.

While the combined company will be stronger, the market it faces will still be very difficult. Over-capacity in Europe has fallen, but remains a significant problem. The production levels of six or seven years ago were heavily dependent on markets outside Europe where demand is unlikely to recover quickly. Of course, I regret the closures of the Leyland engine plant and foundry and the Scammell works at Watford, and I am grateful for the constructive concern and great interest which my hon. Friends the Members for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) and for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) have shown. With losses running at £1·5 million a week, rationalisation was vital if Leyland Trucks was to have a real future. I believe that the merger with DAF, which is itself profitable, can provide that future.

I well understand concerns about the effect that this may have on the component suppliers in the United Kingdom. Rationalisation of Leyland was unavoidable. The joint venture with DAF will be reflected over time in changes in the components industry. But the opportunity to create a viable and secure truck industry in the United Kingdom which the merger presents offers by far the best prospects for the future of the components industry. I assure the House that the merged company intends to make significant and continuing purchases of components in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): What figure can my right hon. Friend put on the percentage of components purchased in this country? What assurances has my right hon. Friend been given that this level will be kept to by the new Anglo-Dutch company?

Mr. Channon: It has promised to purchase a significant amount of supplies from the United Kingdom. With the new opportunities available to the merged truck venture, the prospects for United Kingdom components suppliers are better than they would have been under an option which would have been extremely painful for the Leyland truck industry. It is up to components suppliers to deliver what the customer wants on quality, reliability and price.

The House will recall the Government's intention to meet the debts and the cost of rationalisation of the Rover Group's commercial vehicle business. As I told the House on 6 March, these are now expected to total £680 million.

The statutory basis for the injection of new Rover Group equity is the Industry Act 1980. Section 5 of the Act—I have tabled a motion dealing with this—places a limit on certain kinds of funding for ex-NEB companies which, for these purposes, means Rover Group and Rolls-Royce. The order which I laid in draft before the House on 19 February increases the limit from £4·4 billion to £5·25 billion. This increase will ensure the necessary headroom over the overall limit to permit the Government to subscribe for new equity in the Rover Group and, following the intention which I announced to the House on 18 December, in Rolls-Royce.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): On a point of clarification about the writing off of the Rover Group's debts, what difference would this make to interest payments by Leyland Vehicles? The Secretary of State has talked about losses. Many of the losses arise from interest payments. If Leyland Vehicles were not being disposed of, what would be the continued reduction, as a result of writing off the capital debt, in the amount that the company was losing?

Mr. Channon: Clearly, there would be some effect. The debts and the cost of rationalisation are expected to be about £680 million. This aspect would have to be analysed in detail. It is difficult to get an exact picture of it. The right hon. and learned Member is on a good point. Of course writing off would make some difference to the debts of the truck company. It is necessary to write off the debts and the cost of rationalisation at this time so that the car business is not burdened with the debts of the truck business. I am speaking in shorthand, but that is the significant reason for the actions that I am recommending to the House.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): My right hon. Friend has referred to General Motors' decision to cease manufacturing heavy trucks. General Motors still makes military vehicles for the Ministry of Defence. We in Dunstable are desperate to have that crucial order renewed.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): So are we.

Mr. Madel: I know that. But we are desperate in Dunstable. I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the fact that General Motors is still in Britain making military vehicles.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. Of course the company is contending with others for military orders. There is no reason to assume that it will not be considered seriously along with all other serious contenders.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): On the point about Dunstable, I hope that my right hon. Friend is aware that the Leyland truck division is also keen to acquire part of the order for military vehicles and, through the Ministry of Defence, will compete vigorously for it.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is right to make that point. I agree with him, too. Luckily, I am not Secretary of State for Defence. Military orders are important to both companies. Both will be considered seriously. There is some movement by Scammell from Watford, which will have some benefits for Leyland, although it is regrettable for Watford. There is some concentration of the truck business in Leyland. I think that that will help meet my hon. Friend's point.

I shall deal with the automotive industry as a whole. No one can doubt that, with the achievements of the industry in improving its performance and with the better climate for business which we have created in this country, the United Kingdom is once again recognised as a good place in which to manufacture vehicles. Major new investments are taking place or are planned. The multinationals are particularly prominent in this regard.

Ford, for example, has announced plans to spend nearly £1·5 billion in Britain between 1986 and 1991 on its plants and the development of new vehicles and components. Last year Vauxhall spent £100 million on a new paint plant at Luton. It has already approved a £160 million investment programme between now and 1992, with an additional £40 million to be spent on General Motors' United Kingdom component plants. Other projects are currently under consideration.

Lotus has recently announced a significant expansion of its operations at Hethel. This will create more than 1,000 jobs over the next five years and involve an investment of £57 million. Peugeot-Talbot chose its Ryton plant as one of the locations for building the Peugeot 309. It is putting further investment into the plant to prepare it for the production of its new mid-range car towards the end of this year. And there is Nissan's decision to advance the start of full production at its Sunderland plant and build engines there — a sure sign of its long-term commitment to manufacturing in the United Kingdom.

All this increased competitiveness is reflected in improvement in the local sourcing of cars by the multinationals and by their increased use of British-made components. Ford is at present building more than 70 per cent. of its United Kingdom sales in its United Kingdom plants and these vehicles have a United Kingdom content of more than 80 per cent. Similarly, Vauxhall is now producing 70 per cent. of its United Kingdom sales here — up from only 45 per cent. in 1985. Although its United Kingdom content level is not yet as high as Ford's, it re-sourced over £100 million worth of components to United Kingdom suppliers in 1986 and it anticipates a similar performance this year. Nissan will also be a major customer of the United Kingdom components industry. It has said that at least 85 per cent. of the European Community content of its Sunderland production will come from the United Kingdom. This obviously reflects the increasing competitiveness of the components sector.

I warmly welcome, as I am sure the House does, all these developments and we will wish to continue to encourage the multinationals to increase their participation and sourcing in the United Kingdom where they play a valued role in the economy not only as vehicle manufacturers but also as component producers. Dagenham is the centre of Ford Europe's diesel engine production. Ford is a major exporter of engines from the United Kingdom. In 1986, Ford produced 666,000 petrol and diesel engines in its British plants, more than two thirds of which were exported.

More generally, every car built by Ford at any of its European plants will contain some British components. Similarly, General Motors also produces significant numbers of components here. Its AC Sparkplug plant at Southampton will supply catalytic converters for all GM's European assembly plants. Delco Electronics in Liverpool is producing liquid crystal display instrument panels for export to South Korea. The contribution of the multinational companies to the United Kingdom — in particular, their recently enhanced commitment — deserves proper recognition.

The results of all these changes since 1979 are now starting to show through. Car production has picked up from the low levels of the early 1980s. In 1986, over 1 million cars were produced for the second year running.

Import penetration has been stabilised. Last year saw United Kingdom production starting to recapture the home market. The share of the market taken by imports fell by two points to under 56 per cent. So far this year imports have taken less than half the market. This is an encouraging trend and one which should continue with improved local sourcing by the multinationals.

[Mr. Channon]

Export prospects are also improving, with companies re-entering former markets. Austin Rover's exports last year were 16 per cent. higher than in 1985. The Rover Group has returned to the American market with the Rover Sterling and the Range Rover—both of which have had an enthusiastic reception.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, within 12 days of the Rover Sterling having been launched on the United States market, 1,043 cars were sold?

Mr. Channon: Yes; it has had a very good reception in the United States of America. I hope that that initial success will continue and I see no reason why it should not.

Peugeot-Talbot became in 1985 the first of the multinationals to restart production of left-hand drive cars for export to Europe. At the top of the range, Rolls-Royce is continuing its excellent export performance. Looking to the future, Nissan plans to export at least a third of its Sunderland production from 1989 onwards. And if Ford's Dagenham and Halewood plants can maintain their recent quality and productivity improvements, exports to the continent of 50,000 vehicles a year could begin in the early 1990s, with a gain of around 1,000 jobs.

The success of Jaguar is a splendid example of the change in the fortunes of the motor industry. I have noticed that one or two Opposition Members try to ignore Jaguar, for it provides incontrovertible proof that privatisation works. [Interruption.] Yes, they have to heckle Jaguar, because they are jealous.

The company's recently announced preliminary results show production up by 8,000 vehicles, or 24 per cent. since 1984, the year in which Jaguar was returned to the private sector. Over the same period, exports rose by 29 per cent. and after-tax profits nearly doubled, being up by 96 per cent. Productivity has also risen significantly but the company's success has led to the creation of more jobs. At the end of this year, Jaguar will be employing around 12,000 people as against under 10,000 in 1984. Jaguar's commitment to the British components industry also deserves praise. Its cars have a 90 per cent. United Kingdom content and Jaguar has done much to help improve the competitiveness of its suppliers.

The problems of the vehicle assemblers in the 1970s have inevitably affected components suppliers. The necessary rationalisation that has taken place has diminished their British customer base. The regeneration of the car industry is therefore good news for the components sector as well. It should provide it with a more solid customer base. Also, components suppliers have begun to look with increasing success to overseas markets.

When I read the Opposition amendment to the motion in the name of my right hon. Friend I was astonished. It refers to "the Government's neglect and indifference towards the motor vehicle industry in the United Kingdom".

I remind the House that since 1979 this Government will have provided over £2 billion in equity support for the Rover Group. Even accepting the Opposition's irresponsible and profligate attitude to taxpayers' money, it is a curious definition of neglect and indifference.

The motor industry in the United Kingdom is at last becoming a success story again. Hon. Members will have seen in the press recently the reports of all the companies. The greatest threat that the motor industry could face is the election of a Labour Government. Quite apart from the disastrous effects on competitiveness of a return to the high inflation, high taxation and militant trade unionism which a Labour Government would bring, Labour's policy to switch from vehicle excise duty to an additional tax on petrol would add some 39p to a gallon of petrol, hitting the high mileage business and rural user.

What do people think would happen to the car industry then? Selective import controls, as proposed by the Opposition, would be met by swift retaliation, just at the very moment when British exports are beginning to take off, while the hostile attitude displayed by some Opposition Members, particularly last year, to multinational manufacturers such as Ford and General Motors would jeopardise future investment in the industry in the United Kingdom.

Over the past eight years, we have created the conditions which have allowed the motor industry to tackle successfully the fundamental problems which affected it in the 1970s and before. The industry is now in better shape than it has been for many years.

A recovery is well under way in many sectors and a sound base has been established for the future. Our policies will enable the industry to build on this base and continue to improve its competitiveness. I look forward to the future of the car industry with optimism. With multinationals sourcing more in the United Kingdom, we can expect car production to increase and import penetration to decline further, and we can look for continued progress in recapturing export markets and increasing sales in Europe.

I invite the House to reject the Opposition's sour and carping amendment, typical of a party in terminal decline, and to support our motion in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"condemns the Government's neglect and indifference towards the motor vehicle industry in the United Kingdom which has led to massive job losses throughout the country, severe damage to the industry and its components suppliers, and a serious deterioration in the balance of trade in manufactured goods; deplores the Government's dogmatic insistence that the Rover Group should be privatised as soon as possible instead of strengthening and expanding its crucial rôle as the only British-owned volume multi-product vehicle producer; rejects the proposed gift-wrapped surrender of control of Leyland Trucks and Freight Rover to DAF and requires the Government to renegotiate the transaction on the basis of a genuine joint venture with each party having a fifty per cent. interest; and calls on the Government not to proceed with the closure of the engine and foundry plant at Leyland and the closure of Scammell at Watford."

I agree with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that this is a timely debate because important issues affecting the motor vehicle industry are under discussion and up for decision. But there is no blinking the fact that the years since 1979 have been years of retreat and difficulty for the British motor vehicle industry. Just as we have seen manufacturing industry as a whole decline—there is 20 per cent. less manufacturing industry today than in 1979—and just as we have seen our balance of trade in manufactured goods deteriorate so badly that we are for the first time in modern history in deficit, so we have seen the same process reflected in the motor vehicle industry, which is an abosultely crucial part of British manufacturing industry. It is important not only in its own right, but as a source of orders for the British components industry. In more recent years, we have seen the brunt of the decline borne by the truck and bus part of the industry —both once vigorous and prosperous parts. They were so vigorous and prosperous that they took the car industry on their back during its difficult years.

Despite the Secretary of State's attempt to present the British motor car industry as a type of paradise, the truth is that we have seen the complete end of General Motors heavy truck production at Dunstable. That company is one of the multinational companies, some of whose activities the Secretary of State praised, but I noticed that he did not say anything about it leaving heavy civilian truck manufacturing completely.

We have seen Bathgate, once an important part of the motor vehicle industry, advertised by the Rover Group as a suitable site for a large retail shopping complex—that is a sign of the times. Of course, we shall discuss in detail the proposals for Leyland in relation to DAF which, as the Opposition state in our amendment to the motion, are a surrender to DAF of control of an important industry.

The matter of commercial vehicles will be an important part of the debate, but before I deal with it, I shall refer to the Rover corporate plan. The motion asks hon. Members to welcome the Government's acceptance of the corporate plan. Those of us who have studied the corporate plan, which is available in the Library, will have noticed points about it that I wish to bring to the Secretary of State's attention. However, before I raise what I consider to be some problems relating to the Rover Group, or at least to the intentions that are disclosed in the corporate plan, I make it absolutely clear that Opposition Members wish the Rover Group every success in its drive to increase its share of the British domestic market and to reconquer lost domestic markets. I congratulate all those in the company who are involved in expanding sales on the European continent. We all know how important the successful launch of Rover Sterling is in the United States and how important and satisfying it will be for everybody involved in the company, not least those who depend upon it for their livelihood. The consequences of the Rover Group not being successful are horrendous in terms of jobs and the consequences for the motor vehicle industry and its components suppliers.

Having said that, and wishing every success to the company and those who work for it in their drive towards increasing its share of markets, one is bound to notice some disturbing elements in the corporate plan. The first is the Government's dogmatic insistence that privatisation must be one of the principal objectives of the Rover Group. I should have preferred to see in the corporate plan an assertion that the major objective — indeed the overriding objective—is to strengthen and advance the expansion of the company and the industry. I fear that if privatisation is made the driving force behind the corporate plan, decisions may be taken to push it towards short-term profitability to justify its flotation and privatisation, and that might have long-term adverse consequences for the industry, particularly for its size.

I refer to page 7 of the edition of the plan that is available in the Library.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East) rose——

Mr. Smith: I shall deal with two points and then give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Page 7, item 2, of the corporate plan refers to an evolving product plan, which, over time, will move the business up market and into specialist niches. What does it mean? On the face of such elliptical phrasing, it is not clear what is intended. Is the intention to move out of the volume production of smaller cars and to what is sometimes called the BMW solution—that is, producing a smaller number of higher value cars? If that is the plan, it will cause great concern. It will mean a reduction in the number of cars produced. It will have serious and obvious consequences for the people employed, and even more severe consequences for those who work in the component supplying industry. We are entitled to ask for more clarity about what is meant. Frankly, as it stands, the statement does not mean much at all. It hints at a possible way in which the company might go without saying precisely where.

Mr. Norris: The right hon. and learned Gentleman stressed that the overriding concern of the corporate plan was privatisation. Of course, he knows that that is not so. Before the paragraph in the corporate plan that deals with privatisation, there is a clear statement that the overriding objective of the company is to restore profitability, and, through such profitability, develop self-sufficiency. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman deny that the objective of self-sufficiency, regardless of one's views of the company, is of paramount importance?

Mr. Smith: Of course we want the company to be profitable. Who in his right mind would not wish it to be profitable and successful? There is no denying that privatisation is regarded as such an important objective that, after the business objective on page 3 of the corporate plan, it is underlined as one of the group's objectives. It mentions the Government's commitment to privatisation —which, of course, the company, which is owned by the Government, accepts. It is reasonable to ask whether the wisest course to be followed by the Rover Group at present is to pursue a policy of privatisation. Opposition Members certainly do not think so. The overriding objective should be to strengthen the company, make it as effective as possible and to allow it its share of markets. I leave aside the matter of its ownership until success is achieved by the company.

I hope that the Minister will answer the question about the so-called evolving product plan. The other matter that causes some concern—at least in the terms in which it is expressed in the corporate plan—is the relationship with Honda. The corporate plan states that there should be an increased recognition of the importance of Honda to ARG. Perhaps I look at words too closely. I am not sure whether that sentence means that we should recognise the obvious importance of it or whether increased importance is to be given to the relationship with Honda. It is certainly not clear from the way in which that sentence is phrased. Everyone could have an increased recognition of that importance without the importance being increased. I suspect that it is hinted that the importance is being increased.

Opposition Members have always made it clear that we strongly support intelligent collaboration between self-standing equal partners. It makes common sense for the motor vehicle industry. If it is intended that there should be a steady retreat of Austin Rover's influence and a steady increase in Honda's influence, it is quite different, and the House should know about it. On the whole, it would be better if corporate plans that are made available to hon. Members are phrased in a way that makes sense to those who seek to comprehend them. I cannot understand precisely what is meant by that part of the corporate plan. If the trouble is that it has been filleted so much before it has been made available to hon. Members, perhaps now and again we should get a fuller version.

What has happened to the ARG project? It is not referred to in the plan. Is the Metro to be replaced, or is the project to be dropped? Is there merely to be a reskinning of the Metro? That raises questions about whether the product line will be adequately reinforced in future. I shall be grateful if the Minister will help us on such rather detailed but important matters about Austin Rover.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Has my right hon. and learned Friend seen an article in the 2 January edition of The Birmingham Post about the Metro? It states that the Government were so eager to hand over full information to Ford that it states that the "Department of Trade ad Industry allowed Ford to see the production costs for every Austin Rover model, showing that the cost of the Metro—which gives Austin Rover almost 40 per cent. of its sales — was £100 higher than the Ford Fiesta, giving Ford the edge in last summer's discount war. Ford was able to push discounting to the point where Austin Rover would have had to sell the Metro at a loss. Jean Denton, who was Director of External Affairs" — [Interruption.]——

What are hon. Members worried about? Are they frightened by what is coming out? They should just listen. The article states:

"Jean Denton, who was director of external affairs for Austin Rover, said . . .'This decision provided the opposition with all the information they would have given their eye teeth for'."

Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the management was instructed to give that information by the previous Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan)? Is it not a disgrace that a Government who wrap themselves in the flag are always selling patriotism short and that the previous Secretary of State for Trade and Industry sold the company short? Should he not be here to answer that charge?

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend must have anticipated that I was coming to the most important criticism that I have to make of the Government in relation to the Rover Group. How on earth can we trust the stewardship of the Rover Group to a Government who, only a year ago, were prepared to sell the whole operation to its group's principal competitor, Ford? That shows this Government's responsibility towards that important industry.

The Government profess support for the company as presently constituted, but we must remember that a significant number of Conservative Members and the Government were prepared completely to abandon their responsibility for it. That was stopped because there was a campaign against it. The Government had to turn tail and abandon their plan. However, a great deal of commercial damage was done to Rover Group's profits not only because of the uncertainty that was caused during that period, but because it is not quite clear — that is why the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) was so apposite—that a great deal of commercial information appears to have been given during the takeover discussions with Ford.

My hon. Friend referred to Jean Denton, the director of external affairs. In The Birmingham Post she said:

"I have always considered that handing over that information to a major competitor was even more damaging than the insecurity of customers during the merger talks. This decision provided the opposition with all the information they would have given their eye teeth for."

If, as my hon. Friend suggested, that resulted from a Government instruction that that information should be given to a competitor, an even more serious charge is that the Government not only neglected their responsibilities in relation to the Rover Group, but that they helped one of the Rover Group's principal competitors to gain an advantage over it in the market place. At some stage I should like the Government to provide an answer to the very serious points that have been raised about their conduct during that period.

I turn to one of the other very important issues that we are discussing—the Government's proposal to surrender control of Leyland to DAF. When the Secretary of State first came to Parliament some months ago, the proposal was that discussions should take place with Paccar on the one hand and DAF on the other. The question of an outright sale to Paccar was specifically mentioned by the Secretary of State, but the reference to DAF was in terms of a collaborative arrangement. Something quite different emerged from the discussions. When the Secretary of State made his statement it was presented as a joint venture. The Secretary of State has told us again this evening about an imaginative new joint venture between Leyland and DAF. From that, one would imagine that it will be a partnership of equals. Indeed, Ministers have appeared on television programmes in which they have drawn parallels between the Leyland-DAF proposal and the Anglo-Dutch Shell company.

Mr. Norris: Why not?

Mr. Smith: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why not. In one case there is a partnership of equals. In this case—with one side having 60 per cent. and the other having 40 per cent. — the situation is quite different. If Conservative Members argue that one can have a 40 per cent. share and still be a real partner in the venture because one still has a significant minority shareholding, why is it that when one looks at the directors of the company one finds that that is not reflected in the same proportion of directors? The Secretary of State was asked several times about this when he made his statement. I asked him how many British directors of the joint company there would be. There was no response, for two possible reasons. Either the Secretary of State did not know, which is bad enough, or—perhaps even worse—he was ashamed to say. That obvious question was put, not once, but several times.

We now discover that only two of the nine directors on the supervisory board are British and that only one of the eight directors on the management board is British. That is an amazing joint venture of apparently equal partners. It blows the cover and all the public relations puff that accompanied the Government's presentation. The truth is that Leyland Vehicles Ltd. has been handed on a plate to DAF.

Another test can be applied: how many job losses will there be in the Netherlands? There will be none. However, there will be considerable job losses in the United Kingdom. It is not, therefore, a 50-50 per cent. partnership. Our motion says that the Government should not renegotiate the partnership and move it towards 50 per cent. Our position has always been that British Leyland should stay British, in public ownership and wholly under British control. However, we have to accept that the Government have entered into an arrangement that will lead to a 60:40 per cent. divide.

The very least that can be demanded is that the Government must make a reality of their profession of a joint venture arrangement and renegotiate the deal so that there is at least a 50 per cent. British interest. That is the Opposition's concession. It is a reasonable concession. That renegotiation should be in line with the Government's profession and with their future profession about the future sources of components. At the moment all we have from DAF is a bland promise about that question and about the disposition of products as between Dutch and British factories. The British ought to have an equal and an effective say.

When the Minister of State replies to this debate I should like him to tell us what assurances of a binding character were obtained for the component supplying industries in this country before this deal was entered into. Many of those industries have a long-term commitment to Leyland. Cummins, for example, supplies engines to Leyland. The company is apprehensive that that order is now gone for ever and that its engines will be replaced by DAF engines. That ought to have been a material factor in the negotiations. The Government should not have permitted an arrangement to be entered into under which British components manufacturers would be prejudiced. The time to fix the deal was when the negotiations were entered into. If DAF had been genuine about its promise, it would have had no difficulty about entering into arrangements of a more binding character. However, this Government are prepared to take easily given assurances and bland promises instead of insisting upon the solid commitments that anybody with a sense of stewardship for the industry would demand.

Why on earth should we give up 100 per cent. control of Freight Rover and include it in the DAF deal? It is a highly profitable and successful company. It is doing well in the market place. However, that 100 per cent. control has gone into the deal as a sweetener for DAF, because DAF would not enter into the arrangement unless it gained control of Freight Rover. It is a one-sided deal that was entered into by a Government who are negligent of British interests. It means that control of the last British owned heavy motor vehicle producer in the United Kingdom has passed to a foreign competitor. That can be seen in the composition of the board of directors.

Is the Secretary of State honestly able to maintain that it is any sort of a deal when Britain has only one out of the eight directors on the key management board? Part of the sorry saga has been the proposal to close the engine plant and the foundry plant at Leyland. That causes very deep concern to those who work in the engine plant and in the foundry and also in the community that is so closely associated with the enterprise. I understand that concern is already being expressed by Leyland Vehicle customers that in future they may be unable to obtain the 400-series engine. Customers of the foundry are also deeply worried about the future source of their components. Indeed, there is the serious possibility that many customers of Leyland vehicles will go abroad to find the components which used to be supplied by the Leyland plant.

As the Secretary of State knows, the unions have stated their willingness to enter into discussions with the management. I believe that the Secretary of State had discussions with the trade union representatives on that point. They have suggested that they are prepared to take up any proposals that the management might put forward for putting the engine and foundry plants into the economic position required by the company. They were even prepared to consider quite substantial job losses, voluntarily, to maintain the engine and foundry plants. It will be a sad day when we see those two important plants close.

The other victim of the Leyland-DAF deal is the Scammell plant at Watford. That closure is a wholly indefensible part of the arrangement. The Secretary of State often discusses the losses that have been made by Leyland Vehicles. However, it is interesting to note that when I asked him earlier what the difference would be following the write off, it was conceded that the losses would be much less after the write off had taken place. I was surprised that we did not receive that figure. We should be given it because it is highly relevant to whether this is a wise decision. As a result of the Government writing off the debt obligation, the losses would be much smaller. In that case, the matter takes on an entirely different light and needs to be reconsidered.

I remind the House that between 1976 and 1986 there were only three years in which Scammell was in deficit. The largest loss came in 1986 with a loss of £3 million, which is a relatively small amount in the context of the industry. The projected loss for 1987 is only £1 million. Following the DROPS contract which Scammell secured, the company was calculated to have a secure and profitable future for the period between 1988-95. The company has a superb record of labour relations. Only two and a half days have been lost in industrial disputes during 68 years of industrial activity.

The loyal, dedicated and committed work force at Scammell supply important specialist vehicles for the Ministry of Defence. If it closes, we shall lose a major design and technical capability in the United Kingdom. To put it no higher, there is controversy as to whether Leyland Vehicles will be able to supply the range of vehicles for the Ministry of Defence, the components for which for many years it has relied upon Scammell to provide for example, tank transporters, crash tenders, RAF refuelling vehicles and other specialist military vehicles.

Great expertise in military vehicles has been built up over the years at the Scammell plant at Watford and now that is to be thrown aside. Losses will also be sustained by the components suppliers such as Cummins and Perkins which will suffer as a result of the closure at Watford. Those who supply brake equipment, cabs and other parts of the plant will suffer from the closure. The decision to dispense with an effective and well functioning part of the British motor vehicle industry is an act of wanton destruction.

In our contributions to the debate, we have all stressed the importance of the components sector. The Rover Group alone spends £2·38 billion each year with more than 2,000 British companies. That contribution is enormous.

[Mr. Smith]

It is of great importance to the question whether the Rover Group remains a large volume producer, producing in excess of 400,000 vehicles at present.

The engineering director of Rover Group, Mr. Andrew Barr, stated in his evidence to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on 18 February 1987 that if the group went out of mass production,

"it would have a dire effect on the components industry."

That is why the size of the Rover Group and the loss of control of Leyland is so important to the components industry when we are losing not only markets but the capacity to decide who will source the products that the industry produces.

Instead of the sunshine picture that the Secretary of State sought to portray, we see an industry which is in grave difficulty and in which we are losing important capacity, jobs and market share. That will have a domino effect throughout the component sector.

There is still time for the Government to make it unequivocally clear that the Rover Group will stay in volume car production, and to make sure that that is written into the corporate plan and that that is an objective of the company's owners—the Government.

There has been too much retreat in the industry and the notion that the Rover Group should enter into the so-called more profitable niche of the higher value-added car, and abandon or greatly diminish its production of the others, is simply not tolerable. It is difficult to discover the company's plans in that respect. However, it is legitimate for the House of Commons and even more important for the Government to make clear where they stand on that important issue that is so crucial to the future of the group.

There is still time for the Leyland-DAF deal to be re-negotiated and for the Government to insist on a proper 50:50 partnership that would give some reality to the notion of a joint venture. There is still time to negotiate the future of the engine and foundry plants. Especially in the light of customer pressure, there is still time to decide that it will be deleterious to the company to lose those facilities. There is still time to stop before that happens. Co-operation with the work force could bring forward a new survival plan for the engine and foundry plants at Leyland. There is still time to stop the wanton destruction of the Scammell plant at Watford.

When one considers the realities of the matters that we are discussing today, one can see why the Secretary of Stage painted a wholly one-sided picture of the motor vehicle industry. We are all committed to its success. It is too important for us to take any other position and we are wholeheartedly behind its future success. However, we should like far more care to be given to safeguarding its future and maintaining the British element of an important British industry.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): As the hon. Member for Leyland in the constituency of South Ribble, I shall confine my remarks to Leyland Vehicles Ltd. in its two-fold role of Leyland Bus and Leyland Trucks.

There is not time to rehearse again the history endured by Leyland Vehicles in recent years. Many hon. Members take an interest in these matters and will be readily knowledgeable about the problems. Suffice it to say that, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has said, through the taxpayer the Government have invested about £2 billion in the company since 1979.

However, there have been problems of product, market place, industrial relations, productivity and a variety of other difficulties with which we are all too familiar. It must be said that the blame for that has lain as much with the management over the years as with the work force, whether it has been a lack of communication, policy changes or industrial relations. In recent months and years, the employees of Leyland have done their bit to make the company more successful. With cause, they are tired of continuous change, of being the butt of music hall jokes and of an uncertain future.

I shall deal briefly with Leyland Bus before talking about the main problem of Leyland Trucks. Under the management buy-out that is shortly to be completed, Leyland Bus is making good progress. I supported the management buy-out as the best available option and I continue to do so. I hope that as Ian McKinnon, George Newburn and the others who are running the company get more involved in its operation, they will involve the employees more than perhaps has been the case in the past.

I am especially delighted to welcome—I gather that it is not yet been absolutely confirmed — the fact that Leyland Bus has obtained a new order from the Kowloon Motor Bus Company in Hong Kong for 110 buses. That is a great tribute to the company's work. Hon. Members, especially my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, will know how hard we are still working to pull something out of the bag in Thailand and how important that is. The difficulty is that Leyland Bus makes large buses and the market has been increasingly for small buses because of deregulation. However, deregulation has provided what the public has wanted. It is sad for many people in my constituency and elsewhere that Ribble Buses now operates Mercedes buses whereas in the past it operated Leyland buses, but deregulation has saved the ratepayers of Lancashire county council nearly £6 million a year in subsidies, and that must be recognised.

Under the package that Leyland bus is trying to put together with Lancashire Enterprises for a retraining operation, the European social fund, which matches the money that the Government provide, has said that it will provide substantial sums. I understand that the Government are normally expected to reduce the bids that are submitted for matching funds from the social fund —that is called a policy of linear reduction—because, inevitably, far more companies apply than there is money to go round. Normally the reductions are of 40 per cent. to 50 per cent., and no exceptions are ever made. Therefore, I am particularly delighted that I have been able to meet the deadline of 12 o'clock last night and to persuade my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General to agree to a reduction in the linear reduction from between 40 per cent. and 50 per cent. to only 20 per cent. He has agreed to do that because of the exceptional circumstances confronting Leyland Bus in the town of Leyland. I am delighted at that good news, which is subject only to confirmation by the European Economic Community social fund. It demonstrates that the Government are prepared to listen when a local Member puts a case to Ministers.

I wish to deal with the particular problems of Leyland Trucks. In recent years Leyland Trucks has achieved more success than for many years. It now has the largest United Kingdom share of the truck market. That is evidence of a good product, a good design, of the fact that the work force has put its back into the job, and of improved productivity. Nevertheless, the problems of falling export markets, substantial losses, over-capacity in the European and world truck market and, above all, the need for reinvestment must be faced.

I shall look at the facts of the Leyland-DAF deal, first, in terms of over-capacity. My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) knows only too well the problems that have confronted Bedford Commercial Vehicles Ltd. because of the difficulties of the market. Leyland Trucks has also faced those problems. There are more trucks being made than there are people prepared to buy them. The losses generated in the past few years are familiar to all hon. Members, particularly those who take an interest in these matters. My constituents associated directly with the company, as well as those who are not, understand only too well that these losses cannot be allowed to continue. The company is haemorrhaging cash to the extent of £1·5 million a week and that cannot continue.

The alternative options to the Leyland-DAF deal are worse than the deal. On the information provided to me, I am convinced that if the Leyland-DAF deal does not go ahead the Rover Group will be forced to reduce further the number of jobs in the short term and to close the company in the long term. I am not prepared to tolerate that.

Taxpayers—and that means all of us—have invested substantial sums in the company. I know that no matter how committed and understanding my constituents are about the problems of Leyland, even they would be pushed to agree to invest more funds in the company. We may regret that fact of life, but it is, nevertheless, a fact of life.

DAF is known to Leyland Trucks. All the reports I have suggest that the present operation with DAF is extremely successful. People like DAF, the trucks and the arrangement. Everything is going well. DAF is not unfamiliar. The DAF deal will provide more export outlets both within the EEC and in other parts of the world over and above the existing outlets that Leyland has in the Third world and Africa. DAF will put in £150 million of reinvestment.

Nevertheless, my overriding anxiety, and I suspect the anxiety of all hon. Members, whatever their view, is that many people will lose their jobs. That is intolerable and frightful under any circumstances. However, the redundancies will take place over a long period and the settlements are exceptionally generous. I know that the Department of Employment, both locally and regionally, is doing all it can to provide facilities on site for retraining, job hunting and all its other undertakings. That will be small help; it is not a substitute, but it will help in some way.

We shall also see the continuity of the design centre and LAPland as the Leyland assembly plant is known in my part of the world. It is an important, modern, efficient operation. There may be reductions in the work force, but essentially the future for both those areas is as strong as it ever could be.

Finally, we are being offered the chance of a flotation in two or three years' time on the Dutch and United Kingdom stock markets. I have a commitment from my right hon. Friend that he will encourage DAF and Leyland to ensure that employees get a fair crack of the whip.

Those are facts of the deal but several questions must be asked on behalf of my constituents and others. But, first, I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Minister of State and his predecessor my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Morrison) who have been extremely tolerant of the delegations that I have been able to bring. I pay great tribute to the leaders of the trade unions locally who, while understandably frustrated, uncertain and worried on behalf of their members, have on numerous occasions, in rational, reasoned and tolerant ways, put forward their ideas about the future. Their members owe them a great tribute for what has been done on their behalf.

Members of the council across the political divide have come to see Ministers and have been heard. That is all to the good. Hon. Members will know that I have asked questions, deposited petitions and made as much noise as I often do about matters relating to my constituency.

The nub of the problem is the 50:50 split to which the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) addressed his remarks. It is suggested that I am opposed to such a split and actively favour a 60:40 split. That is not true. Obviously, I would prefer an equal merger and I said so in December when the statement about talks with DAF and Paccar was made. But the company's negotiating position is not strong. My investigations and discussions with senior management and Ministers show clearly that the original split was more likely to be 75:25 and that the pressure from Ministers and others led to a change in the proportions. In addition, the proportion of the two companies' assets is now 60:40. DAF would not accept anything less. Perhaps in reply my hon. Friend the Minister will confirm that, broadly speaking, that is the position. In those circumstances, I have supported a 60:40 split rather than raise false hopes of anything else. Surely that must be prudent on behalf of one's constituents.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the two-level board split is unsatisfactory and I invite the Government to press more strongly for a fairer split of the board. If DAF is worried about having a majority, the difference between one, two or three out of nine will not make any difference. Therefore, I hope that it will consider that carefully.

There is a problem with the engine plant. Where will the DAF engines come from? What will Leyland Bus do, because it uses the TL11 and wants to continue doing so? I hope the possibility of some sort of limited manufacture of the TL11 engine, to name but one, can be put together in the interests of Leyland Bus and others. I am doing what I can to assist that and it may be possible, but I put it no higher than that.

I am also worried about the pension fund. In a recent letter I raised the problem about the constitution of the trustees and who was responsible with Mr. Graham Day, the chairman of the company. He wrote back on a number of points, but he concluded his remarks by saying:

"Details of the structure of and the trust deeds of a new Leyland DAF scheme are not yet available."

I appreciate that there are problems, but we need to know, as soon as possible, on behalf of those who are involved, that their future, in terms of the pension scheme, are secure.

Fourthly, there is the problem of communication. Hon. Members will know that I have raised on numerous occasions, privately and publicly, my concern about the poor quality of communications in the company. There is no need to go into the reasons for that; it may be something to do with constant management changes. Trade union leaders and representatives at all levels, no matter what their political or industrial persuasions, say that communication could and must be improved. Therefore, I was delighted to read a report in The Guardian last Thursday in which Mr. Frank Sweens, DAF's director of social policy and a member of the company's executive board, said:

"DAF . . . would like to introduce new industrial relations procedures into Britain.

These could revolutionise some practices and eventually involve several works councils, elected by employees, with guarantees of access to management at regular meetings."

It must be said, to those who understand these matters, that in Holland the standards of employee-employer relationships are better than almost anywhere in the world. We can learn from that. Mr. Sweens goes on to say:

"I can understand why workers are still worried—that if things go bad, they fear we would bring production back to Holland. But that is not logical. No company is willing to destroy that capital and we do not have the capacity in Holland. We intend to grow and make profits."

There is hope. I and my hon. Friend the Member of the European Parliament for Lancashire, Central (Mr. Welsh) share the prospect of going to Eindhoven, seeing the chairman of DAF and discussing some of the points that he raises and that I have raised. I hope that that will go some way towards demonstrating my commitment and concern on behalf of my constituents.

Fifthly, I keep pressing the Government—I hope that they will react to that pressure — for much more competitive finance for export deals. That is a continuing problem, and something that we need to develop. We talked about the Thailand deal and how much was done, although we do not yet have the order. That demonstrated that we can put a package together. We need to examine whether we can do that more frequently and more effectively. Those are the questions that need to be answered.

I shall now say a word or two about the Opposition. I resent the suggestion that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) made in the House some months ago, that the General Motors deal was a plot devised by Conservative Members and others to do Leyland down. I must tell him, in his absence, that many of my constituents now feel that the General Motors deal might have solved matters. I recognise the problems that are facing General Motors and my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West, but that is as a result of things that happened some time ago. The right hon. Gentleman and his allies have a lot to answer for. Many of my constituents feel that most strongly, and they are not all Conservative supporters.

I object to this inherent talking-down of the north-west. We have a devil of a lot going for us. Leyland, despite what anyone else may say, is not a one-industry town. It is part of the constituency and borough of South Ribble, where there is a devil of a lot going on, whether it be Baxi, which makes fires and is taking on new people, British Aerospace, the most successful aerospace company in the world, or smaller companies such as Norlec, which is expanding and developing all the time. It was announced the other day that British Car Auctions at Walton Summit is about to expand its operations because it is so successful. There is a lot of good news, and talking down the north and north-west does not help other people to understand how important that area is. I could accuse the Opposition — particularly in view of the vast numbers who are present tonight—of being a little two faced. I heard an Opposition Front Bencher say, "Could be better, this deal, but I am not complaining." He would not admit that publicly, but he said it privately. I have a great deal of respect for the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East — [Interruption.] It was not he who said it. I shall not deploy that now; the hon. Gentleman to whom I refer knows who he is. I have evidence which I will show if necessary.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East speaks with authority on these matters in the Labour Party. He should be providing more leadership and guidance to those who need it in this difficult time. Instead of many Opposition Members using cheap slogans, which do not address the problems and which mislead people, we need to talk about and understand the problems and guide the people who, understandably, are angry, frustrated and depressed.

With regard to the Labour Party, one expects that point of view, but what I object to extremely strongly is the attitude of the Liberal party. It is two faced. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) said in December how keen he was on the DAF deal. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), in his absence, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made his statement recently, said that he was in favour of the Paccar deal. On a number of matters he was inaccurate. He said that there was a plant in Lancaster. My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) will be delighted to learn that, but there is not one. The hon. Gentleman suggested that there would be 20,000 job losses, and that all the jobs would go to Holland. He was wrong and should have the grace to admit so. He has been inaccurate and his scaremongering has been a discourtesy to my constituents and to the House. However, we have come to expect that of the Liberal party. It will jump on any bandwagon which is going in any direction as long as there is a future in it for it.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the hon. Member acknowledge that in the early reports of the proposal we were hoping for a joint venture, which was a 50:50 split?. The 60:40 split required some consideration. Will he further acknowledge, therefore, that the consequences of the loss of control to Holland has led to a situation where, according to some people in the trade unions, the Dutch Government have said that there will be no redundancies in Holland, even if there are redundancies in the United Kingdom? Does the hon. Gentleman believe that that is within the spirit or legality of the treaty of Rome, and does that give assurances for the future?

Mr. Atkins: I shall quote, from Hansard, the words of the hon. Member for Yeovil. He did not mention a 50:50 split. He said:

"Does the Minister accept that, of the two options before us, the DAF option is preferable? — [Official Report, 2 December 1986; Vol. 106, c.765.]

I shall need notice of an examination of the treaty of Rome, since I do not pretend to be a constitutional expert, and I am not prepared to make an off-the-cuff judgment. Perhaps I could write to the hon. Gentleman, as Ministers often say.

Leyland Trucks has hit rock bottom. Many expert commentators in the industry, and outside it, reckoned that this had to happen. A prominent sales director, the chairman of the Leyland Truck Distributors Association, has described what is happening, in the context of the Leyland-DAF deal, as excellent news. That is someone who knows the market. He understands the problems and he has made it quite clear what his view is. Having said that, for too long the employees have been pushed around, morale has sunk to rock bottom and they are uncertain of the future. This is a lifeline, perhaps the only hope for a brighter future. I do not accept that there is an argument for delay, which has been advanced by some hon. Members. The losses will continue, the market place will not improve, and who will pay?

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): I come from the engineering industry and I often hear, from Government Benches, about losses and taxpayers' moneys. I wish, on occasions, that Conservative Members would have the same concern when it comes to farmers and the massive subsidies that they receive from the taxpayers; evidently they can put into storage all kinds of food which cannot be consumed. Will the hon. Gentleman justify that, because he says that we can no longer afford to do that for industries such as engineering? What is the hon. Gentleman's attitude to other industries besides engineering?

Mr. Atkins: You might draw me to account, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I were to venture into an agricultural debate.

Mr. Eastham: Answer the question.

Mr. Atkins: I take the point. I do not wish to develop this at length, but the hon. Gentleman might be surprised to know that I have some sympathy with his point of view. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is seeking to address that problem at this very moment. He is having great difficulty because the farming community is understandably concerned about its future, and we must recognise that as well.

I recognise the understandable concern, depression, frustration and anger of many of my constituents who work at Leyland Trucks, and it is because of that that I shall support the Government tonight, not because the Government have told me to. I am not so important that one vote matters either way and I am sure that Ministers would understand if I felt that I had to vote against the Government tonight. But the House knows full well that I am not frightened of fighting my corner, and I defer to no one in my support for British industry and for the industry in my constituency. I shall vote for the Government's motion because, having examined all the options to the best of my ability, I believe that the DAF deal holds out the best prospect of survival for the long-term future of the trucks division.

The most important relationship of a Member of Parliament, after that with his maker and his wife, is that with his electorate. In my party a Member of Parliament is not a delegate, mandated to vote certain ways on difficult issues, but, none the less, we must justify our actions to those who put us here when the election comes. It is very easy to be a populist of Left or Right to take the easy option in the belief that one's constituents will regard one in higher esteem. We are all guilty of that to some degree, but there comes a time when one must make a judgment, take a stance, give some advice. One gives the advice that one thinks is right and one must rest on the consequences. That I have tried to do throughout the past few days, weeks and months. I rest on that, and I am prepared to stand by it now and whenever.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Three shop stewards from my constituency have visited the House today and we have been involved in discussions in an effort to keep another engineering plant in my constituency from going broke and out of business. Like other hon. Members who represent northern constituencies and who have had a series of such meetings over the past few years, I have sympathy for the constituents of the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) who will be made redundant. I join in the tribute to the work force at Leyland for the way in which it has succeeded and has improved the operations there over recent times.

However, when the hon. Gentleman bewails and acknowledges the mismatch between the capacity in the truck industry and the size of the market for trucks, I must tell him that his Government have played a part in bringing that about. One of the reasons for the massive over-capacity in the truck industry, as indeed in many other industries, is that over the past seven or eight years Britain has faced a severe depression brought about directly as a result of the Government's economic policies. If the Government had pursued different economic policies and had been prepared to co-operate internationally much more, we might not have seen such a substantial depression in the truck market which has led to the massive over-capacity to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

I share with the hon. Gentleman and with the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) some of the anxieties and the desire to have answers to some of the questions about the deal with DAF. I too would have prepared a 50:50 deal between Leyland and DAF. I cannot understand why, when there is a 60:40 deal, only two directors are on the board. If there were to be 40 per cent. share ownership, one would have thought that at least 30 per cent.—three of the nine directors—and possibly more, would have been representing Leyland on the board. The Minister must reply to those points and explain why there is such a small representation on the board of directors and the management board.

I should also like the Minister to respond to questions that have been asked about the position in some of the subsidiaries and other parts of the enterprise, particularly that in Watford, which has been devastated and completely closed down as a result of this proposal. The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked about military vehicles and there is considerable anxiety about that matter. I should like the Minister to tell the House not only whether there were adequate consultations within the company, which the hon. Member for South Ribble has just raised with him, but whether there were any consultations with the Ministry of Defence about the implications of the closure of the Scammell plant before the decisions were taken. How will the vehicles that Scammell has made for years now for the Ministry of Defence be replaced? They are of vital significance and the Minister must tell the House exactly what will happen to those supplies.

[Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth]

The hon. Gentleman mentioned consultation within the company. I am pleased that he referred to the quotation from the personnel director of DAF. One of the major successes of recent times, which the Secretary of State rightly mentioned in his opening speech, is the improvement in industrial relations within the motor car industry. The Secretary of State referred to the Labour party's amendment to the Government motion, but he did not refer to the amendment in the name of myself and my hon. Friends in which we have retained some of the words in the Government's motion.

The Government are right to acknowledge and pay tribute to the improved industrial relations, and to recognise the valuable contribution made by the vehicle industry and the component suppliers. They are entirely entitled to that, but it is not sufficient just to say that. Improvements having been made on the industrial relations front, a further step remains to be taken to get to the position outlined by the director of DAF which his company wants to see within the new combine. Those are the sort of industrial relations that we should be importing from Europe. If the hon. Gentleman believes that those are the sort of industrial relations that should exist within British companies, I cannot understand why he supported his Government in opposing modest proposals such as those contained in the Vredeling directive and the fifth directive for the introduction of such industrial relations into British companies.

One reason for our not being opposed for ever and a day to the Rover Group remaining in the public sector is that we want to go further than that. As well as good industrial relations within the organisation and participation we want to see employee share ownership within the company. That obviously cannot be achieved unless the company is returned to the private sector.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Before the hon. Gentleman leaves that point, will he clarify it, because I am not sure that I heard him correctly? Is he stating that it is alliance policy that the Rover Group as a whole should be privatised? Is that the alliance position?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I will come to the alliance position in a moment. That position is outlined in the amendment that we have tabled to the Government motion. The Government are obsessed by privatisation which is diverting the management and work force of the company from the primary objective. Indeed, the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) stressed that point when he intervened in the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East. The primary objective is to make the company profitable and successful, to regain market share at home and abroad. When it has been profitable for five years, we can have the luxury of debating how and when the company should be privatised. We must keep the objective firmly in our sights of making the company profitable and ensuring that it is sustained in profit for some time. We can then worry about the ownership of the group.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: No, because many other hon. Members want to speak.

The alliance has consistently backed the long-term strategy of the company. We have welcomed the collaboration with Honda. I believe that that collaboration with Honda is one of the most important keys to a successful future for the Rover Group. That is so important because it provides the Rover Group with access to the Pacific basin and to the skills and technology available in the Honda group. In the long term, it will provide a firm basis for the Rover Group to continue as a volume car producer.

It would be difficult for Leyland to sustain that position on its own. Honda is of a size which makes the partnership a partnership of equals, one which I believe can and should be sustained and improved and will grow closer over the years. It is therefore most regrettable that its progress was impeded by the discussions which the Government initiated with Ford over the future of the Rover Group.

It is not surprising that Honda wonders about the Government's commitment to the future relationship when it finds that the Government have had discussions with Ford about selling the business to that company. Not only did that impede the growing relationship between Honda and the Rover Group; it created great uncertainty in the market place and among the dealer network which is such a key part of the future of the Rover Group.

The company's achievements in recent years have been considerable. Productivity has now risen to levels comparable with European plants. Quality has improved, with warranty claims being cut by half in the past four years. Absenteeism is now below the industrial average and the industrial relations climate has improved to the extent of a two-year pay deal aimed at harmonising blue and white-collar conditions of work and last year was a strike-free year.

Last Wednesday I visited the Cowley plant and looked at the technology which has been introduced there, which matches the technology being operated at Longbridge. There is no doubt that the country can be proud of the company. The investment has been very successful and performance is now being achieved in the plants which matches the best in the world. There is still room for further improvement, but remarkable progress has been made.

For the past three years, until the writing off of the £750 million Leyland Vehicles debt, the company has received no financial assistance in the form of loans or equity. The downside is that the Rover Group's production has fallen to 410,000 vehicles in 1986 from 611,000 in 1978. Its market share fell from 17·9 per cent. in 1978 to 15·8 per cent. in 1986. That figure has now improved and that is very welcome. I congratulate the company on pulling back those figures. Operating losses have occurred in every year since 1981, except 1983. The loss for the whole of 1986 is expected to be about £120 million.

With the model range begun in the late 1970s now complete, the company badly needs resources to fund a new model range. Clearly the resources are unlikely to come adequately from profits. Instead of rushing to divest the group of many of its activities to speed privatisation, the Government should have backed professional management and a highly skilled work force with a commitment to a future model programme which gave certainty for a long enough period to ensure that the company could build on recent successes and return to substantial profits.

The decision fully to fund the AR8 and the detailed agreement with Honda on the models being produced with that company are welcome. However, it will be important to monitor the level of United Kingdom content in those models. The company claims that the content at present in the Rover 800 model is 85 per cent. measured by ex-factory prices. It has stated that its aim is to achieve EEC content as close to 100 per cent. as possible. Clearly it is in the interests of this country that the components are sourced as far as possible from suppliers in the United Kingdom.

The postponement of a clear decision on the Metro replacement—the AR6—is more worrying. Although the Minister referred to the investment of £200 million on the K series engine and related gearbox developments, there is no clear commitment in the corporate plan about the Metro replacement. As the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said, there is a danger and fear that we may see a reskinning of the Metro rather than the development of a new model.

The Times motor correspondent on 10 February suggested that the company had cut £80 million from the estimated £250 million invested in the new model. If the decision on the small car replacement is taken too late and a mistake is made once again of soldiering on with an outdated small car range, including the reprieve of the Mini, which is now 30 years old, there will be too great a dependence on Honda in the relationship.

Even with the booming domestic car market, the prospect of the Rover Group achieving an early increase in market share is clearly limited. With Ford increasing production from 380,000 to 450,000 by 1988-89, Vauxhall increasing from 220,000 to 300,000 and Nissan building up to 100,000 by 1991, the Rover Group is clearly operating in a very tough market. Although there is a welcome build-up in the number of British-built cars to be sold in the United Kingdom, the future of Rover remains clouded. I hope that when the Minister replies he will give a commitment to the long-term support of the company's plans so that it can edge back its markets share in the face of that competition and ensure that it becomes profitable for some years to come.

The decline of the motor industry generally lies in many ways at the heart of the massive deterioration of the manufacturing trade balance which the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade identified in its report in 1985. Of the turnround of nearly £12 billion between 1978 and 1984, some £3 billion was accounted for by motor vehicles and components. That is a substantial part of the turn-round in the balance of payments deficit in manufactured goods. Clearly, that has been caused, to a considerable extent, by the economic policies pursued by the Government in their early years of office from 1979 to 1981 when there were crippling exchange rates and high interest rates which have been sustained since then. Those are an enormous burden on industry and especially on the motor car industry.

The Secretary of State rightly paid tribute to the success of Jaguar. However, there is no doubt that one reason why Jaguar has been so successful is the advantage that it has obtained on the exchange rate balance with the United States. The relationship between the dollar and the pound is giving the company an edge in United States markets that has helped it to be successful.

As well as backing the Rover Group and supporting the industry in the long term, I hope that the Government will provide economic policies to help not only the industry but all manufacturing industry to succeed and grow and to beat the competition from overseas. Central to that are interest rates and the exchange rate. I hope that in the Budget next week the Chancellor of the Exchequer will substantially reduce interest rates, announce that Britain will join the European monetary system to underpin that reduction, and pursue an exchange rate policy to help manufacturing industry to compete in markets abroad and ensure that Rover and the rest of the British motor industry not only keep their market share but increase it in years to come.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I repeat Mr. Speaker's appeal for brevity. Many hon. Members with strong constituency interests hope to speak in the debate.

8.40 pm

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Any debate on the British motor industry should mention one area in which we have been predominantly successful for many years. I refer to the nation's ability to design some of the world's finest formula 1 racing cars. We are without equal in all aspects of motor racing, be it formula 1, formula 3 or formula Ford car racing. Dozens of manufacturers are engaged in producing such cars for a highly discerning market, not just in Britain but throughout the world.

We have firms such as Lotus, Williams, McLaren, Benetton and Lola, and drivers such as Nigel Mansell who perform in 19 countries in a sport that is watched by more people than any other sport in the world. It also provides a good and successful testing area for new initiatives and designs such as the active suspension system, which forecasts the state of the road in front of the car before it travels over that area. All those items are translated back into the motor industry for use on everyday passenger cars. We should endorse the substantial abilities of our engineers in the competitive world of motor sport.

It is good news all the way for the motor industry, especially this year. At long last, we are beginning to push back the import penetration that was described by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. We are now below 50 per cent. import penetration, and this is reflected by the increased activity of all our car manufacturers. We all know about Jaguar, with its commitment this year to take on another 700 workers. We know about the amazing turnround experienced by Peugeot-Talbot, which is now exporting cars back to Europe. Lotus, under the ownership of General Motors, is ready to invest a substantial sum in a new factory in East Anglia. We should also congratulate Ford, which is No. 1 in the market place. It is a well-known and well-respected British manufacturer which has done much to provide the resources for our manufacturing industry during the past 10 to 15 years—and, of course, the past 75 years. It celebrated its 75th birthday last year. Vauxhall, too, is working hard to re-establish itself as a British manufacturer.

We are boosted by competitive United Kingdom currency, good productivity and attention to quality and delivery at the right time. Those are all criteria to provide the success that our motor industry is on the verge of turning into a roaring success.

The Rover Group is doing especially well. In the United States, the new car has been extremely well received, with more than 1,000 cars sold in the first 12 days. The importers forecast that, in the latter part of this decade, and certainly by 1990, about 90,000 Sterling cars will be required each year for the United States market. I need hardly mention what sort of income that is likely to bring to the United Kingdom economy. If those figures are achieved, that one product will earn between £2 billion and £3 billion. The importers in the United States claim that the figures will be achieved.

Recently, I visited Dallas, and spent an evening with the vendor of the Sterling car in that city. He said, "You build them, and I will sell them." He had already sold the first 13 cars, including his demonstrator. He apologised for driving us round in a Cadillac, which cost $10,000 more than the Sterling and was only half as good, and said that he had 35 Sterlings on back order and had closed his order books, although he insisted that he wanted quality, not quantity.

Indeed, the Japanese press has been saying how good our Sterling is in Japan, where Honda builds it. The report of a recent road test in Japan said that, except for one or two little niggles — these were not quality faults, but windows that do not wind down electronically in one go at the touch of a button so that the driver can pay his money on the many toll roads in Japan — the Sterling was the finest car currently available on the Japanese market. That says a great deal for the design expertise of Austin Rover engineers, who have built a product similar to the Honda car but have made a better job of it.

The Austin Rover sales for February were the best for 13 months, showing a 17·14 per cent. share of the United Kingdom market. Exports to Spain — a large growth area for the company — are up by 54 per cent., and exports to France this year are up by 13 per cent. That is encouraging news.

My constituents in Northfield, where the Longbridge plant is situated, welcome the Government's support for the Rover Group board's corporate plan, because it sets out a sound future for development and prosperity in the city of Birmingham. It has been earned only because of the productivity of the factory and the quality of the product that it is turning out, as the work force consistently gains quality bonus payments as a result of producing goods right first time on the production line.

We welcome the introduction of the new K series engine, which will give the Rover Group a technological lead over many competitors, as the other manufacturers look at ways of improving engine efficiency with their existing designs before investing, at very high cost, in new ceramic technology in the next century. Austin Rover has a window of opportunity, with a highly efficient and technologically advanced engine in the K series with which to exploit the market place in the United Kingdom and Europe.

With a new engine, we need a new car. Some hon. Members, including the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), have said, "Where is the AR6? We do not want a reskinned Metro." Nor do we in the area, in the company or anywhere else. Any new car will be just that, whether it is the so-called AR6 design, which has been completed in prototype form, or a more advanced design based on the existing Metro size but featuring a new suspension, gearbox, engine and almost everything else. I am convinced that, whatever the company produces, it has a track record, starting with the Mini, the 1100, the 1800 and the present Metro, of providing the best package of its size and type of any car manufacturer. Whatever it produces will be a successful car.

As to whether the company will remain in volume production, Mr. Day is on record as saying that the company is not coming out of volume production, which is why it has signed a deal with Honda to produce the AR8, which will probably be made at Longbridge. What sort of quantity can we expect? The figures are not forthcoming from the company, but it has been suggested that, all things being equal and with a range of models based on the AR8, a figure of 6,000 units a week is not unrealistic.

If we add the figures for the AR8 to those for the new super-K Metro, we could have a car plant producing more than 500,000 cars a year by the end of this decade — something that will have an enormous effect on the profitability of the business and on all the component suppliers in the west midlands and the country. That augurs well for the partnership with Honda. It is a partnership of equals so that in the latter part of this century we can develop the automobile in conjunction with one of the most advanced car manufacturers in the world.

The people of Birmingham warmly welcome the successful negotiations with regard to Freight Rover, for which I have a particular affection. I spent five years of an engineering apprenticeship with its predecessor, Morris Commercial, and I involved myself in the original design of the predecessor to the present Sherpa van, of which the only common panel is the roof panel. This is a breathtaking opportunity for the company. It has the full support of the work force which, on the day after my right hon. Friend announced approval of the corporate plan, was on television saying that it was the best bit of news it had had in years. People were saying how much they were looking forward to working with DAF, which will unlock the key of Europe for that company in producing a much larger range of vehicles.

Indeed, putting the DAF name on the front of a van or truck is very much like putting the name of Rolls-Royce on the front of a Metro. DAF is well respected throughout Europe as a substantially well engineered truck and if it is putting its name on a Freight Rover van or a Leyland Roadrunner truck, it must enable that product to reach a far wider and more discerning European market then ever before. The deal between Freight Rover and DAF inspires confidence.

DAF has put it on record that it intends to double output from around 20,000 a year to 40,000. It is providing the investment for the new van, which is currently being drawn up in prototype form at the Washwood Heath plant. It required a substantial investment to bring that into production. Rover Group did not have the money to do it separately, but will now have to do it in conjunction with DAF. It augurs well for Birmingham and the local economy. Birmingham will certainly benefit enormously.

My right hon. Friend may care to know that the people of Birmingham, my constituents and many others who work in the motor industry within that region fully support the Government's corporate plan and view with confidence the future of the business and will work extremely hard because, in the end, it is up to them to make it the success we all wish for.

8.52 pm

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): When Conservative Members have finished posturing, the question of jobs should still be paramount in this debate. It is encouraging that, once again, Britain's car plants are engaging employees, increasing production and productivity and committing themselves to forward investment to continue to raise the quality and quantity of the product. However, recognition should be given to the fact that part of the resurgence is due to currency movements, particularly in the sourcing of components, and we have a long way to go to make any impact on the thousands of jobs that we have lost in the west midlands alone in the previous decade.

Recently, as the Secretary of State said, over half the cars sold in Britain were actually made here, but we still have the position whereby a car with engine, gearbox, steel body panels, fascia, instruments, steering gear and brake parts all coming from Japan can still claim to have a 50 per cent. local content. It is clear that a new method of assessment is urgently needed, based on 80 per cent. local content, before it qualifies as European in origin and measured in terms of the actual cost of the vehicle. Such a method would encourage British components manufacturers to step up investment in research, development and production and provide more jobs.

Before hon. Members get too euphoric, they should realise that overall profits are still non-existent—or, at best, thin. In the past three years, the industry has received nothing from the Chancellor, unless one counts the previous Budget when vehicle excise duty was left unchanged. At present the Chancellor takes some £14 billion in road user taxes, including £820 million in car tax, collected by the industry for the Government, and about a further £700 million in unrecoverable VAT paid by companies on car purchase. Yet he refuses to do anything about the unique car tax, although the money lost by its abolition would probably be recovered by increased sales, and that again would lead to an increase in jobs.

In the words on the Order Paper, the Government recognise the valuable contribution made by the vehicle industry but fail to accept the need for a wholly owned British component in that industry and follow a strategy, if it can be called that, of indecent haste in getting rid of those companies in public ownership, irrespective of the consequences.

Despite acknowledged over-capacity in the industry, additional competitors are encouraged with grants and green field sites in the car sector, while in the lorry sector, because the Government are not prepared to try to rejuvenate that part of the industry, they hand over majority control to a relatively tiny, marginally profitable Dutch company, far from dominant in world markets. For DAF, the deal that gives it control of Leyland Trucks also provides entry to the van portion of the market. It gives it first class facilities—with the possible exception of the foundry which could have done with some investment in it—and an up-to-date model range. As if that was not enough, the profitable Freight Rover is thrown in to make the deal more tempting, plus a write-off of £750 million of our previous investment. In time the new company can be sold off to private investors, which is the only consistent part of Government policy.

The immediate effects in Britain are the loss of 2,260 jobs at Leyland Trucks. That will have a domino effect on suppliers such as Cummins in Scotland and CAV, to name but two of the many suppliers, arising from the closure of Scammell, the foundry and the engine shop, plus the danger of further erosion of the 96 per cent. British content of Leyland Trucks by the possible sourcing of cabs from a Spanish company.

It is unfortunate, to say the least, that the British Government do not have the same confidence in their company as the Dutch Government have in DAF or the French in Renault. If they had, the deal could have been done the other way round or, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) suggested, on a 50:50 basis, particularly as Leyland has 18 per cent. of the United Kingdom market while DAF has only 5 per cent. or 6 per cent. at the heavy end of the market. However, that presumes an industrial strategy which the Government do not have and a real recognition of the motor industry as the core of manufacturing industry, with a substantial contribution to make in the retention of industrial skills and minimising the brain drain.

The Government could remove obstacles to the success of British hauliers and their capacity to place orders for lorries. They could adjust the balance of the annual vehicle tax, which is £987 on a 38-tonne lorry on average in the Common Market compared with £3,100 in Britain. In Belgium, it is £624, but some hauliers qualify for a 65 per cent. reduction, which cuts it to £218. The tax on diesel fuel in Britain is 31p a gallon more than the average in the Common Market, which costs our hauliers £465 million more than their competitors last year. What sort of incentive is that?

Massive efforts and acceptance of change by workers and management in BL have led only to the loss or erosion of their jobs as their companies became viable and were sold off or merged with foreign competitors because the Government do not have the commitment to a wholly owned British section of the industry or the belief that we have the skills and ability to break into international markets. All that the Government want to do is wash their hands of the business as quickly as possible. We cannot endorse their policies.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): As always, I declare an active financial interest in the retail motor industry. Having worked in it for 20 years, I suggest that that at least enables me to comment with some knowledge in this debate if on no other occasion.

I wholly endorse the motion of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I thank him and the Minister of State for the constructive way in which they have assisted me in my inquiries on behalf of my constituents in Oxford who are concerned with the Austin Rover plant at Cowley.

Over the past year the Cowley plant, and Oxford in general, has been awash with rumour and speculation, the vast majority of it ill-founded but real. It was based on real fears and concerns about the future of the company when there was so little hard fact to go on in advance of the corporate plan being produced, and so many wild rumours and assertions were floated, it has to be said, by Opposition Members from time to time, and in the press.

In recent weeks, since the disclosure of the Ford talks, which I am glad did not come to fruition, but which I was perfectly prepared to see take place, on the ground that I do not believe that it is wise ever to shut one's mind to the opportunity of making progress in the volume car sector, we have had contradictory pieces of news. Within a week of an announcement of 400 white-collar job losses, there was an announcement of 500 job gains on the Montego line. Undoubtedly, people wanted to know whether that was good or bad news or whether there were any straws in the wind that could be picked out.

We must look at the corporate plan to see where it leads us and at some of the specific questions that arise out of it and affect Cowley. Several were set out by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). I believe that it is possible to answer them, on close examination of the plan.

The corporate plan made one point that must be made about the lure impetus of privatisation. I believe, and I think that most objective observers know, that only over the past few years has the commitment to self-sufficiency and the concept of denationalisation brought the whole of the British Leyland group—and its new form as the Rover Group—to the state where it has been prepared to look at profitability in the detail and with the commitment that it does now.

The corporate plan gave Rover everything that it asked for, as the Secretary of State said. It committed the company to a full model range, although it did not say precisely what it was, and it committed it to maintaining volumes, although it did not comment on expanding them. The plan talked about the need for better quality. We have seen that emerging in the Sterling 800 series, made in Cowley. It talked about the need for constructive collaboration with Honda.

Before I deal specifically with those points, I should like to deal with some outstanding issues raised by the plan as they affect Cowley. There was a great deal of concern in Cowley about the fact that the AR8 was going to Longbridge rather than to Cowley. There was a natural concern, which I expressed when I first heard the news. People said, "As we made the Maestro and Montego at Cowley, why did we not get the AR8?" That is important, and I hope that the House will recognise it.

We understand that the AR8 is not of itself specifically a replacement for the Maestro/Montego. That marketing and concept decision has yet to be made. I am given to understand that it would have been rather more expensive to have contemplated stopping the Maestro/Montego facility in Cowley and then retooling and commencing the AR8 than will be the case in Longbridge.

Thirdly, the model splits in recent years show that the Maestro, the Montego and the 800 have all gone to Cowley. It is reasonable to say that in the long-term context the decision to send the AR8 to Longbridge is in no way an adverse reflection on Cowley.

Did the absence of the AR6 put in doubt volume production and mean that we were no longer committed to a small vehicle? That is not necessarily the case. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East can be reassured, because the clear understanding is that the AR6 was very much at concept stage when it was being discussed.

The K series engine, the commitment to existing Metro volumes and the philosophy that Mr. Day has publicly expounded of a commitment to model-by-model quality and to the upgrading of each model into market niches fits quite happily into the concept of saying that the AR6—such as it ever was—is not a concept with which we specifically want to proceed at this stage. In no sense does that mean that the company is not still committed, as the corporate plan says, to a full range of products.

The issue of volume is crucial, because if the company is to continue as a volume producer we must start to put some numbers on the volumes—not least because, if the company has in two plants a theoretical capacity of about 800,000 units and if we are talking about unit volumes that will remain at about 354,000, then the reference by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East to the so-called BMW solution clearly emerges as a practical runner. Whatever else that would do, in all probability it would mean one-plant operation. I say that quite openly, because I have addressed this on behalf of my constituents in Cowley and I am concerned that they should share with me the reassurance, stemming from the present market situation, that we will continue with two-plant production.

The figures do not show a happy trend. Production has fallen from the 1978 figure of 611,000 to just over 400,000 in 1986. However, there is now conflicting evidence about economic levels of volume production. That evidence emerges when the old-fashioned idea of a single dedicated line which involved the writing off of the entire tooling costs over a very considerable number of units is compared with the modern concept of flexible tooling, where a great deal of the capital cost can be rolled into a subsequent model.

The best evidence that one can adduce is that because of robotics, the impact of flexible manufacturing and not least the impact of model range—one should look not just at the number of units that a company produces but at the number of units per model—the sort of figure that we have to consider in Austin Rover is larger than the 410,000 to 420,000 figure that we saw in 1986. Any corporate plan has to look at about 500,000 units to be a viable economic proposition. I think that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) spoke about that. Can we look to that sort of production figure? At the moment, the evidence is rather good.

I welcome the impetus behind the resurgence of the Mini but I am not so sure that the Secretary of State for Social Services, with his AIDS campaign, would entirely approve of the moral tone adopted in the Christmas advertising campaign for the Mini. However, it certainly had an impact on sales. The important thing about the Mini is that in France, for example, it is still a cult car and leads people into Austin Rover showrooms where the other excellent products are on display. As long as the Mini is there and since its capital cost is effectively written off, Austin Rover might as well keep producing and using it.

The outlook for Metro is optimistic. However, the one that pleases me most—I am sure that the House agrees—is the performance of the Montego. Since its effective relaunch, it has taken on a new lease of life. Its fleet performance is excellent and everything augurs well for the car. It had a disappointing start, having failed to convince the market either on perceived quality or reliability. It is now beginning to claw back and fleet owners are beginning to buy the car. On the back of that, Maestro is enjoying a resurgence. Earlier this year Maestro entered the list of top ten sellers. I am sure that the House will welcome the fact that British Telecom has placed an order for 5,000 Maestro vans worth £26 million. That is on top of van orders worth £140 million that have already been won by the company. Those orders exceed the 1986 total.

The 200 and 800 models have also been doing extremely well. The extra volume of sales has been derived not only from the Montego, the resurgent Mini and the Maestro, but from the export potential of the 800 model. The great thing about that is that the 800 is a high-value product and a great number of man hours, productive capacity and profits are involved. I believe that the figure of 500,000 units is not only achievable but likely. It is comforting to be able to look at a forecast and say it is not an optimistic or unreasonable one, but a solidly based forecast.

Bearing in mind the constraint on the length of speeches, I shall make one last reference to Honda. I do not share for one second the Opposition's fears about Honda. Japanese motor manufacturers want a European base. They do not have to come to Britain. Within the Common Market they may go to France or Germany or to one of the lower-cost economies such as Spain, Portugal or Greece. However, if the Japanese come here it is excellent news for Britain because that means the provision of additional jobs. However, if Honda comes to Britain, I hope that it will not adopt the Nissan solution —I say that advisedly. I accept that the Nissan deal introduced jobs to the British economy, but it also added another 100,000 units to the existing over-capacity in the market. To that extent, I believe that it was marginally counter-productive.

I believe that the Honda solution, wherein a Japanese manufacturer decides that the way into the European market is through collaboration with an existing manufacturer, using present capacity, is a sensible and productive solution for both companies. We should welcome that decision, because the Japanese skill and management techniques will benefit us and our style, design and ingenuity will benefit them. Between us, we can do well. Incidentally, we can beat Honda with the Sterling in the United Kingdom and in the United States.

Ironically, some of the trade unions, in their efforts to persuade us how appalling the Government have been in their treatment of British Leyland, have tended to denigrate the company. We need the press and others to leave the company alone for a while. They should stop knocking the company and allow it to get back on its feet and enjoy the position it deserves to hold. We must be constructive and committed both to future collaboration with Honda and to our present product range.

The present management at Austin Rover is the best and most realistic that we have ever had. That is reassuring news, not just for the plant at Longbridge but also for Cowley. If we have a motivated work force and management, we have no reason to fear the future of the British motor industry.

9.13 pm

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): I am glad to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I do so primarily because I am chairman of the north-west group of Labour Members who have a considerable interest in the manufacturing industries throughout the north-west, of which, of course, British Leyland is a major part.

I support the amendment moved by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). I shall refer to that part of the amendment that rejects the proposed "gift-wrapped surrender of control of Leyland Trucks and Freight Rover to DAF".

Leyland is not far from Preston. In fact, some of the Leyland work force live in a variety of constituencies in the Lancashire area. Leyland as a town has suffered from previous factory contractions. Loss of manufacturing has a spin-off effect locally, as it is generally understood. An appraisal of the present makes references to the past virtually inevitable and, within the limited time at my disposal, I shall make this apparent.

Leyland Trucks has assets of more than £150 million. They are to be given away, if the Government have their way, to a foreign competitor. Leyland Trucks has sustained tens of thousands of families in the Leyland area for more than 50 yars. DAF has everything to gain from the Government's proposals and British Leyland everything to lose. It is against that background that the Opposition, and particularly people in the north-west, reject the Government's proposals.

It has been said that the Dutch have looked after their interests extremely well in negotiations in recent weeks. There are nine directors on the main board, only two of them from Leyland. Decisions will clearly be taken by DAF, for DAF. As we all know, because it is history, the Government have failed to sell off Rover and Land Rover to General Motors. Following protests from midland Tory Members of Parliament, among others, the Government now believe, and the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) is convinced, that selling off Leyland Trucks to DAF will not be politically damaging. The future, certainly as far as the hon. Member for South Ribble is concerned, will answer that question.

Production of trucks involves high technology. It is a high-value, expanding industry. Leyland, with its new truck range, has an increasing share of a lucrative market and a worldwide reputation. DAF is being given Leyland's valuable and comprehensive distribution networks throughout the United Kingdom. More than 70,000 new commercial vehicles, valued at more than £1·5 billion, were registered in the United Kingdom last year. Leyland factories were used, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East rightly said, to support loss-making car plants over a decade.

The Ryder report showed, among other things, that, out of £74 million profits, £70 million was paid out in profit and only £4 million reinvested to replace aging plant and machinery. The £100 million investment came too late at exorbitant interest rate costs. This unjust debt burden forms a major part of the as yet to be proved—in spite of what the hon. Member for South Ribble said—£1·5 million which Leyland Vehicles is said to cost the taxpayer each week. No Conservative Member has produced the complete evidence to establish that point which is stated again and again in the hope, presumably, that people will inevitably accept it as the gospel truth. It is not. It has not been proved by anyone yet.

Over a decade ago Leyland Bus and Trucks had over 30,000 workers, of whom about 13,000 were at Leyland. Soon the total figure will be under 6,000—a massive 80 per cent. cut. Many famous companies were once owned by Leyland—AEC, Park Royal, Eastern Coach, Charles H. Roe, Guy, Bathgate and Bristol. They have all gone for ever. Are they to be followed by Scammell? Clearly they will be if the Government have their way.

At Leyland we have seen the closure of north works, south works, two engine plants, a tool room and foundry support plants. Now the Government propose that the remaining engine and foundry plants should also be closed. If Farington foundry goes, the manufacture of blocks for the industry will go too. The effect on the truck industry will be catastrophic. Leyland has a 400 engine which is a winner. The 430 engine is ready for operation. Ironically the highly successful DAF engine used in its popular heavy lorries is basically a Leyland 680 engine. To ditch engine manufacture and close the foundry is to rip the heart out of Leyland.

The work force of highly skilled designers, engineers and workers on the shop floor, with years of specialised knowledge, are to be denied their livelihood, although their commitment to Leyland Vehicles over many years is beyond doubt. There are in the Strangers' Gallery workers who have contributed 30 years each to the industry. The Government are prepared to scrap that involvement and commitment.

The insensitivity of Leyland management and of the Government reveals yet again, in spite of what has been said by Conservative Members, how much industrial relations have deteriorated since 1979. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry began the debate with a slander on the trade union movement which has struggled over many years to maintain a reasonable standard of living. He made cheap jibes against active trade unionists in the area. Those who are listening to the debate and those who will read reports of it will not be unduly surprised because that is the Government's belief.

I have been aware for more than 50 years that labour is just like other commodities within the capitalist system —it can be bought and sold as and when required. Few employers recognise that human labour power must be treated differently from raw materials and machines. It takes a long time for some employers to learn that lesson. Unhappily, many big concerns in this country, aided and abetted by Government legislation, still fail to learn that lesson.

The complete failure to consult the work force at Leyland about their aspirations and ideas about future manufacturing in Leyland is one of the cardinal sins of Leyland management and the Department of Trade and Industry. Departmental officers and Ministers may pretend that they have met the work force for consultations, but those whom they have met will tell the House, if they have the opportunity, that the consultations were always one-sided. "You will do what we decide", has been and remains the message from the Department of Trade and Industry. Workers who have invested their labour in an industry are entitled to a direct involvement in decisions that affect their future. I am sorry to say that that fact is seldom accepted within our system of production for private profit. To employers, financial gain is more important than human relations.

The Government refer to a write-off of £750 million, which includes redundancy pay and closure costs. It also includes the debt owed by Leyland factories and factories within the Rover Group. By international comparison, the Leyland Trucks debt is pathetically small. On average, British companies externally borrow 55 per cent. of their assets. In West Germany, the figure is 95 per cent. and in France it is 140 per cent. Japan has a massive 330 per cent. capital gearing.

The Government can and must insist on a change in the deal with DAF. A 50:50 partnership is a minimum requirement for a final agreement. That can be achieved by the Government making Leyland a financially attractive and equal partner to DAF, together with providing a firm commitment to manufacture engines at Leyland. If a 50:50 deal with DAF cannot be agreed, the Government should threaten to end our generous open-door policy to imports. A 50:50 deal involving equal partnership in decision making, with equal numbers on the board, is absolutely essential to the future of Leyland Vehicles. In the opinion of Opposition Members, nothing less than that will do.

We can all remember references to Britain being the workshop of the world. As I listen to some debates, I am often reminded that I was brought up within a few minutes' walk of Trafford park. Fifty or 60 years ago, I used to hear people talk about the greatest concentration of industry in Europe being within Trafford park. It could be said that Leyland has had a tremendous history of industrial development. A major decline in our manufacturing base has occurred since 1979—a massive contraction—leaving us with a huge import bill for manufactured goods.

A supplier to the motor industry, Lucas Industries Ltd., through Girling, produced brake units for the motor industry, but it completely closed its factory in Bromborough solely because it could make such units more cheaply outside the United Kingdom and import them into Britain. Given the Government's proposals for the DAF sell-out, how long will it be before DAF shifts production to Europe in pursuit of similar improvements in profit margins?

The present Government have allowed billions of pounds to be poured into our overseas competitors. They appear to believe that Britain's economic future lies in massive imports, in the interests of finance capital and the multinational conglomerates. The real interests of the British people, however, will be served by the rebuilding of our manufacturing industries, the control of overseas investment and the direction of major investment into research and development and the public sector—into houses, schools, roads, hospitals and people's welfare.

Our priorities must be to provide real opportunities for our young people to learn skills, to pursue educational growth and to lay a firm basis for improved standards of living for the underprivileged. The motor industry has a major part to play in that aim. Leyland Trucks, collaborating on equal terms in an equal partnership with DAF, could make a firm contribution to those goals. It is not too late for the Government to act. The next Labour Government will soon plan our economy to ensure a radical improvement in the quality of life for our people, and the sooner the better.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, may I remind the House that a large number of hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. If hon. Members limit themselves to 10 minutes each, all will be called.

9.31 pm

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I should say at once that my non-political experience has been completely and utterly in the motor industry, both in manufacturing and retailing. It is only right, therefore, that I should declare an interest.

When I look at the motion I see within it, despite the protestations of the Opposition parties, an example of the Government's commitment to Austin Rover in terms of the billions of pounds that have been spent upon subsidising and supporting that company over the years. Also when I look at the order I experience a moment of pure nostalgia when my eyes light upon the words "National Enterprise Board." The House will remember that the National Enterprise Board was set up when the last Labour Government went out to pick winners. The names Nexos, Twinlock and Inmos float before our eyes.

The motion is couched in both specific and general terms. I intend to deal with the specific problems that face the Rover Group. I make no apology for doing so. It makes a vital contribution to our economy. Nobody with experience and knowledge of the truck industry would argue that a deal had to be done to try to counter the massive over-capacity of truck production in Europe. If Ford thought that it was necessary to do a deal with Iveco —and I suggest that Ford know a little more about the truck market than Opposition Members — and if Bedford felt that it was necessary to do what they have done because they were unable to do a deal with Leyland, it was only natural, because fewer and fewer partners were available, that Leyland should do a deal with DAF. Indeed, it is most sensible that this should have happened.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) made a most thoughtful speech. He outlined the reasons for the deal. I know from personal experience and from talking to my hon. Friend that he spent a long time agonising over the difficulties that face him and his constituency. However, he also gave a little hint—that perhaps it was better that this deal should be done sooner rather than later. In fact, I was left with the impression that a deal with General Motors might have been better, if it had been made a year or so ago.

I find it amazing that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) laid the blame on the Government because he was a fundamental moving force in scuppering that General Motors deal and he is proud of that. I listened with equal amazement to his criticisms of the possible effects of the closures on Scammell. I remind him that Scammell is in Watford and General Motors, with its military vehicle capacity, is located at Luton and Dunstable. I could see perfectly that a deal might have come forward in which the military contracts of Scammell and Bedford could survive in the same area. However, such a possibility was scuppered by the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) is in the Chamber because I know that he has considered the effects this deal have on Watford. My hon. Friend is spending a great deal of time and trouble trying to make sure that the effects of the Leyland merger with DAF will have the minimum effect on his constituents.

I now turn to the car division in which Austin Rover's targets have, in the past, been changed and changed again almost on a monthly basis. From personal experience, I have never known a company to expand out of disaster. It must cut and trim back to a clean core of efficiency and then expand. I must confess that I am not a gardener, but those hon. Members who are will know that one has to cut out the dead wood before one can expand.

Time and time again, the Government have demonstrated their support for the Rover Group. Perhaps today, for the first time for a decade, the Rover Group has a better chance of expansion and growth than ever before. However, there are problems and certain past decisions must be overcome. I refer to decisions such as the choice of new technology and the fact that export markets were given such low priority during the Edwardes' administration. The focus then was on efficiency and labour productivity. No one lifted his eyes to the horizon to see what life would be like in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

The continuing problems of the Austin Rover Group can no longer be laid at the feet of the work force because, in line with every other car producer in the world, the company cannot sell all the cars that it can build. The remorseless drive towards productivity has been obvious in almost every British plant. With that there has also been a heart-warming commitment by many more manufacturers to source and build more in the United Kingdom. We have heard, for example, that Ford is to raise its investment in this country and to make another 70,000 cars next year, raising its total to about 450,000. Vauxhall is to raise its total from 200,000 to 300,000 over the next three years. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already mentioned what Peugeot-Talbot plans to do at Ryton in relation to the new family saloon.

Austin Rover has made tremendous strides in efficiency. It estimates that its productivity has increased from about 6 cars per man in 1979 to between 12 and 14 cars per man last year. That compares favourably with our continental competitors. However, we must be cautious about such forms of comparison because those calculations depend on the quantity of bought-in finished components that are included. Nevertheless, for all that, the work force has shrunk in the retreat from design, development and assembly to just assembly from a six figure number to below 50,000.

The future looks relatively secure because of the Government's vast commitment. However, the options are closing in remorselessly for the company if it is to be the master of its own destiny, free from Government, and from the designs and technology of foreign manufacturers in the future.

Over the past 10 years the Government have provided more than generously for Austin Rover, but I am apprehensive about the strategy of following the market down in the long term. That will mean an increasingly rapid loss of the ability to develop new models and that we shall become just an assembly platform for Honda in the United Kingdom. In turn that will bring an increasing reliance on Honda with the knock-on problems of loss of value added work, employment and technical capability. That was why I was delighted to hear the Government announce support for the K-series engine. That is an important stride back along the path that I have described

We must accept that Austin Rover is now a minnow in the world of mass vehicle production. BMW, ostensibly a maker of quality cars with a small market share in each of the countries to which it exports, produces more cars and retains a larger share of the profit with each one than does Austin Rover. From the sidelines it is difficult to know the required sales for Austin Rover to break even or to generate sufficient funds for the development of a range of new models.

Over the years we have had a series of different figures which have usually been of a lower and lower order. It seems increasingly difficult to achieve those figures through the growth of the home market alone, which is why the present efforts for exporting must be aggressively pursued. I understand that they have made some inroads into the fleet market, but I would not wish Austin Rover or any hon. Member to pin the future of the company on that sector.

Mr. Fallon: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is extraordinary that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), having an hour ago suggested that the whole Rover Group should be privatised, has suddenly lost interest in the debate and the welfare of his constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones)?

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend makes his point in a telling fashion. He will excuse me if I do not try to explain alliance policy. Alliance Members find it hard to explain their policies to themselves, let alone to the nation.

Bearing in mind your request to be brief, Mr. Speaker, I shall continue along my line. The Government must accept that if Rover is to have a future, an increasing reliance on Honda technology must be used only as a short-term crutch; the company must not depend on it in the long term. In future there must be strict agreement about the value added content of any of the deals carried out with Honda. Other countries insist on an active level of participation and Austin Rover would be wise to do exactly the same.

Austin Rover has a better chance of survival now than it has had in the past decade. It must continue its drive for quality, which has dramatically improved over the years. However, I must remind the company and hon. Members that its competitors have not stayed still. Austin Rover must attack its foreign market more aggressively and look to occupy a slot in the market, not perhaps so much for quantity, but certainly for quality. It must ensure that its internal design capability does not become located in Japan.

While the choices are narrowing, with the support and help of the Government the future looks bright.

9.43 pm

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I immediately declare an interest as president of the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs which has a large number of people in the motor industry. We are speaking not just about those who manufacture the vehicles, but about the components industry and an industry with high technology. Today we are debating the future prosperity of the United Kingdom. Without a major motor industry, we should be in great difficulty.

Like many hon. Members, I welcome the fact that the multinational companies will produce more cars in Britain. We must not be complacent about that. We must not think that that is because those companies are becoming more benevolent. The reason for that is the currency changes, particularly the relationship of the deutschmark to the pound. The Secretary of State asked why Opposition Members are often suspicious of multinational companies. It is because their decisions are not taken in this country. As to Ford and General Motors, their deficit in the balance of trade with this country is hundreds of millions of pounds. Even if they concentrate a little more production here, a large gap will still have to be filled. That is why it is important that we have an indigenous motor manufacturer.

I am concerned about Leyland Trucks, not only as the president of ASTMS, but because the people concerned are my neighbours and friends. It is not easy to regard those people as unemployment statistics. Some 2,200 people will be made redundant in Leyland Trucks by the DAF takeover—that is what it is, a takeover. We are talking about highly skilled people. They were the aristocrats of the engineering industry. They dominated the market in which Leyland Trucks is based. They had a proud record, because they designed vehicles, manufactured the engines and gear boxes, and produced axles—the complete vehicle.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, for many years Leyland Trucks carried the whole of the Leyland car industry. The reward for sustaining that is that the employees are being faced with redundancy. That is unnecessary because, as has been said, it has a large share of the British market, 18 per cent., and a good product range. We are told that there is an over-capacity and that Leyland Trucks is a loss maker.

I cannot imagine that we would be having this debate if this were the French National Assembly. Renault Trucks is an enormous loss maker. Indeed, it could be said that it is pulling down Renault Cars. Nobody is saying that the French Government intend to give up Renault Trucks. They will continue to put money into it. They have not sought a merger deal or allowed DAF to take over Renault Trucks. They would consider it inconceivable to give away what is a jewel in the crown for the future prosperity of France.

That is the situation with regard to Leyland Trucks. It has been dressed up by the Secretary of State as a joint merger but it is a takeover. It is no good us talking, at this stage, of an equal partnership; it is not there. I am at a loss to understand how this can be termed a joint venture. It could be a joint venture—my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) was right—if it was a 50:50 split. That is why—I am sorry that the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) has gone—I say to him that there is great concern among the employees in Leyland factories and plants.

Mr. Roger King: The hon. Gentleman mentioned Leyland and DAF merging and he has also mentioned Renault Trucks, which has a plant in this country. Did not Renault Trucks take over the Commer-Dodge factory? Would not the workers there have welcomed the presence of Renault Trucks, which is expected to be in profit this year?

Mr. Hoyle: The hon. Gentleman—I shall not give way to him again—is not detracting from what I am saying. I am saying that, despite Renault being in difficulties, the French Government are continuing to put money into it. That is why it can turn the corner. I do not know what is amusing about the fact that the French have pride in their own industry. I do not find it amusing that the French are determined to retain the jewels in their crown. Those who will lose their jobs in Leyland will not find it amusing; nor will the 5,000, perhaps more, who will lose their jobs in the component industries.

There are many unanswered questions and I hope that the Minister will give us some replies. Why can we now write off £750 million just like that? Why could we not have done it before and retained the company? My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East asked how far writing off that debt would have brought down the losses that Leyland Trucks is supposed to have sustained. We have had no answer. I hope that the Minister will reply to that, because that too could be illuminating. If we could do it for DAF, why could we not do it for Leyland Trucks and allow it to remain independent? Those are the sort of questions that must be answered.

We have been told by the Secretary of State in the past that Leyland will concentrate on the production of light trucks. Does that mean that DAF will assemble heavy trucks here, or will they be imported? We need to have the answer to that question. The Secretary of State seemed to say that there would be some production of heavy trucks here, but that needs to be confirmed.

The Secretary of State said that there would be a significant United Kingdom content. What does that mean? Why was that not negotiated? Why was not that figure arrived at before we gave the company away? That is what we have done. We have given the company away to DAF who said, "Thank you very much," and Freight Rover has been thrown in. Why could not a minimum British content have been laid down?

Leyland produces buses. The bus production unit will be in some difficulty over engines. But DAF also makes buses. Where does that leave the new management takeover bid that has been made for Leyland Bus? We need an answer to that question. Will DAF be bringing buses in in increasing quantities?

Hon. Members from both sides of the House have asked about military contracts. Apart from ERF, no indigenous lorry company is manufacturing in Britain. Where does that leave us? Conservative Members are always patriotic, or so they tell us, but where does that leave us in relation to defence contracts?

At the moment, Freight Rover buys in power trains from other Rover Group companies. How will the component sourcing policy be affected? Will that continue? [Interruption.] I am asking the Minister, not Conservative Back Benchers. I know that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) would like to sit on the Front Bench, but I rather think that he will not be a Member of Parliament for much longer. Meanwhile, he can enjoy himself, but let us have the answers from the Minister.

Conservative Members are all very happy with the Government and believe that the Government have been able to put enough money into the corporate plan for the future of Austin Rover to be assured. I am not as confident as Conservative Members because Austin Rover is still being run down. Llanelli Radiators is for sale, yet that is a profitable company. ISTEL, the computer services company, is also being sold off. Where will the sell-offs end?

I referred earlier to the fact that the Government are determined to privatise Austin Rover as soon as possible. Once the general election has passed, will the Government be prepared to accept an offer for the company? So eager were the Government last year for Ford to take over Austin Rover that when the top management of Austin Rover refused—I believe quite rightly—to allow Ford to see the production costs of every Austin Rover model, including the Metro, the Secretary of State's predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), ordered them to do so. That really was selling Austin Rover down the river.

What happened after Ford examined the detailed costs? Ford found that it could underprice the Fiesta in relation to the Metro by £100. Until then, the Metro was selling better than the Fiesta in the market place. After then, throughout the whole of last year, its market share slumped. The Fiesta's market share rose to 7·5 per cent., while Metro sales slumped. If that is not selling the company short, what is?

How can the Government talk about the national interest, with all the investment that has taken place, when the previous Secretary of State, with the Government's backing, told the management to open up the books and show them to a foreign competitor? That does not fill me with any confidence that the Government are prepared to back Austin Rover in future.

I agree with many of the comments made by Conservative Members tonight. When we come to the new deal with Honda, we want some of the technical know-how and part of the high technology. We do not want all the low technology. Whether we will get that, or whether the determination is there in the Department of Trade and Industry to make such demands, is a different matter. I am not filled with any optimism by the Government's past performance. Nor am I filled with any optimism by the way in which they have been prepared to give away Leyland Trucks, with the best product range in Europe, to DAF on a plate.

I hope that the new Sterling is a success. I want the company to go from success to success. Leyland has a very loyal work force which is second to none. The work force and their families deserve the prosperity. I say to the Secretary of State and the Minister who is to reply, for God's sake show a bit of confidence in the home product. They should back the indigenous motor manufacturer in the way that the French back their industry. They should have the pride in their industry which the Italians have in theirs.

There is no way other countries would give their companies away. It is amazing, when we are lectured in the House about the losses and the over-capacity in the truck industry, to realise that Sweden, with no home market, is the leader in Europe. What the Swedes can do, we can do as well. The Government should not turn the tap on and off. They should turn it on full stream, give the funds to Austin Rover and let us make a success of the British motor industry and particularly the indigenous British motor industry. If they have confidence in it, the workers will show that they can manufacture the best products in the world.

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the Question which he was directed by paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of Estimates) to put at that hour.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1986-87

Class VI, Vote I

Question,

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £166,300,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1987 for expenditure by the Department of Energy on assistance to the coal industry including grants to British Coal and payments to redundant workers.

put and agreed to.

Motor Vehicle Industry

Question again proposed. That the amendment be made.

10 pm

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordsire, South-West): This is a timely debate that reflects the improvement and optimism in the motor vehicle industry after many years of difficulty. The increased optimism is encapsulated in an article in The Sunday Times last Sunday which, referring to the Geneva motor show, states:

"British car executives were confirming plans for large increases in output from their British plants."

I share much of the optimism that has been expressed in the debate. Hon. Members referred to the better industrial relations and the disappearance of bad practices in the industry. I also hope that, once and for all, we have seen the back of violent changes in taxation, which led to layoffs in the 1960s and 1970s at very short notice. One could never get a car work force on one's side, if, from year to year, there were sudden changes in production caused by violent changes in taxation. Stable production and tax rates do much to improve industrial relations, just as much as the many things that have been mentioned in the debate.

A major constituency worry for me relates to the prospects for Bedford Commercial Vehicles Ltd. in relation to the military contract. We know that 1986 was of great depression and difficulty in Bedfordshire once the General Motors and Leyland Trucks negotiations broke down. In 1986, hundreds of Bedford workers lost their jobs. There has been a bad start to 1987, with Bedfordshire county council — which is not Conservative-led — imposing a rate increase of 23 per cent. That will do industry in Bedfordshire no good whatsoever in view of the battle that we are waging to get new industry into the county. It is vital that we retain a military contract at Bedford and keep its many hundreds of employees in work.

The latest position on the military contract was mentioned in a letter to me from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 20 January. He said:

"I am hopeful of reaching our decisions on the new 4 tonne programme and other military truck orders for Bedford Trucks in the near future. In these circumstances, all I can do is to reassure you that we are giving every consideration to Bedford's proposals and will take account of the factors you have mentioned along with all the other relevant aspects before making final decisions."

There are three relevant aspects. The first is employment in the area. The second is the need to continue Bedford's excellent record of supplying first-class military equipment to the Ministry of Defence in peace and in war. I stress that when America was neutral between September 1939 and December 1941, it made no difference to the fact that General Motors, which owns Bedford, kept pouring out trucks for the use of the British Army in the years when we were on our own. The third relevant aspect is the ancillary industries and suppliers which still depend upon the Bedford plant to maintain employment.

I mention another consideration which is extremely relevant and that is the position of Renault Trucks, which manufactures on the other side of the road from Bedford in Dunstable. There is a strong case for seeing whether it is possible for the two plants to co-operate on the military contract.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) mentioned Renault which has 97 per cent. British content in its light trucks and over 60 per cent. British content in its heavy vehicles. It is, therefore, a most welcome European company manufacturing in Dunstable, using British parts and sustaining hundreds of British jobs and, therefore, the welfare of hundreds of British families. I urge the Government to look to Renault to see whether there is some way in which Renault and Bedford could form a partnership for the military contract and, thereby, strengthen our truck manufacturing base in south Bedfordshire and our employment base throughout the county.

I should like to say one or two things about the national situation. I hope that this will be the year in which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer finally gets rid of the 10 per cent. car tax. With his tax revenues now extremely buoyant and the proportion of United Kingdom market taken by United Kingdom-sourced motor vehicles now better than 50 per cent., it is an ideal time to build on the improvements in the industry by using the tax system to achieve higher volumes of production in the United Kingdom, which would be of great benefit to the suppliers to the industry as well as to the manufacturers.

If one adds to that the current favourable exchange rate, Britain is, as has already been said, the ideal prime area for vehicle manufacturing. Let us use the tax system to encourage that further.

We are, after all, a road based economy and the Government should always be doing things that encourage companies to manufacture cars and trucks here. For years the tax system was used against the motor vehicle industry. Now is the time for the tax system to be used to help the industry.

I add two points to the overwhelming case to get rid of the 10 per cent. car tax. First, I hope that the Chancellor will change the capital allowance schemes, in a way that will encourage buyers of trucks to change them more frequently. I hope that that would mean more orders for our manufacturing base in Britain.

Secondly, I would like the Chancellor to look at the question of petrol tax on engines where the engines are being used merely for research and testing. In other words, he should do something further to the tax system which would encourage the multinationals and others to say, "On testing our engines in Britain, the Chancellor does not apply taxes to the fuel we use solely for the testing." That would be another reason for manufacturing in Britain.

The city technology colleges are now in their infancy but once they get going they should be sited near to areas where we manufacture trucks and cars because, as has already been said, there will be huge changes in technology and training and we want opportunities nearby for young people to learn those new skills by going to a city technology college. I obviously want such a college sited in Bedfordshire and near the plants which my hon. Friends have mentioned.

By doing those positive things, the Government can build on what I think is a changing and improving situation for many thousands of our people who work in the car and truck industries.

10.8 pm

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): It gives me great pleasure to have an opportunity to speak about the anxiety and worry of the Leyland workers and the Chorley workers. Some 2,500 or 3,000 people in my constituency work at the Leyland assembly plant, in the engine and foundry production facilities or at Multipart in Chorley.

We have heard tonight from the Secretary of State that we are talking of a "merged truck venture". I believe that we have changed the terminology from "joint venture", which I accept can be other than 50:50 if it is spelt out. We are talking about a predominant number of United Kingdom companies and only one Dutch company, DAF Trucks.

In a letter to Members of Parliament the chairman of Rover Group says:

"Rover Group will take a 40 per cent. shareholding in the company"— that is, the merged truck venture—

"reflecting the assets which they are contributing to it."

We know from letters that the facilities in the United Kingdom are contributing some £180 million to the joint truck venture. That would mean that £270 million of facilities were donated or given to the joint venture by the Dutch.

I have no proof of that. I originally thought that the letter that was sent to my workers was talking only about a United Kingdom side of the deal. The letter to the Leyland Trucks and Leyland Parts workers says:

"This will be done by forming a new joint Anglo-Dutch venture, in which the Rover Group will retain a 40 per cent. shareholding, the UK part of which is to be known as Leyland-DAF."

The letter does not say that the Rover Group will "obtain" a 40 per cent. share of a joint venture that embraces Europe and elsewhere in the world. I genuinely believed that it would relate only to the United Kingdom.

I should like to emphasise this. What would happen if the engine and foundry facilities at Leyland were to continue? What would happen if the Scammell works were to continue? What would the balance of ownership and joint venture be then? Surely it would be around 50:50. The write-off of some £680 million of which perhaps some £450 million or £500 million relates to Leyland Trucks, is not all wasted money. It is an investment in know-how, technology and facilities; it is not money down the drain. Therefore, one cannot just take the assets that now lie on the ground. The inbuilt know-how, technology and development and the marketing expertise that have been built up are second to none, and have led to United Kingdom market leadership, from Leyland Trucks.

Therefore, I believe that we should really be talking about a joint 50:50 venture. Admittedly, the decision making would have to be spelled out. It is common to both sides of the House that nobody is happy with the 40:60 deal that is proposed. Therefore, can the Minister of State give an assurance that the Rover Group will pursue a 50:50 true joint venture? That will meet the wishes of my constituents in Chorley.

During the lobby last week, I was delighted to hear from them that they do not pull away from the merged truck venture with DAF. They see in it great possibilities for the better assurance of jobs for them in the future. That is perhaps the best way ahead for the Leyland and Chorley workers and for Leyland Trucks and the parts depot at Chorley. We could see expansion and job gains in the next few years, but we in the United Kingdom will not have a fair share and say in the decisions that will be made by managing boards or by company directors.

It is essential that the deal be renegotiated. Although I do not agree with much of the Opposition's amendment, I agree that the Government should be required to renegotiate the transaction on the basis of a genuine joint venture, with each party having a 50 per cent. interest. Then and only then will the best interests of our investment as taxpayers in the Rover Group, in Leyland Trucks and Leyland Parts, be served. I welcome DAF merging, but it has to be on the right basis. If I do not have the assurance that the Government will actively pursue a 50:50 deal, I shall be forced to vote against them.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The only truck-making facility that is now left in Scotland is the Albion works at Scotstoun in Glasgow. We lost the Leyland Trucks factory in Bathgate, and some years ago we lost the car-making facility at Linwood.

I served an apprenticeship as a metal worker, and I know how important it is to many families in the west of Scotland and in the central belt that sons and, nowadays, daughters have the opportunity to go into engineering. It is all very well for the Secretary of State for Scotland to tell us that he is trying to bring service industries north of the border, but it is nonsense to say that such jobs will last, because north of the border we belong to traditional engineering communities and have skills that have taken generations to learn.

Because of Government policy that is causing the rundown of companies and the activities of multinationals, communities that have served the nation well with their engineering skills are losing out. If we are to retain manufacturing industry in Britain the Government must give every support to engineering companies. That means not only giving grants and subsidies to companies to encourage them, but ensuring that proper and adequate training is given to our young people.

I know that many people of my generation served apprenticeships and worked in engineering. We thought little about employment other than engineering when we left school and either went into the shipyard or into places like the Albion works or the railway workshops in my constituency. We were pleased to get an apprenticeship. Many of our parents had bitter memories of the depression and they encouraged us to go into engineering.

It is sad that many young people leaving school today who have far better qualifications than we had, because they have O and A-levels, and who want to go into engineering cannot do so because there are no openings. The Albion works is the only truck-making capacity left in Scotland and its intake of apprentices has gone lower and lower since this Government came to power. The Government claim that they will bring about an upturn in the economy. That means that we shall need skilled men and women. Where shall we get such people unless we are prepared to train them now and to think ahead to the future?

If enough companies do not exist to provide employment, people should be employed in our excellent colleges of engineering. In my constituency the teachers in the Springburn college of engineering have very low morale because they cannot get apprentices. That should not be the case. All over Britain there are people with teaching expertise and we should use that expertise to get young people involved in training that will turn out engineers, metal workers like me, draughtsmen and metallurgists. The universities should play a part by turning out graduate engineers. If we do not do that we are lost and all the money that previous Governments and this Government have invested will be wasted. More and more we shall find that foreign companies will be in control of our future.

I admit that I do not know a great deal about the DAF takeover and that many hon. Members will know more than I do. It worries me that foreign companies which in some respects are our competitors have control over the future of a very important section of our industry. If we do not watch out we could go down that road. Within a generation we could have no truck-making facilities worth talking about and what little we had would be in the control of foreigners.

I am aware that we shall have another opportunity to discuss Caterpillar, but it is important to stress that the work force at Caterpillar is involved in manufacture of a similar nature to car manufacture. Only a few months ago Ministers and hon. Members were told by the American owners of Caterpillar that the work force was safe and that there was a good future for the company. The company stated that it was investing in the plant. Now men and women in the community are involved in a sit-in because the only industry that they have left is disappearing before their eyes. I would not like that to happen throughout the country.

Although I have highlighted the point that only one area north of the border, Albion, is involved in truck-making, I am aware that the work that takes place in other hon. Members' constituencies has a beneficial effect on companies within my constituency. There are companies within the west of Scotland that, as part of the component industry, are dependent on orders from car manufacturers based in the constituencies of other hon. Members. As such, a healthy car industry will have a beneficial effect on my constituency and other parts of the United Kingdom. Although I would be glad if the manufacturers of cars and trucks came to the west of Scotland, I am aware that the steel industry in Scotland depends on healthy truck-making facilities elsewhere.

When I go to industrial seminars all too often I listen to industrialists talk about new technology as if everything to do with electronics represents the answer for British industry. They discuss floppy discs, computers, new designs and all the rest of it. Although technology is important let us not forget the traditional heavy engineering industries that we are discussing tonight. Such industries are labour intensive and need a high degree of skill. If they prosper they will go a long way to reducing unemployment in our communities. I trust that the Minister will take on board what I have said. We should be as proud and protective of British companies as are the Americans and Europeans.

We should think more about training in our universities and colleges. I come from the west of Scotland and when I was at school those who taught me often had contempt for the industries that were close to the schools in my community. That is still the case. Many bright pupils are encouraged to go into law or commerce and somehow or other engineering is still a dirty word.

Engineers create the wealth of this country. It is engineers that we need for Rolls-Royce and British Leyland. With the greatest respect to accountants and people involved in the law, they do not produce the wealth of the country. We need engineering expertise and such expertise is in demand throughout the country and throughout the world. We must start in the schools to encourage our bright young people to go into engineering and thus get us out of our rut.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I regret that, for the second time in this Parliament, I cannot support the Government motion, and I want to explain why. I fully endorse the corporate plan. It is clear that Leyland's future must be in the private sector. I have long believed that all industries should be in the private sector and should contribute through profits and taxation to the schools, hospitals and public services that we need, instead of drawing resources away from them. God knows, Leyland has drawn enough resources away from those public services over the past 10 to 15 years. Of course, Leyland Bus and Leyland Trucks have to be sorted out, rationalised and restructured. But how are we to do that?

I oppose this Leyland-DAF deal. It is anti-competitive. The purpose of privatisation is to widen choice and to enhance competition in a particular industry. Leyland Trucks, for all its faults, used a multiplicity of United Kingdom suppliers. Under this Leyland-DAF deal, DAF will be given a virtual monopoly over the supply of engines in the new heavy truck and light truck programmes which are to be developed. In other words, this Leyland-DAF deal will cordon off part of the market which is competitive at the moment and will restrict it solely to one Dutch supplier.

The deal will cut out the independent suppliers in the market place, which I thought the Government's industrial strategy was supposed to encourage. It will have an immediate and damaging effect on the Cummins engine company, a principal supplier to Leyland Trucks. That company supplies heavy and light engines and the components that go with them from factories at Shotts and Darlington. Through this deal, Cummins' market will be restricted.

In November, Cummins in Darlington employed 1,100 people. Proposals were announced to make 600 redundant. After a vigorous campaign, including a debate in the House, those proposals were revised and some 230 jobs were saved. All those jobs are now at risk again because the Government — not the company — have decided to restrict Cummins' market.

I oppose the deal also because it is a producers' deal. The deal may well suit the Rover Group and may well be the best solution for Leyland Trucks, but it has not been struck in the best interests of the other clients of the components suppliers—the customers. It is a deal such as those which so often have been undertaken by successive Govenments in textiles, agriculture and the rest of the motor industry. It is concerned with preserving the primary jobs at Leyland. Of course, my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) is right to fight for those jobs, but it ignores the secondary jobs—the jobs downstream which cannot be quantified so easily and which are lost in dribs and drabs over successive years. Because it is a producers' deal, it will inevitably lead to further concentration and integration in the market place instead of more competition and greater diversification. In short, this is a very poor deal.

I do not suggest that the Paccar option would necessarily have been better. I am prepared to accept that for Leyland Trucks, the Paccar option may not have been as attractive, but equally it would be wrong to suggest that the Government only had this DAF deal or that Paccar option to consider as alternatives. After all, the Government, through their shareholding in the Rover Group in Leyland, held all the cards. It was open to my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department to modify the DAF proposals which were presented to them through the Rover board.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) pointed out, we have a good deal for DAF. We are handing over to DAF £175 million in public assets; we are scrubbing a debt of some £680 million; we are handing over 7,000 employees and we are taking only three of 17 places on the board. The Dutch have not done as well since Admiral Tromp sailed up the Thames. This is not a joint venture agreement at all. We have agreed to hand over these public assets; we have agreed to wipe off the debt; we have agreed to take only three of the 17 places on the board. Now we come to the nub of the argument. What has DAF been forced to agree? Has it agreed to delay the development of its heavy truck programme; has it agreed to phase it in slowly over five to ten years? We have no guarantee about that.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State has written to me this evening, but he can give me the assurance only that "such a development programme will take some considerable time to complete."

I cannot go back and tell my constituents that they may be out of jobs but that it depends on how long DAF takes to get its heavy truck programme going.

On the light engine side, has DAF agreed to defer the introduction of its light engine family that we read about in Truck magazine last month? Again my hon. Friend in his full and courteous letter says:

"The new DAF 6·2 litre engine family has already been developed and will be available in DAF's present range of medium trucks. This range is not a replacement for Leyland's medium trucks which will continue until such time as a new joint model range is developed. That will of course take some considerable time".

Again, I cannot go back and tell my constituents that whether or not they have jobs in five years' time will depend on our being able, through our three out of 17 directors, to get a reasonable restraint of five, seven or 10 years on the development of those programmes.

Before the heads of agreement were finalised and the deal was signed, why did we not use our 40 per cent. shareholding to insist on 40 per cent. membership of the board, and on specific assurances regarding the heavy engine programme, the light engine programme and the proportion of United Kingdom component sourcing that we expect from this joint venture within a specific number of years? We, who are handing over these assets and wiping off the existing debts, were entitled to ask for such assurances on behalf of the British taxpayers who have put a considerable amount of money into Leyland over the years.

It is with regret that I have to say that, unless my hon. Friend can convince me on any of those points, and although I do not agree with the rest of the Opposition amendment, I must agree with them that the contract should and could still be renegotiated.

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): There is a good reason why Birmingham has been referred to as the iron heart of England. It is because of its past and present dependence upon heavy industry and upon the motor car in particular and the manufacture of all its components. Because of the success of the Government's present policies, I support the motion. I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for taking careful note of what has been said in the midlands and in my constituency. I thank them for coming to the defence of the car industry, Land Rover and Range Rover.

The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) referred to the Tory Members who, earlier this year, prevented the Government from selling Austin Rover and Land Rover. I am not only proud but pleased to admit that I was one of those hon. Members. I am pleased also that we prevailed upon the Government to take such action. We did not like the way in which the operations—if they were operations—to sell the companies had taken place. We did not like the secrecy that surrounded the matter. We did not believe that the £2 billion of investors' money that was put into the Austin Rover Group and into the Land Rover section in 1979 was wasted. We thought that it was just about to bear fruit.

The fact that that investment has borne fruit, the fact that exports of Austin Rover cars have gone up by about 16 per cent. in the past year, the fact that the Range Rover is being introduced into the United States, the sales of which, in the first year, are expected to exceed the estimated 4,000 models by perhaps double that number, are signs that we were right. Therefore, it is appropriate that, at the time that we have been proved to be correct, those of us who maintain our defence of Land Rover and Range Rover should now speak for the Government and for the wisdom of the policies that they have followed.

Indeed, I particularly thank the Minister for the courtesy that he showed in discussions and negotiations and the care that he, together with his senior colleagues, evinced in his consideration and almost entire acceptance of the British Leyland corporate plan.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) made a succinct speech that was well-backed by statistics in every respect. My hon. Friend and I went to Dallas and spoke to the distributor of the Sterling motor car, about which I put down an early day motion many months ago, wishing it great success and stating that it would be a world beater. That distributor made it quite clear that it was a British product that would sweep the States and of which he could not get enough. He wanted to ensure that the model would be delivered.

My constituency has been denuded of British Leyland factories, apart from one. There were eight factories in my constituency. Land Rover has moved out. It has now resettled over the border in the old SD1 factory in Lode lane. I did not object to that move, because I could see that it was a necessary rationalisation. But we are now about to witness the greater development and success sales of the Land Rover. It has gone in great numbers to Germany, France and the United States of America. I am convinced that we shall see a success story that will be backed up even more fully by the success of the new Land Rover 90, which certainly represents a bargain.

Within the last day or so we have heard of the success of the Maestro panel van, about 4,000 of which have been sold to British Telecom. We see all around us signs of the investment that the Government have made on behalf of the British taxpayer. They have given nearly £700 million to British Leyland. My constituents, the work force and people in the midlands can have every confidence in the Government's actions over the Austin Rover group.

The present chairman of the group has decided to retain the Mini, and we compliment him on that decision. We should also compliment the previous chairman of Austin Rover and his team on their introduction of new designs and on insisting that the success of British Leyland could depend on the success of the Rover 800 range.

We are on the threshold of an exciting future because the Government's policies have paid off. They have listened to those of us who believed that it would be wrong to do other than what they did in the circumstances of a few months ago. Therefore, we must give praise where praise is due.

I am convinced that Austin Rover is about to make most excellent progress. Home produced vehicles account for over 50 per cent. of the home market. To ensure the continued success of Austin Rover in the export market it is imperative that the home market should also be increased. Whenever British people purchase a new car they should strongly consider a British manufactured product — preferably an Austin Rover product. That would ensure the continuance of its success story.

Over 60 per cent. of the people in my part of the country own their own homes. The ownership of shares is also increasing. We should also try to ensure the wider ownership of British produced cars, including second cars for each family. Each of us must do everything possible to back British manufactured cars.

I, too, should like the 10 per cent. special car tax to be removed. The only consumer goods that bear a tax of 24·6 per cent. are cars; all other goods that are sold bear a tax of only 15 per cent. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will rectify that discrepancy and enable the success story to continue.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I am glad that I have caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, before the sands of time run out in this most important and wide-ranging debate on the motor vehicle industry. In the interests of brevity, I shall restrict my few remarks to the Leyland Truck sector of the industry.

When we seek a solution to the problems that face Leyland Trucks we must consider what is the best overall solution in the national interest, not least to relieve the British taxpayer of the burden of the subsidy to Leyland Trucks, amounting to approximately £1·5 million each week, but to retain the maximum number of jobs in this country at Leyland and in companies in the components industry. In other words, although it is inevitable that job losses should occur in the short term whichever solution is adopted—that is a bullet that we must bite—it is vital to maintain the maximum manufacturing capacity in the United Kingdom and not to allow it to die or export it elsewhere, for example to Europe.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must give some clarification at some stage about what is meant by "significant" in relation to the British content in the new range of trucks in the Anglo-Dutch company. We must have clarification if our suspicions are to be allayed that in future even more components will be sourced in Europe or in Holland. Many hon. Members expressed the view that if this is a genuine partnership, equity in the company should be split 50:50 between Leyland and DAF, and I agree with them. Certainly we should have greater representation on the boards of directors.

The other company to bid for Leyland Trucks was Paccar, which is 100 per cent. American-owned. Why should its offer have been considered by many to be preferable to that of DAF? By "many" I include the majority of Leyland's major customers and the majority of Leyland distributors. Paccar took over Foden, which employed more than 3,000 in 1982; now it employes 450 at its plant in Sandbach. But it has brought Foden back into profitability by introducing improved cab design and comfort and by insisting on a high quality vehicle to be delivered on time to the customer's exact specifications. It has also been successful in winning two Ministry of Defence contracts against extremely stiff competition and the component sourcing of those contracts is 95 per cent. British.

Paccar announced during the negotiations that it would have continued the 90 per cent. British sourcing which is at present in force at Leyland. I suggest that 90 per cent. is, indeed, a "significant" figure and perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister would like to comment on that when he replies.

It should also be known that Paccar would have offered Leyland Trucks a market in the United States of America for the Roadrunner truck and initially said that it could have offered this market for 3,000 trucks, which is exactly one third of the production of British Leyland. Paccar already has 20 per cent. of the United States' heavy truck market.

Incidentally, Paccar buys all its drive-line components —engines, gearboxes and axles—from outside suppliers through British subsidiaries of companies, such as Cummins, Rockwell and Eaton. It would have continued to do so, if it had been successful in acquiring Leyland. It made the offer for Leyland from a position of financial strength, having made more than £164 million profit in the past three years. I hasten to add that it made the offer to buy Leyland outright, in good faith and without the sweetener of Freight Rover thrown in.

Often we talk, wrongly, of Leyland Trucks being the last British truck manufacturer — a statement which makes the blood boil of many hundreds of my constituents in Sandbach who are associated with ERF. ERF was founded in 1933 when there were dozens of commercial vehicle manufacturers in Britain. During the past 20 years there have been many mergers and takeovers—and the total loss of some old names. Throughout that period ERF has remained independent and British. It welcomes the fact that it will not be competing with a British Government subsidised competitor and it is looking forward to the future with a great deal of interest. At present, ERF has its best forward-order book for seven years, and it is building for the future on the success of its new E series and plans to increase production by 50 per cent. in the next three years, which must surely be good news for employment in south-east Cheshire.

ERF will continue its policy of sourcing components in the United Kingdom wherever possible, and the present level is approximately 85 per cent. It employs 1,000 people in the group, but it is significant that its knock-on effect runs to over 10,000 employees. Those people are indirectly affected through its suppliers and sub-contractors throughout the country.

Having fought through the worst recession in living memory, ERF can face the future with confidence and build on its 10 per cent. share of the United Kingdom heavy truck market.

In conclusion, I return to where I began; to whether the solution which is proposed—the DAF-Leyland deal—is in the best national interests in the long-term. On that score, I am not very confident, but I am confident that this deal will bring opportunities to my constituency and that Foden and ERF will be in there fighting to extend their share of this highly competitive market. As both, in their different ways, produce trucks of an extremely high quality, it should be interesting to see how successful they are in the future.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I am grateful for the opportunity of catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall be brief.

Among my constituents are people who work at the Leyland Trucks factory and in the various operations which are associated with Leyland Bus and Leyland Trucks. My main interest in rising tonight is to seek to maintain the manufacture of heavy goods vehicles in Lancashire for the foreseeable future.

Constituency Members such as myself and my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) are concerned to maintain the best possible manufacturing capacity and deal for those who work at these factories. I must, therefore, express some worries as to the Government's proposals. There was no doubt in the minds of the work force—they put this forward in 1982—that Leyland Trucks had to take in a partner. That is common sense and I fully support that. Therefore, the question is to what degree and in what proportion does that partnership take? The Government propose that there be a 60:40 partnership. I would be failing in my duty if I did not say to my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Minister that the work force are most concerned, quite rightly, that there has not been a 50:50 merger with DAF. They have good reasons for thinking that and I hope that the Minister, when winding-up tonight, will answer some of their reservations. Leyland Trucks is bringing £150 million worth of assets and 7,000 workers into this merger. It is also bringing at least 16 per cent. of the British heavy goods vehicle market. Left out of that merger is the foundry, which has been established at Leyland for some time, and the engine factory. If those two items were included, it could be argued strongly that that would make it 50:50 partnership. I am most concerned about the engine factory. The 400 engine, which has been referred to by many of my colleagues, is a substantial engine. It has good markets and has been developed. It has a future and I am told by those who work for British Leyland that many customers have said that should the 400 engine not be available in the vehicles produced at Leyland they will be looking elsewhere for their vehicles in the future.

The TL11 engine has also been developed and is capable of further development. That will result in good markets and will provide a good deal of work in the foundry and the engine factory.

In contrast to that, DAF proposes to produce engines in Holland and in Germany. But when we scrutinise what it is proposing, 70 per cent. of the engines that are produced for DAF trucks at the moment are produced by other manufacturers, predominantly in Germany, mainly by Fitzwinter. If that production was to be transferred as part of the new company to the engine factory at Leyland it would preserve many more jobs and it would make sense to keep the production of engine components within the company rather than going outside it. It would also preserve more jobs in the north-west in areas where they are greatly needed.

When we are facing the possibility of inviting Leyland Trucks to tender for one of the biggest Ministry of Defence contracts for vehicles that has ever been purchased by this Government, or by any British Government, it makes no sense to have an engine capacity dependent upon factories in Germany. If there was an East-West war, under any scenario Germany and its factories would be in the centre of the battlefield. It makes much more sense to have the capacity based in the United Kingdom, particularly in central Lancashire.

For those reasons, there are many questions to be answered tonight. I would press my hon. Friend the Minister to consider that it does not make a lot of sense to have so much of the engine capacity to be built by Fitzwinter when there is capacity in Lancashire to meet those demands.

On control, I can only press my hon. Friend that for us to have only three directors on two boards with the rest coming from DAF does not make a great deal of sense. It does not even represent 60:40 control and does not give the sort of reassurance for which the work force, whom we are taking from a British company into this new company, are looking. In that respect we have a duty to stand by it and ensure that its interests are properly represented.

A series of questions needs to be answered. Rightly, the work force is entitled to ask for some job protection. What guarantees does it have from the new company, and DAF in particular, of continued production at Leyland and in Lancashire? What guarantees does it have of the use of British components within the existing Leyland range, and, indeed, within the DAF range? I am told that Leyland takes components from 5,520 suppliers, most of whom are British. Those companies will also depend on the new company and their requirements are important for the British economy.

I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) about Cummins engines. As well a. using Leyland engines, the present Leyland Trucks range is heavily reliant on Cummins engines produced in Darlington.

Both the work force and the people of Lancashire think that the idea is imaginative. It is necessary to produce wider markets for the company in the future and to preserve employment in Lancashire. But we must be told this evening why there is not a 50:50 partnership. Why is it 60:40? Will my hon. Friend the Minister seriously consider the representations for a 50:50 partnership?

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hind: I apologise, but others wish to speak.

10.59 pm

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): In his opening contribution to the debate, the Secretary of State made what I would describe as a "revealing speech". If we put on one side his ritual denunciation of the Labour party, we are left with the corporate plan for the Rover Group and a collation of extracts from press releases from various other motor manufacturers. Nevertheless I pay the Secretary of State the compliment of following, if I may, the thread of his speech.

Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), I want to emphasise that the Labour party welcomes the announcement that the AR8 vehicle and the K series engine are definitely going ahead, but I should like to make two additional points.

First, there should never have been any doubt about Government support for those projects.

Second, unlike the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), most of that hon. Gentleman's constituents in Birmingham and the Labour party are concerned about the future of AR6. No one in Birmingham except the hon. Member for Northfield believes that the AR6 will survive. Most people believe that it is dead and buried whereas it is absolutely essential for the future of Austin Rover that the AR6 should continue if Austin Rover is itself to continue as a volume producer of motor vehicles. The cancellation of the project is bound to raise the question, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East explained, whether the policy of the Government and of Mr. Graham Day is for Austin Rover to withdraw from volume car production and become a specialist car producer with Ford or Honda left to pick up volume production. Our fears are reinforced by the reference in the corporate plan to moving up market and into specialist niches. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will explain what that reference is supposed to mean.

The Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Oxford, East and the hon. Member for Northfield made no reference to redundancies at Austin Rover. Indeed, the hon. Member for Northfield told us that wherever we look in the motor industry, there is good news. He seems to think that it is good news for the staff at Longbridge who are losing their jobs — an announcement which was made only two or three weeks before the corporate plan was published. There are to be staff redundancies on the scale of 1:8 of all staff in Austin Rover. Some 1,265 people are to lose their jobs, and 380 will lose their jobs at Longbridge and Drews lane. However, the hon. Member for Northfield told us that there is good news where ever we look.

Mr. Graham Day and the Government are reducing the staff at Austin Rover to meet a sales level of 450,000 vehicles rather than increasing sales to justify the staff level that the Government and Mr. Day inherited. The Secretary of State took pride today in announcing that in the first two months of this year Austin Rover had a market share of 17 per cent. However, eight years ago its market share was 23 per cent. That is not only a measure of the decline of Austin Rover but shows that the Secretary of State is easily satisfied by temporary success. A market share of 17 per cent. and sales of 450,000 may satisfy the Government and Mr. Graham Day, but that is not good enough for Austin Rover or the Rover Group. The Secretary of State completely ignores and refuses to comment in the House when questioned about the decision to sack 335 engineering and technical people among these staff. They are the people who design the cars and who are responsible for improving the quality of the existing range.

The Secretary of State told us two weeks ago that it is early days and that the redundancies should be voluntary. The truth is that the Rover Group has had only—as of today—470 firm applications for voluntary redundancy. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will tell us what is the attitude of the Secretary of State and the Conservative Government to the possibility of compulsory redundancies being declared for the staff at Austin Rover.

The spread of redundancies has not yet ended. There is to be another announcement—which is widely known in Birmingham and Oxford — that there are to be another 250 compulsory redundancies in the Austin Rover Group. That announcement has not yet been made, and the unions have been told that a decision is still under review. However, everyone knows that security firms are advertising for staff to take on the security work at Austin Rover because this work is going to be subcontracted, with another 250 redundancies for staff at Austin Rover.

The Secretary of State and Mr. Graham Day tell us that there must be redundancies, because Austin Rover sales have declined, but the fact is that Austin Rover sales were so low in 1986 for two reasons: first, the uncertainty created by the Government as a result of the talks with Ford a year ago; secondly, the damage directly caused to Austin Rover by the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) told the House how the management of Austin Rover was approached by Ford and asked to provide confidential commercial information. To its credit, the management refused, but then the former Secretary of State, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), contacted Sir Austin Bide, the chairman of what is now called the Rover Group, as a result of which the board of Rover Group instructed management at Austin Rover to hand over commercial secrets to its main competitor, the Ford Motor Company. That information included the marketing plans and the pricing strategy for the Metro, and it not not surprising that the result was that the Ford Fiesta outsold the Metro last year. It led directly to a loss of market share for Austin Rover. It was an act of industrial sabotage.

The question that the Minister of State should answer tonight is not whether the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks contacted Sir Austin Bide, who then instructed the management to take that action, but whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman got authority from the higher level of the Prime Minister.

On the proposals for Leyland Trucks and DAF, again we are told by the Secretary of State that there is over-capacity, but he fails to answer the question why over-capacity in Europe leads to redundancies in the United Kingdom. There are no redundancies in Holland or elsewhere, but always job losses in the United Kingdom. First, we had the job losses at Bedford Commercial Vehicles Ltd., with American owners deciding to create British redundancies. That closure led directly to a sales opportunity for Leyland, but the Government's response is to approve further redundancies at Leyland Trucks. The Secretary of State defends it by saying that there is over-capacity and that Leyland Trucks is losing £1·5 million a week or £75 million a year. But how much of that loss is accounted for by the interest on the debt of Leyland Trucks—a debt which the Government will write off to make a present of Leyland Trucks to DAF? My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East asked the Secretary of State that question earlier, and it was clear that he did not know. It was also clear that the Minister of State did not know. We all saw the consultations that took place and the arithmetic being done by people in the Box. The Government had failed to ask the question and had never considered the possibility. Their only concern was to write off at taxpayers' expense the debt of Leyland Trucks in order to get rid of it to DAF. They did not consider writing off the debt to allow Leyland Trucks to remain British.

Indeed, we have the testimony of the managing director of Leyland Trucks as to why it is being sold. He said publicly:

> "If Leyland had stood alone it was very difficult to see where that investment would come from except from Government and that was clearly not going to be forthcoming."

The pressure was put on the Rover Group to conclude a 40:60 deal with DAF.

My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) drew attention to the effects of the closure of the foundry and Leyland engines. What is more, there will be no alternatives for customers. Those customers who take the products from the foundry at present will also be forced to go overseas. The jobs of those who work at Leyland engines will be replaced by Dutch jobs.

There have been several comments tonight about the effect on Cummins and Perkins. If the criticisms made, even by Conservative Members, are untrue, let the Government explain why, within days of the announcement being made in the House of Commons, DAF approached the manufacturers of machine tools asking them to quote for a 50 per cent. expansion of engine manufacturing capacity in Holland directly to replace the engine capacity that is being closed at Leyland Trucks, jobs will be lost at Leyland Trucks, Cummins and Perkins. To be specific, I shall give the Secretary of State a name. Why was COMAU asked to quote for machine tools to increase the capacity of DAF engines by 50 per cent. so soon after that announcement?

Many hon. Gentlemen have also mentioned the effect on customers.

If the treatment of Leyland Trucks by the Government and the Rover Group is appalling, the treatment of the people who work at Scammell in Watford is outrageous. Two months ago that company was told that it had won an order for DROPS vehicles worth £120 million over the next five years. The work force was told that their jobs were secure. Two months later their jobs are going, the factory is being closed. That factory has made a profit in seven of the past 10 years. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said, that factory has lost two and a half days in strikes in 68 years. The reward for loyalty and hard work is the sack.

The Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Northfield told us that the DAF deal is good for Freight Rover because it will give us distribution in Europe. We already have distribution in Europe. That was last year's announcement. We were told that it was a collaborative deal. The Secretary of State announced it in the House and we were assured that we would be getting all the benefits of DAF selling Sherpa vans on the continent of Europe without it taking over the Freight Rover company.

The hon. Member for Northfield also said that DAF will provide the investment that is badly needed for Sherpa vans, both for new models and for expansion of manufacturing facilities. He said that the money could not come from the Rover Group. He did not read the corporate plan properly. If he does read it he will see that it says quite clearly that the development of new models and the expansion of facilities are "capable of being financed conventionally either by the Group or a subsequent purchaser."

We know the Government's decision; it must be a purchaser.

In fact, the company is profitable and that is why it is being sold. It is a success. It has increased sales, improved productivity, increased production and, as a result, has increased its profits and taken on more people. The Government's reward for that is to sell it to DAF. Today the Secretary of State claimed that the success of Jaguar provided, in his words, "incontrovertible proof" that privatisation works. That is the real reason for the Government wanting to sell Freight Rover. It is an embarrassment to them. It is profitable and successful under public ownership, and the Government do not like public ownership. The irony is that even after they have given Freight Rover to DAF, it will still be publicly owned. There will still be a public stake even after the flotation, but the public stake will belong to the Dutch Government who will continue to have a 25 per cent. share of that company. The Dutch Government are not so foolish as to sell success.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) drew attention to the importance of the decisions for component suppliers. Not only will there be job losses at Leyland and Scammell but in component suppliers. How many jobs will be lost at Lucas, Girling, Smiths, Cummins and Perkins? Have the Government even asked that question? The Secretary of State simply told us that what he still persists in calling a "joint venture" with DAF will be "reflected by changes in the component industry". When he was asked directly by one of his supporters to tell us the percentage of British components, he could reply only by saying that it would be significant. He does not know the numbers. Did he even ask? Did it even occur to him to ask?

There does not seem to be much consultation or consideration by the Government, but there is even less, in fact, none at all, with the work force. Whenever in the past the Secretary of State has been pressed to consult the people who work at Leyland Trucks, Freight Rover or other places, the answer has been that that is a matter for the company. We have seen how much that is worth. There was no consultation whatsoever, infinitely less than there would have been in Holland about any such proposals by DAF affecting Dutch workers.

We are now going to have a so-called joint venture with DAF; 40 per cent. Leyland and 60 per cent. DAF, but not 40 per cent. British directors. As several hon. Members from both sides have mentioned, that is not a joint venture, it is a takeover. If we are going to have a genuine joint venture we should at least have 40 per cent. of the directors instead of three out of 17. What we should have is 50 per cent. of the assets and 50 per cent. of the directors.

The hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) told us that, if we do not receive an assurance that the arrangements with DAF will be renegotiated, he will be forced to vote against the Government tonight. I must tell the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) that I do not think that the threat will have much effect on the Government. To be blunt, there is no point in voting against the Government on Wednesday when everybody knows that they will vote for the Government on Thursday, Friday and the following Monday.

The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) told us that the redundancies were "intolerable and frightful". His belief that they are intolerable lasted only to the point when he told us that he would vote for the Government——

Mr. Robert Atkins: That is not true.

Mr. Davis: It is. The words "intolerable and frightful" are the hon. Gentleman's words, but he will vote for the Government.

Redundancies have been emphasised by all my hon. Friends. There were 1,500 at Austin Rover and 2,200 at Leyland and Watford. Of course, there are extra jobs at Jaguar, Lotus and Cowley, and they are all welcome, but the Government and their supporters ignore the fact that extra jobs at Lotus in Norfolk are little use to someone losing a job at Leyland. They ignore the fact that the extra jobs are production jobs whereas the jobs that are being lost at Austin Rover are staff jobs. Are they really suggesting that the redundant manager or clerical worker at Cowley should take a job on the track?

The fact is that many of the people who will lose their jobs will never work again. That is why my hon. Friends and I are angry. I shall tell the House why I am angry. As my hon. Friends know, I used to work in the motor industry. I worked at a factory called Canley in Coventry. I remember when that factory reverberated with the noise of production. If one goes there today, one walks through vast empty halls where the only sounds are the echo of one's own footsteps. At the end of the week the men and women went home with wage packets—not only with wage packets, but with dignity, self-confidence and self-respect. Today those people do not go to work; they go to jobcentres. They do not clock on; they sign on. They do not receive wage packets; they get giro cheques. That is why Opposition Members are angry. As my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North said, they are our neighbours and friends. That is why we are angry.

When we look a the scale and enormity of the damage to industry that has been done by the Government, we are entitled to be angry. When we vote tonight, we shall be expressing not only our anger, but our belief that there must be a better way to treat industry and the people who work in it. We reject the Tory philosophy that people are expendable and that they are only costs of production. I call on all hon. Members from all parties, and from whatever part of the United Kingdom they come, to join the Labour party in the Lobby in opposing that Tory philosophy.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Giles Shaw): I do not wish to share the intemperance of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis). I shall endeavour to respond to the points that have been raised in the debate. I start by saying to him and his right hon. and hon. Friends that there is absolutely no question about the importance of maintaining and maximising the number of people who can work in the vehicle industry, have pride in what they do and return with substantial wages in their pockets. What we have to face, and what the hon. Gentleman did not face, is whether there are substantial numbers of customers to buy the products made by those people and what steps should be taken to secure that people buy the products of the industry.

The debate was opened by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). I shall deal with one or two of the issues that he raised and return to the significant issues shortly. The debate has been fully informed and extremely effective. The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked some specific questions to which I hope to provide answers.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the interest debt in the Rover Group associated with the truck division's losses—about £34 million or £35 million in 1985-86, the last year for which we have full data. The consequence of the debt write-off will be a significant reduction in the interest charges carried by the Rover Group.

The relationship with Honda, mentioned by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, was also reflected in one or two comments by my hon. Friends. That has been and will continue to be a relationship that is gradually moving in phase. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that the first arrangement was that of a licence to build the Acclaim car. The second was a joint development of the Rover 200 series. Thirdly, with the Rover 800 series, there was not only joint development but joint manufacture, part in the United Kingdom and part in Japan. There has been a steady progression in that relationship. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred positively to the fact that Honda believes that the relationship with Austin Rover will be ongoing and continue to be of great significance to both parties.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman and other hon. Members asked about the AR6. It is part of the policy of the chairman of the Rover Group to maximise the opportunity for the sale of small and volume cars. In the corporate plan, from which hon. Members have quoted, there is a firm commitment to that. My hon. Friends spoke about the huge importance of the sales of the Mini and the Metro. Some 30,000 or more Minis and 150,000 or more Metros have been sold in the last full year. We are talking about a large proportion of Austin Rover's sales. The commitment to that underpins the view of the corporate plan.

The corporate plan is on-going. Although it is set for a five-year period, it contains a lot of the seeds of further development. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East asked where production and investment would come from. If he looks in the Austin Rover section of the plan he will see that it does not set out a complete product plan for the five years. The plan will be subject to review as it proceeds from one year to another. As Graham Day said, that is why the AR6 development has not been cancelled. It is still subject to review according to performance in the market place. The crucial matter about the first year of the plan is to see that the group has that development in the market to which we all aspire. All hon. Members will seek to encourage that.

I shall now turn to the cardinal issues in the debate. As I followed it, there was joint agreement that Austin Rover should develop along the lines that have been laid down in the corporate plan. There are important commitments to the investment in the K-series engine and that is widely welcomed. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) said, there are important considerations in the case of Cowley which could well produce important developments.

There is a real possibility of Austin Rover being able to stabilise during the current year and being able to look forward to the future with greater confidence as a volume car producer and, indeed, as a volume car exporter. The export figures for recent years eloquently demonstrate that.

The Austin Rover part of the debate produced few real anxieties, except for the question of jobs which was raised by the hon. Member for Hodge Hill. He said that further redundancies were to be announced. I can tell him that the letter issued on 19 February by Mr. Wharton, the managing director of Austin Rover, says:

> "Approval also enables me to say that we are not planning at present any plant closure or further redundancies—other than those staff reductions already announced."

In the other part of the debate about Leyland Trucks and the DAF proposal there was considerable discussion. I shall deal with the main issue—the question of the merger and the request by my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Hodge Hill that there should not be a proposal for a 60:40 arrangement, but that 50:50 should be the preferred option. I have been under pressure from my hon. Friends to see that this is renegotiated.

I shall explain to the House why the Government feel with cast iron certainty that this is the correct route to follow. The shareholdings are based on the value of the assets which have been brought in by each partner. That is a reasonable view to take. The merged company will have net assets of over £500 million. As the House was told on 26 February, it is envisaged that Rover Group will transfer to the Leyland-DAF joint venture net assets valued at £179 million—considerably less than 50 per cent. As a result of the merger, Leyland will be part of a much bigger operation than before.

In 1986 DAF produced 15,000 trucks compared with Leyland's production of about 10,000. In 1985, the DAF sales revenue was about £650 million compared with sales revenue by Leyland Trucks of about £400 million. The combined revenue of the group is about £1 billion cash.

In 1985, before interest and tax, DAF made profits of over £20 million and Leyland Trucks lost more than £20 million. In arriving at the proposed distribution, the size of the asset base has been taken into account as well as the fact that the DAF portion, brought into the merged company, is more profitable, larger and more effective in the competitive market.

What will be the benefits to Leyland and why are they important? It will mean significant and continued sourcing of components in the United Kingdom. Light trucks will continue to have the majority of their components—suspension units, axles, engines and cabs—sourced in the United Kingdom. The sourcing will be mixed for medium trucks, but DAF intends to increase purchasing in the United Kingdom. It has said that its primary desire is to sell trucks and not to maximise its production of components.

Leyland will be competing as part of one of the largest companies in the European market and will have a broader base in which to compete. It will have the prospect of real growth and the prospect of being part of a profitable enterprise. It is important to point out that, as a result of the arrangements, Rover Group, with its shareholding of 40 per cent., will be able to retain the profits of the total operation including the total operation of the DAF company as presently constituted. On the assumption that Leyland vehicles and Leyland components can be developed Rover Group will be part of a profitable enterprise. Is that likely to happen?

The joint venture is already determined to spend £150 million on the development of the Leyland part of the operation. It is determined to see the development of the broadest range of trucks that can compete in Europe—from the lightest vans to the heaviest trucks.

I appreciate the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) that Cummins may not view the proposal with the greatest pleasure. I found my hon. Friend's logic extraordinary when he accused the Government of making an uncompetitive move and sought to suggest that we should have negotiated a tied deal with component suppliers that would not be open to any competition. He appeared to be suggesting that value for money, quality and regularity of delivery should have no part to play. That is not sensible. It is more sensible to judge whether the combination of the two companies and their European prospects will lead to more of less units being sold.

DAF has already been selling Rover products in Europe—the Sherpa vans—and it is clear that we shall see increased sales. Those Opposition Members who feel that this is a sellout should take note of the fact that, with regard to the light truck sector, instead of the present order of 1,400 units DAF proposes to take 3,400 units within the next 12 months.

The prospects for the venture, formed in the 60:40 relationship, are substantial in relation to Leyland Trucks and the employees. The design and technology unit will remain and there will be sourcing from Albion.

On the question of Scammell at Watford, I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Watford, (Mr. Garel-Jones) —who has been most assiduous in his attention to the issue although unable to take part in the debate—and other hon. Members that the Rover Group has assured us that the Ministry of Defence has been consulted and is satisfied. Moreover, the facilities at Leyland can produce the high and heavy range of special military equipment that Scammell has produced. Therefore, there will be continuity and development of the military range, which is of such importance.

In relation to the merger I turn to the question of board representation. I understand that hon. Members believe that the proposed distribution—one on the management board and two on the supervisory board—is inadquate. All boards of directors must carry out their duties in the name of the company as a whole and for the benefit of the shareholders. It is certainly not the case, nor should it be the case, that the board of directors should be composed on a nationalistic basis. We seek the best technical development of the talents available.

In view of what my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), who made probably the most effective speech in the debate, has asked us to do, we shall, in discussions with the DAF chairman, ascertain whether there is a possibility of changing the number of directors. I understand that those who work in the company might feel——

It being half-past eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to order [10 March], to put forthwith the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings.

Questions put, That the amendment be made:—

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's approval of the Rover Group Corporate Plan; recognises the valuable contribution made by the vehicle industry, both United Kingdom and foreign-owned, to the United Kingdom economy; notes the important role of the United Kingdom component suppliers; welcomes the encouraging outlook for the future of the industry as a whole; and endorses the Government's policies to create the conditions for the long term success of the industry.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Order [10 March].

That the draft Industry Act 1980 (Increase of Limit) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 19th February, be approved.—[Mr. Ryder.]

Question agreed to.

Local Government Finance Bill (Allocation of Time)

11.43 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I beg to move,

That the Order [26th January] be supplemented as follows:

Lords Amendments

1.—(1) The proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall be completed at this day's sitting and subject to the provisions of the Order [26th January], those proceedings shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion two hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion for this Order.

(2) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(3) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(4) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration), a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

(5) If the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, on this day before the expiry of the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion, no notice shall be required of a Motion made at the next sitting by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

2.—(1) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the amendment of the Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment to the said Lords Amendment, moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment, or, as the case may be, in their Amendment as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to the Amendments designated by Mr. Speaker which have not been disposed of the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendments; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Stages subsequent to first consideration of Lords Amendments

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of the proceedings.

4. For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of the remaining items designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their said Proposals; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplemental

5. — (1) In this paragraph 'the procedings' means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of the Message or, as the case may be, for the appointment and quorum of the Committee.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

I am surprised that it is I, rather than an Opposition Member, who am moving the motion. I had assumed that Opposition Members would have been so fed up seeing me at the Dispatch Box discussing local government finance that they would have queued to support the motion. Clearly they are looking forward with relish to more time in the company of relevant and total expenditure, those old friends who are returning again. I will be brief.

There has been one overriding urgency in dealing with the Bill—the need to have a rate support grant report approved by the House and in place before the start of the new financial year so that we can pay grant to local authorities. That urgency remains, and we shall not slacken pace at the 11th hour. [Interruption.] I am corrected by hon. Members—at the 11th hour and the 30th minute. The Bill has been thoroughly debated. To date, we have had over 47 hours of debate, including 2¼ hours on points of order and a procedural motion. We have covered 120 amendments on the Floor of the House. Another place has considered over 100 amendments. That is a substantial expenditure of parliamentary time. During the debates—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Hon. Members should not hold discussions at the Bar of the House. Will those hon. Members who do not wish to take part in the debate please leave the Chamber?

Dr. Boyson: I welcome your timely intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on this important matter. I am sure that hon. Members in various parts of the House were discussing local government issues. It is nice when we can keep such matters on a guillotine motion.

During the debates, I do not believe that anyone seriously challenged the need for a Bill to put on a proper statutory footing the definitions of total and relevant expenditure that local and central Government have accepted since 1981. The definitions are fundamental to the rate support grant and rate limitation systems.

We have, of course, been asked for a shorter measure that deals only with total expenditure or, at any rate, something simpler. I am sure that we would all have preferred that. Unfortunately, it was not possible. The rate support grant system is highly complex and relevant, and total expenditure is endemic to it. The definitions therefore could not simply be waved into place with a magic wand. Complexity was inevitable. Further, for reasons that have been well rehearsed, we have had to make provision also for the 1987-88 rate and precept limitation process in the Bill.

Rate limitation may not be a policy that is beloved by Opposition Members, but it is an established policy and a great benefit to ratepayers. It was right that the policy should continue. We have had to ensure that the rate support grant settlement for 1987-88 can be made immediately on Royal Assent.

The Bill is urgently needed to give local authorities certainty about the operation of the rate support grant and rate limitation systems and to ensure that grant can be paid from the start of the new financial year. The Bill has been fully debated. We should maintain the impetus of that debate. Therefore, I commend the timetable motion to the House.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): All hon. Members look forward to the occasions on which the Minister speaks in his wonderful Lancashire tones. I only regret that he did not follow his father's advice and join the Opposition. The Haslington Labour party is alive and well and looking forward to a great victory at the general election.

The Minister said that the Bill and the guillotine motion are necessary to introduce certainty into the law. The Secretary of State used that alibi back on Second Reading on 12 January, when he said:

"The purpose here is to give authorities the maximum of certainty in setting their budgets and rates over the next two months." — [Official Report, 12 January 1987; Vol. 108, c. 46.]

The finer issues of local government finance are the subject of conversation in working men's clubs and public houses up and down the land. For those hon. Members who have missed the story that has unfolded, since the Secretary of State made his statement on 12 January there have been about 100 separate amendments to the Bill. There were amendments in Committee and on Report, and there were amendments in the other place in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading. All the amendments that were passed were Government amendments. Uncertainty has been heaped upon uncertainty. The

[Mr. Jack Straw]

Secretary of State has shown great incompetence in the drafting and preparation of the Bill and in the administration of the rate support grant system.

On 23 February, local authorities were informed by letter that there had been small errors, but in fact there were rather serious errors in the calculation tables that were sent out following the Secretary of State's statement on 13 January. That led to recalculation by the local authorities. On 5 March, the Secretary of State made a further statement on the Greenwich judgment. That led to the issue of further tables, leading to further calculations by the local authorities.

The need for more time to debate this Bill and the implications of the Lords amendments arises from the Greenwich judgment. I ask the Minister of State to deal with the point that I am about to raise, either now or when we debate the third set of amendments.

As the Bill contains retrospective provisions, it is right to draw the attention of the House to why the learned judge in the Greenwich case decided in favour of Greenwich and against the Secretary of State. The learned judge took the provisions of the Rate Support Grants Act 1986 which, like this Bill, sought to validate all previous acts of the Secretary of State, and said that the Secretary of State had to adhere to the principles that he had originally set out in the rate support grant order for 1986-87 that favoured Greenwich but disadvantaged Bromley, because the decision set out in that order had been validated by the Secretary of State's retrospective validating legislation. It was because of that that the learned judge said that the Secretary of State had been hoist with his own petard.

When the Secretary of State came to the House on 5 March, he said that, for the purposes of the rate support grant, he intended to accept the Greenwich judgment, but that he would appeal against it. The local authorities have been informed of their new rate support grant entitlement on the basis of the Secretary of State's acceptance of the Greenwich judgment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been waiting very patiently to see how the matters to which the hon. Gentleman refers arise out of the motion, but I fail to see how they do. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to the motion.

Mr. Straw: They arise straight out of the guillotine motion. These are major issues that need to be debated. They arise from Lords amendments to clause 7 and from other Lords amendments and there is insufficient time to debate those major issues.

If the Secretary of State were to win the appeal, what would be the position of local authorities, in particular the position of those authorities that have been rate-capped? Presumably the Secretary of State would then issue revised rate support grant calculations. That would have the effect of reducing rate support grant for some authorities, but others, particularly rate-capped authorities, would be unable to do anything about it by means of the rate. Then they would be in deficit. It is important that all local authorities should know what the position is.

During these many debates on the Local Government Finance Bill, we have seen the preparation, decision making and drafting of the Bill taken on the hoof. We do not blame the draftsmen or the officials for that; we blame the Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues for reducing the local government finance system to complete uncertainty and chaos. Much more time is needed to debate these key amendments tabled in another place and not previously debated in this House. For those reasons, we oppose the guillotine motion.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): This evening we are in a ridiculous position. There was no need to guillotine the Bill; it would have run its course this evening. Its passage through the House has not been held up unduly. We should not take up any more of the two hours debating this motion, but should get this squalid little Bill out of the way.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): Whatever the Government may say and the Minister has said tonight about the need to make progress on the Bill to void chaos in the local government budget-making process, the Bill needs all the close scrutiny it can get. That has been demonstrated by the number of changes and amendments —the Minister mentioned a figure of 300—which have already been made both in this House and the other place since it was drafted. Far from avoiding chaos, the Secretary of State has already thrown local government into considerable turmoil by rushing through complicated legislation and not giving himself or the House sufficient time to consider it.

There are several examples of costly errors caused by such haste, the latest of which can be amply demonstrated by looking at what has happened to two authorities on Tyneside. On 23 February a letter was posted informing local authorities of a revision to the probable grant entitlement notified to them on 13 January. On 24 February Lord Skelmersdale said that the changes were small and, referring to Tyne and Wear fire and civil defence authority, said that the authority had not issued its precept. Presumably the assumption was that the fact that the precept had not been issued somehow meant that only a simple adjustment was required. What the noble Lord did not appreciate was that the authority, acting on the information received from the Home Office in January, had met on 23 February and set its precept at 10·55p, before the arrival of the Home Office letter informing the authority that its maximum precept was now 10·54p. Therefore, an extraordinary meeting had to be held to change the precept. The authority complained that considerable wasted time and effort was expended on complying with the Secretary of State's corrections and in preparing, typing and printing a further report; and about additional postage, loss of officers' time, and travelling costs and attendance allowances for members to attend a further meeting on 2 March to give effect to the new limits.

The authorities comment that it is ironic that the rate limitation process, which is supposed to curb public expenditure wastage has created this position. That exposes the ludicrous position into which the Government have plunged local government finance.

In the same county, the city of Newcastle-upon-Tyne received——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having difficulty seeing what that has to do with the motion before the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to the motion.

Mr. Clelland: I am trying to point out that proceeding with such haste on the Bill has already caused considerable chaos. If we proceed in such haste again tonight, it is likely to cause further chaos.

In doing so I am pointing to the chaos that has already been caused in places, such as Newcastle-upon-Tyne. It received the news that its rate limit had been reduced by 0·05p three hours before the council finance committee planned to agree the rate recommendations to the city council. That change plus the consequential amendments necessary to total expenditure and block grant entitlement to keep within the revised limits necessitated 160 amendments to the city council's budget document.

The Minister said that the Bill is necessary to simplify and clarify the law and give more certainty to local government. We have heard that in every local government measure—some 43—since the Tory party came to power.

This bungling and stumbling from one farcical situation to another is a direct result of ill-considered and unwarranted interference in the day-to-day running of democratically elected local authorities. It is a clear demonstration that the real responsibility for the erratic and confusing lurches of local authority rates and finances lies squarely on the shoulders of this autocratic Government and their steamroller mentality, of which this guillotine motion is yet another example.

12.2 am

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I am opposed to a guillotine on the Bill. I am concerned that amendments tabled in the names of my hon. Friends on the Front Bench may not be reached. I should like to give one example, which I am sure will persuade the House. The Secretary of State has directed the London borough of Lambeth to submit a special report by 18 May on direct labour organisations.

That matter has already been referred to in the House by the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) on 6 March, when he claimed that the direct labour department of the London borough of Lambeth had lost the borough some £15 million. That pre-empts the decision that will be made by the Secretary of State, but the situation is rendered unclear by the measures that are before us. The London borough of Lambeth is submitting to the Secretary of State figures which will show that over a three-year period the losses on contracts of over £50,000 are £1·4 million and on contracts under £50,000 are £400,000. At best, the claims of the hon. Member for Streatham were a fantasy; at worst they were a fiction; certainly they were malicious.

It is difficult for boroughs to know for sure where they stand with a Bill such as this. It is not properly amended in the House. In addition, the Secretary of State says that within eight weeks he wants special inquiries and special investigations, into the boroughs. That can only create uncertainty. In reality, the cuts by the Government in local authority housing expenditure of 66 per cent. since 1979 have resulted in a rate of private sector bankruptcy which is double that of 1979. The issues of housing——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interesting though it may be, I do not see how this has anything directly to do with the motion before the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to that.

Mr. Holland: We need more time to debate the amendments, such as amendment No. 4, amendment No. 7, clauses 6 and 8 and other amendments which will not be taken before the House tonight.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I wonder whether you can advise the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because a most bizarre thing has happened. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) has suddenly decided to expose his braces and lie prone on the bench behind your left ear. Is that a usual function that hon. Members may be expected to perform?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What goes on behind me has nothing to do with me, nor, I suggest, with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Holland: I shall not detain the House, given that the allegations made by the hon. Member for Streatham have been countered in the debate. I regret that it is unlikely that we shall get on to the amendments which would enable us to put the case more fully and in more detail.

Orders of the Day

Local Government Finance Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have to inform the House that all the Lords amendments involve privilege.

Clause 2

RATE FUND REVENUE ACCOUNTS: FURTHER PROVISIONS

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 3, line 18, at end insert—

"(4A) Before making a specification under subsection (4) above the Secretary of State shall consider the practices mentioned in subsection (3) above, but such a specification may override those practices."

12.15 am

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, amendment (a), in line 4, leave out

'but such a specification may override those practices'.

We are told that the Conservative party knows about money, that it has experts on money and that many people on the Conservative Benches are professionals when it comes to accounting for money. Although the amendment may sound technical, it raises a crucial issue of financial probity and accounting practices.

Under the Bill as drafted, local authorities must follow accounting practices that are laid down. The Secretary of State is taking powers under the Bill to provide for what are described as specifications, which are rules relating to accounting practices. There was much debate in the other place about how those requirements would interact with other requirements of the Bill. Labour and other Peers tabled amendments to require the Secretary of State, in laying down the specifications, to have regard to proper accounting practices. Those amendments were withdrawn after promises were made by the Minister in another place that, later in the proceedings, amendments which encapsulated the principles of the Opposition amendments, but which were better drafted, would be tabled.

What happened was that, only yesterday—such is the haste with which the Bill has been forced through—the Minister tabled this extraordinary amendment, which reads:

"Before making a specification under subsection (4) above the Secretary of State shall consider the practices mentioned in subsection (3) above, but such a specification may override those practices."

The Secretary of State is taking to himself powers to override good accounting practices or, indeed, any accounting practices.

The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy is highly respected by hon. Members on both sides of the House as being completely non-political and concerned wholly with professionals in local authority and public service accountancy. It wrote to our colleagues in the Lords to express serious reservations about that amendment and said:

"The institute is deeply concerned that the Secretary of State should have such freedom to override proper accounting practices. Although the Secretary of State may not intend to abuse these powers, the wording of the amendment would allow the Secretary of State to undermine the integrity of all or any local authority's accounts. Surely it cannot be right that a Secretary of State can direct a public body to do something which he knows to be inconsistent with 'proper practice'. Yet this is exactly what the amendment would enable him to do."

I hope that Conservative Members who take an interest in these matters are as concerned as many noble Lords were about the implication of the amendments.

The Minister sought to get himself out of a tight corner. He said:

"There has been some misunderstanding that the Government amendment would also give my right hon. Friend powers to override proper practices. It is not the Government amendment which provides for this; it is the Bill itself."

That is extraordinary.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I do not think that that is extraordinary at all. Is that not the effect of clause 2(5)? — [Interruption.] The point is that the Bill already provides what the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is suggesting that the amendment adds to the Bill. Clause 2(5) already provides an overriding power. — [Interruption.]

Mr. Straw: I am pleased to see that the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) who, like my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), has a nice line in braces, has awoken from his slumbers. He will be wholly familiar with the revisions of clause 2(5) which states:

"Subsection (1) shall have effect subject to subsection 1(3) above and to any specification under subsection (4) above."

I can read as well as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith).

The issue is whether it is right that the Bill or the Government amendment should override proper practices. We say that that is wrong. Ministers have to provide a far better explanation of what they are doing before anybody should accept that.

It was not only Labour Peers who objected to that but those on the Cross Benches and those who have had years of experiences in interpreting the law. For example, the noble and learned Lord, Lord Denning said that the ideas encapsulated in the Government amendment seem "to be entirely contrary to principle. In a sense, an auditor is like a judge; He is a judge of accounts in the same way as an ordinary judge is a judge of men. As with a judge, it is the duty of an auditor to be impartial and independent of authorities."

He also referred to section 15 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 which expressly refers to proper accounting practices:

"an auditor shall by examination of the accounts and otherwise satisfy himself . . . that proper practices have been observed in the compilation of the accounts." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 10 March 1987; Vol. 485, c. 941-42.]

When the Minister replied on this matter in the other place, he tried to draw a distinction between the responsibilities of the auditor and the accounting practices of the local authority. However, that is a distinction without a difference for these purposes, because the requirement of section 15 is for the auditor to ensure himself that the local authority has observed proper practices in the compilation of the accounts, not that the auditor has observed proper practices.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Is the hon. Gentleman not raising the point as to whether, in the conduct of their professional practice, auditors have engaged in what has amounted to creative accounting? I described that the other day, without disrespect to the chartered body concerned, as practices which have grown up which are inimical to good accounting practices as they apply to local authorities.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman is more confused than ever.—[Interruption.] I am glad to see that I have some approbation for that from behind the hon. Gentleman. The auditors have not engaged in any sort of creative accountancy practices. We shall debate that tomorrow morning on clause 1 of the next Local Government Bill. If there has been any creative accountancy, it has been by the local authorities. It has all been lawful. Much of it, as we shall discuss tomorrow, has been undertaken by Conservative authorities.

The question is whether the accounting practices have been proper. The hon. Gentleman may be alleging that accounting practices have been improper——

Mr. Cash: I am.

Mr. Straw: If they are improper, of course, we should be the first to say that no auditors should follow them. We are talking about the observance of proper practices. The hon. Gentleman says that he dislikes improper accounting practices. He had better realise when he votes on our amendment that he will be voting to give any Secretary of State, who may not always be the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewksbury (Mr. Ridley), the right to specify improper accounting practices and to have them enshrined in the law. That is the simple but serious issue.

I cannot for the life of me see why the Government have decided to draft their amendment in the way that they have. So far as we can see, it does not provide them with any needed protection. It appears to put a Secretary of State in a position where he can endorse improper accounting practices. In the words of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy:

"the wording of the amendment would allow the Secretary of State to undermine the integrity of all or any local authority's accounts."

That is a serious charge by CIPFA against the Secretary of State and Ministers. Unless there is a convincing answer to that charge, we shall vote for our amendment and against the Lords amendment. I hope that we will be joined in the Lobby by many other hon. Members.

The Minister for Local Government (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) referred to the debate in the other place. An undertaking was given there, which we believe was carried through to the letter. It was given on Report and the amendment was brought forward on Third Reading. So we fulfilled the obligation that we took on.

Mr. Straw: The Minister is on the wrong amendment.

Dr. Boyson: I am not.

The question has been asked how the provisions permitting specifications to override the requirement of clause 2(1) to observe the proper practices in clause 2(3) interact with the provision in the Local Government Finance Act 1982, which requires a local authority's auditor to satisfy himself that the authority has used proper practices in the compilation of its accounts. I welcome the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith).

Section 15 of the 1982 Act requires the auditor to satisfy himself not only that proper practices have been observed in the compilation of accounts but that the accounts are prepared in accordance with regulations made under section 23 of the 1982 Act and comply with the requirements of all other statutory provisions applicable to the accounts. In other words, the auditor must satisfy himself that the accounts comply with the law. Once a specification is made, it is the law, and the auditor must satisfy himself that it is complied with.

As to proper practices, section 15 of the 1982 Act does not refer to any particular practices and describes them as proper. It simply requires auditors to satisfy themselves that proper practices have been observed, but they must also satisfy themselves that the law has been complied with. They would not be able to discharge their duty by ignoring the law and simply looking at proper practices. The proper practices must reflect the law. Something required by law cannot be improper. There is therefore no conflict.

Mr. Straw: If there is no conflict between proper practices and a specification, why have the Government used the words that appear in the amendment—

"such a specification may override those practices."?

That clearly suggests that it is in the minds of Ministers that a specification would be contrary to a proper practice and therefore would override that proper practice.

Dr. Boyson: It is up to my hon. Friend to say what is proper. That is what I said and it was extrapolated brilliantly by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) in a way which could be understood throughout the House. I shall repeat the last three sentences. They would not be able to discharge their duty by ignoring the law and simply looking at proper practices. The proper practices must reflect the law. Something required by law cannot be improper. There is therefore no conflict. That seems perfectly clear and I invite the House to accept amendment No. 1 and to reject amendment (a).

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I support amendment (a). What always alarms me about Conservative Members and the Minister is their dismissive attitude to the whole of local government practices which at one time they professed to support. The Government appear to regard local government finance legislation as some kind of political adventure playground in which they can lash out wildly in all directions and encourage parliamentary draftsmen to produce ever more wild catch-all phrases in order, somehow, to prevent local government from getting round the legislation.

In this case the Government seem to be worried that their legislation still has loopholes. Because they are worried about that, they suddenly put in a phrase so that if local government appears to be circumventing what the Government want, they can simply determine by order what the law shall be. The Government do not want local government to be responsible. If they did, they would enhance the role of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy rather than denigrate it in this way.

I doubt whether anybody would seek to undermine the professionalism and intregrity of the people in the institute who have worked hard to produce a code of practice that is acceptable throughout local government. That code has no political bias—it is a professional code of practice. The institute has put it forward for consultation and the Minister has not even told us whether he is passionately in favour of what the institute has produced. I presume that, if he is not, he will be able to suggest improvements and have negotiations with the institute. The institute would be happy to have such negotiations.

No doubt the Minister knows that the institute has written to hon. Members saying that it is not unduly concerned about the provisions of the Bill because it believes that the code of practice that it has worked on would stand. What happened when the Bill reached the other place? Suddenly, Lord Skelmersdale came along with amendment introducing a catch-all phrase which undermines the work done by the institute. That is not the kind of legislation that this House should ever support, because it is a case of the Government casually setting aside the work carried out by professional bodies.

The sort of thing that is happening here is precisely what Government Members have always criticised on the Left of the Labour party when in the past Labour has suggested that when in office it will pass an enabling Bill. The Labour party has said that it will introduce an enabling Bill giving powers to correct things by order, and that there would be no possibility thereafter of those things coming back to the House. The Government have rightly criticised that and said that it is undemocratic, but now what do they bring forward, but an enabling Bill?

The Government say, "Here is the legislation, and if it does not work the Secretary of State can set down anything he wants in order to overturn what is set out in previous legislation." This is a disgrace to the House and is far more significant than some of the proposed legislation that has come before us. The fact that we are debating an amendment to a Lords amendment at 12·30 in the morning is immaterial. We are dealing with a significant constitutional point. The House should not accept the Lords amendment, but should agree to amendment (a).

Mr. Tim Smith: I come to this legislation rather late in the day, but yesterday I was alerted by a Member of the other place, who is also a chartered accountant, to the fact that the legislation contained a point of concern for the accountancy profession.

The Government are proposing that a specification should be able to overrule an accountancy practice. I understand how this has come about, but it is an unfortunate development. The clause is designed to determine with more precision what is relevant expenditure and therefore what is eligible for rate support grant. I hope that I have got that right.

It is unfortunate that we must dictate to local authorities how they go about constructing their accounts to define what is or is not eligible for rate support grant. There should be a better way. In most cases, there will be an agreed practice, but in some cases it will be possible for a particular transaction to be dealt with by one or more practices. I suppose that some local authorities have been irresponsible and have presented a transaction in a way that will enable it to qualify for the maximum of grant.

Accountants and auditors who work in local government are concerned that we are reaching the point where little discretion will be left to professionals and that the content of accounts will be largely dictated by the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Straw: With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Minister said that the amendment that had been brought forward in the Lords was consistent with undertakings given by the noble Lord Skelmersdale to the Labour and other Peers who supported the amendment in Committee in the Lords.

I wish to make it clear that the Labour and Cross-Bench Peers who moved the amendment in Committee were horrified when they saw this amendment. Baroness David said:

"When the Minister said that he would accept the amendment in principle and come back with his own amendment on Report, I thought we would get a real improvement. However, I find the reverse." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 10 March 1987, Vol. 485, c. 941.]

In no sense is the amendment an improvement on what was sought in Committee in the Lords. As Baroness David said, it is quite the reverse. It increases confusion and puts arbitrary power in the hands of Ministers, and we intend to press the amendment to a vote.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

"Any basic block grant calculation"

12.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this we are to discuss Lords amendment No. 3.

Mr. Chope: These are both technical amendments to subsections (3) and (4). They are to make it clear that, when we come to make the conclusive calculations of block grant for 1981-82 and 1982-83 for England and Wales and for 1983-84 for Wales, we can take account of education pooling adjustments in the way we were intending and in the way local authorities expect.

Mr. Straw: The Opposition are not intending to oppose the amendments——

Mr. Chope: Very gracious of you.

Mr. Straw: The Minister says from a sedentary position that that is very gracious of us, and I take that compliment in the spirit in which it was intended.

The amendments illustrate the difficulties that the Government had in drafting their way out of the legal morass or bog in which they found themselves.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 3 agreed to.

Clause 7

RESTRICTIONS ON RATING AND PRECEPTING

Lords Amendment: No. 4, in page 6, line 39, leave out "and".

Dr. Boyson: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this amendment we are to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 5 and 7 to 15.

Dr. Boyson: These amendments provide for a new formula for determining rate limits for newly selected authorities, or are drafting amendments to schedule 2 designed to facilitate comprehension of a highly technical text. Everyone will agree with that.

The effect of the amendments is that newly selected authorities will have headroom to spend up to at least a level equivalent to their grant-related expenditure plus 9 per cent. On the basis of my right hon. Friend's current intentions for the 1987-88 RSG settlement, two authorities are affected by this change in formula—Gateshead and Newham, with increases in their intended rate limits of some 3p and 44p respectively.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): These amendments are of major importance for Newham. I can think of no single issue that I have dealt with in Parliament which has had a greater direct impact on the borough. This flawed Bill, which was introduced in great haste and which is being rushed through both Houses because of the legal mess would, unamended, have had a devastating effect on the borough, robbing it of resources.

Immediately, a movement was mobilised in Newham to campaign for a better deal and an amendment to the Bill. On 4 February, a great demonstration, complete with meetings and a march of some 7,000 people, took place, followed by a lobby of Parliament. Many who participated must have wondered whether such effort and activity was worth it and would have any effect. I can only say to any doubters, in view of what has transpired:

"Say not the struggle naught availeth", for the very next day the Minister of State's office contacted me to accept my previous invitation and to make arrangements for the Minister to visit Newham to see things for himself.

In the various debates that we have had on the different stages of the Bill, all three Newham Members have played a full part, as did the noble Lord, Lord Elwyn-Jones, in another place. A proper modesty forbids me from saying too much about their speeches, but I hope it can be said that they were persuasive and informative and laid out the facts in detail and accuracy.

It would be churlish not to recognise the constructive role of the Minister of State. Above all, he was prepared to listen; it is no use speaking if no one is prepared to listen. I for one appreciate the fact that he was prepared to listen and to visit the borough. Hence we have these amendments, which will allow the borough an expenditure limit some £7 million higher than it otherwise would have had—£7 million that is badly needed.

I do not pretend that the amendments will solve the borough's financial problems, for they will not. For example, we now lose even more block grant and the borough will still have to make many cuts. But the amendments will limit the damage and will avert the catastrophe that threatened us, and we cannot but appreciate that.

For the future, the three Newham Members will continue vigilantly to watch over the interests of the borough, strive to obtain a fair share of resources and justice for our area, and exert ourselves for the people who sent us here.

Mr. Cash: I am delighted that the Government have helped Newham. On the other hand, I must say quickly that the comprehension to which the Minister referred completely escapes me. I find the whole formula incredibly complicated, as I am sure does everyone else. But I wish my hon. Friend well, because apparently the formula achieves its objective.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): May I first associate myself with what my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) said about these amendments? I do so though with mixed feelings, as I am sure that the Minister of State will understand. It is mainly because we have avoided an unforseen quirk in the formula which was imposed upon newly capped authorities. It reminds hon. Members of the powers that the Minister is taking. That matter was referred to in regard to the first group of amendments. In fact, the executive is advancing into areas hitherto the responsibility of the courts. Of course, we thought that that was achieved in 1688, but we are going backwards, apparently, into the year 1988. Indeed, the high court of Parliament, in its deliberations in the House and in another place, has at least dealt with a difficulty. For that—I echo the words of my hon. Friend—we are grateful.

Of course, the amendment only brings us back to the position that the Government intended us to be in before the amendment was accepted. When I moved the original amendment—to give a sum of grant-related expenditure plus about 10 per cent.—the Under-Secretary of State refused it for reasons that he thought were important. He referred to happenings in Newham and produced some figures. When my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and I wished to intervene, he would not permit us to do so.

I shall quote but one instance to show the well-known flaws involved in quoting statistics without having background knowledge. For instance, the Under-

[Mr. Nigel Spearing]

Secretary of State said that 2,420 empty dwellings were in the possession of Newham council. He said that it was one of the worst, if not the worst, areas in the country. He had forgotten, did not know, or did not find out, that about 1,000 of such dwellings in my constituency were in empty tower blocks of the Ronan Point type. He mentioned other matters, as did Lord Skelmersdale when he replied to an amendment moved by Lord Elwyn-Jones. Since that date, and on the occasion of the Minister's welcome visit, the borough has supplied facts and figures that completely contradict the point made by the Under-Secretary of State. Hon. Members have not referred to the figures tonight. I shall not refer to them at length, but I shall give one example of the use of what I regard as flawed statistics. Unless we hear from the Minister or the Under-Secretary of State, who may reply to the debate, I shall take it that the statistics are broadly accepted.

The moral is that there seems to be some lack of communication between Newham and Marsham street, where my hon. Friends and I and, indeed, the Minister have done our best to bridge the gap. I do not know whether there has been more than one level of information flow or whether the sources of information on which the Under-Secretary of State and, sometimes, others have relied have perhaps not been as official as they might be. For instance, there has been concern about the speed of council house sales. Obviously, the council does not like it, but there is a legal obligation so to do. On 18 February the policy and resources committee of the London borough of Newham gave authority for private estate agents to speed up such sales. That is an illustration of the fact that sometimes what appears to be in figures is not present in fact or intent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East said that the Bill is only an amelioration. I understand from the borough that the gap of £33 million in next year's budget has now been reduced to £26 million. In terms of actual cash revenue, what was to be a gap of around £14 million has been reduced to £10 million. A reduction in one year of a needed £10 million is hurtful.

Newham's expenditure in the current year is £167 million. I understand from the borough that if services are to be held at the same level, taking into account inflation and rising bed and breakfast and other costs to cover matters that require statutory attention, the revenue for the forthcoming year should be about £175 million.

This amendment will provide for expenditure of £165 million, leaving a gap of £10 million. Painful cuts will therefore have to be made in Newham, the second most deprived borough in the country. There will have to be education and social services cuts and there will also have to be cuts in the services provided for the elderly and infirm who live in their own homes. I do not see how those cruel cuts can be avoided if the borough is to keep within the law.

Most hon. Members, including Conservative Members, will be glad to know that at its last council meeting the council adopted a budget that falls within the legal constraints of this Bill. However, that legal budget will involve cruel injustices being meted out to the people of Newham. Conservative Members may think that they are penalising those of a different political colour from themselves. That is one way of looking at it. However, they are penalising some of the best but some of the least privileged people in this country, however they may vote —and some of them do not vote. I am not surprised that they get fed up with politicians. Sometimes the difficulties that are caused by the cuts that are imposed by Marsham street are thought to be due to the council. Many people do not distinguish between Members of Parliament and councillors, let alone between those who are in Government and those who are in Opposition. People do not necessarily see where the responsibility for these cuts lies. It lies with the Government—nowhere else.

The rates figures are also significant. Despite these urgent needs, there is to be a rates reduction of 11 per cent. That will be welcomed by many but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East pointed out, one of the difficulties is that although we are being given an additional £15 million in rate support grant, there is to be an increase of £7·5 million in what the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy calls flowback, but which I prefer to call clawback or a rates tax.

Despite the amelioration that this formula provides, there will be very real problems. I am glad to see that the Secretary of State has arrived in the Chamber. I want to ask him what would happen if the same thing were to happen in Gloucestershire. I have been looking at the figures, and I understand that the equivalent expenditure in Gloucestershire to Newham's £167 million is about £183 million. If Gloucestershire were faced with an £8 million cut in its revenue in the forthcoming year, I wonder how Gloucestershire county council would cope? I wonder, too, how the Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewksbury (Mr. Ridley), would cope. What would people think of him and of the Government? I cannot imagine that the Gloucestershire cuts, if there were to be any at all, would come anywhere near to those in Newham.

I conclude this mixed speech of thanks by saying something that I believe ought to be said. It has been said on a number of occasions, but now that the Secretary of State is here it ought to be said very clearly indeed. I do not believe that by their actions this Government show that they believe in local government. In bulk financial terms, most of the services that are provided for our people arise from the interface between local government and local people. Yes, there is a DHSS office, Ministry inspectors for this and people in bowler hats, metaphorically speaking, who come from Marsham street and other Ministries. But most community services—50 per cent. as opposed to 60 per cent.—are paid for by taxpayers. The Government are responsible, and how responsible they are now that the Secretary of State has an iron grip on how the money should be used!

I cannot imagine how any Government who believe in the democratic accountability of services can produce such a succession of debilitating Acts of Parliament, confusions and procrustean activities, yet continue to think that the machine can work. Even if we did not have this last minute recantation there would be terrible strains on local government in Newham and elsewhere.

People are beginning to doubt whether the Secretary of State and his friends are wedded to local democracy. They ask, "Is this not a plot to give local government a bad name and to make it impossible for it to work, so that central Government powers become greater and local government powers diminish? Does that not fit in with the Government's philosophy of reducing public involvement and centralising democratic accountability?"

Some hon. Members may think that a Mephistophelean approach, and the way in which the Government have proceeded suggests that that is, indeed, the case. The way in which the Secretary of State has dealt with the Bill, Newham and some of the most needy areas has confirmed that that view, not only has content, but nearly has proof.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I shall be brief because most of the points have been made by my hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

We must acknowledge that the Minister of State has through his actions, particularly his visit to Newham, granted some of our requests. We proposed a major part of Lords amendment No. 4 in this House, but at that time the Government chose not to concede the point. Clearly, as the facts emerged, the Government realised that a major error was being made. If the amendment is passed—naturally, we shall not vote against it—Newham will be about £7 million better off than it would otherwise have been.

The amendment will still require Newham to cut its expenditure to a level closer to the GREA than 16 of the 20 rate-capped local authorities and to cut its rates by more than those of 16 of the 20 rate-capped local authorities. We must still find about £10 million-worth of cuts. In a borough such as Newham, that will cause great distress, pressure and hardship, when little more hardship can be borne by the people who live there.

We shall accept the amendment—naturally, we must take whatever we can possibly get in these straitened times—but it will nevertheless mean that next year Newham will face a disaster rather than a catastrophe.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): I am grateful to have the opportunity to say a word or two on behalf of the metropolitan borough of Gateshead. Until this moment, this has been a Newham debate. Perhaps that is just, because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) said, the Bill has major importance for Newham. Unfortunately, it is of minor importance to the metropolitan borough of Gateshead. If Ministers expect the borough to be teeming with gratitude, I must disappoint him.

Ministers are aware that the metropolitan borough of Gateshead has been badly treated in this exercise. At the council's budget meeting tomorrow, the amendment will make no noticeable difference to the borough's problems.

The council faces a £12 million reduction on what it would need to stand still on last year's budget. It cannot be described as a high-spender; it is not a profligate council. It is a local authority with needs, which are recognised by the Government through the inner area partnership and the national garden festival, which is to be held in the borough in 1990.

What the measure means to the metropolitan borough of Gateshead is no extra Government support; indeed, it means a reduction in block grant. It means an increase in an already inadequate expenditure level of some £500,000 from £98 million to £98·5 million. It means that instead of the council being forced to reduce its rate by 9 per cent. next year, it will have to reduce it by about 8 per cent.

Hundreds of jobs will still be lost and services will still suffer. The analogy as to Gateshead is of a man who was to have 10 fingers amputated and is told that he is to have only nine fingers amputated. I do not think the Ministers can expect such a man to feel much relief from that prospect.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Looking at the complicated formulae in schedule 2, I am glad to find that the printers have as much problem as hon. Members and that we had to have a correction slip. If I raise questions from an inquiring spirit, wishing to know answers, I hope that the Minister will take that in good part.

Why, if some help was given to the London borough of Newham, was there not a way of giving some help to the London borough of Tower Hamlets? The London borough of Tower Hamlets has been told by officers that out of its rate-capped sum of £124 million, £24 million, as a net sum, will have to be spent on housing 1,500 homeless families. It has no way of avoiding that.

The Minister may also be aware that his hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction, by his midnight deadline at the appropriate date in February, cut off a scheme which might have been of great help to 600 families. It seems to me monstrously unfair to deal with a problem relating to a London borough nearby—which I welcome—but not with a borough which is affected just as much as Newham.

As far as I can make out from the formulae, there has been no increase in assistance under that formulae for the problems of the fire service. I told the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department that I would be happy if the west Yorkshire fire service were able to meet Home Office standards. Unfortunately, because of the limits imposed by the Department of the Environment, it is unable to do so. The Under-Secretary believed that there was enough money under the provisions of the rules of the Department of the Environment for the west Yorkshire fire service to be able to operate effectively. What he may not have known at that time was that the fire service has now announced that it has mothballed a number of fire appliances. It will not be able to run them and, therefore, it will be unable to meet Home Office standards.

It seems odd that we are faced with a set of Lords amendments, which alter in some detail the complicated formulae yet which do not deal with the precise question that any logical person would find difficult not to accept. There has been a mistake, which should be put right so that the fire service can run effectively.

1.15 am

Mr. Straw: This group of amendments makes provision for Newham and Gateshead not to receive additional funds but to spend more of their ratepayers' money at a saving to the Government. In addition, it rewrites the Bill on rate capping.

We are glad that the Minister listened carefully to the representations that were made to him and was able to agree to these changes. I say that with no qualification. Like my hon. Friends from Newham and Gateshead I must also say that those authorities will still unfairly be placed in difficulties. It is important that while we thank the Minister for listening we should not give the impression that the Minister has provided any money. Indeed, the Treasury is probably smiling all the way to the bank because it saves on this arrangement.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The Treasury never smiles.

Mr. Tony Banks: It smirks.

Mr. Straw: No doubt it will be pleased. In many ways it will have supported Newham's representations because of the saving of rate support grant. That illustrates one of the many bizarre aspects of the rate support grant system. An apparent Government concession to ease the rate-cap limit saves the Treasury money. The people at a disadvantage are the ratepayers in Newham and Gateshead.

From the start, my hon. Friends the Members for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) and I were concerned about the situation in Newham and Gateshead which was drawn forcefully to our attention by our hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), and I want to pay tribute to them for the way in which they and their authorities ran their campaigns so intelligently to bring the plight of their areas to the Government's attention to ensure that there was a change of mind by Ministers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South spoke of the situation in Newham. He knows that I had a family connection with Newham because for many years my mother was a headmistress of a nursery school in a deprived part of Newham. No one can say that at any stage of its existence Newham has been a profligate authority — to use the standard term of abuse. In comparison with adjoining authorities of different political complexions Newham has had a reputation for economy to say the very least. On many occasions I went to see my mother's school — [Interruption.] The maintenance of school buildings in Newham does not compare well with other authorities, nor does the overall level of resources available to that authority.

It is no good the Secretary of State smiling. None of us has thanked the Secretary of State tonight and none of us intends to. One of the Secretary of State's problems, on which he is no doubt reflecting after yesterday's little episode, is a stupefying degree of insensitivity to problems of which he has no direct experience and a desire not to comprehend the fact that many people in Britain live in conditions in which no hon. Member would wish to live, certainly, not in the high rise or low rise accommodation of Newham that was forced on such areas by the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) when he was the Minister responsible for housing in the early 1960s.

The amendments raise other problems. They illustrate an arbitrariness in the way in which rate capping has been pursued this year because, it is said, of the problems and defects in previous legislation which require the Bill and because of the rules on hybridity which prevented Ministers from making individual judgments on individual cases. It was the Opposition's contention in amendments that we moved earlier in the proceedings, that it would still have been possible for Ministers without facing the dangers — from their point of view — off hybridity, to apply a re-determination process that took account of individual circumstances, but without the need for extra limbs to the algebraic formulae that appear on pages (2) and (3) of the amendment paper.

Rate capping was sold to a very sceptical House, and that scepticism was felt on both sides of the House not least on the basis that while the principles would apply to all authorities, individual Ministers would consider the merits of cases of authorities individually, case by case. They have not been able to do that within the framework of this legislation and they have introduced greater arbitrariness into the rate capping system.

My final point relates to an issue that I raised in the short debate on the guillotine motion.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The hon. Gentleman referred to the reluctance of the House at the time to accept the principle of rate capping. Does he regret the absence of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), who has been a formidable opponent of such matters for some time? He said that if the Government believed that they could hurt those in need to benefit those without need, they had another think coming. It is a shame that the hon. Member for Selly Oak is not here to make his case this evening.

Mr. Straw: I certainly regret that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) is not present. I dare say that he took part in the earlier debate on the motor industry. However, unlike the Ministers in the Department of the Environment today, the hon. Member for Selly Oak takes the old Conservative view of local government and considers that a local government invested with substantial degrees of independence is an idea that is wholly consistent with, and indeed underpins, the old Conservative tradition. The hon. Member for Selly Oak has sought to defend that against the centralists, the Poujadists, who now occupy most of the Treasury Bench.

After that short diversion, I want to consider the issue that I raised in the debate on the guillotine motion and I would be grateful if the Minister would reply to this point. My point relates to the Greenwich decision and any appeal by authorities that are rate-capped. I spelt this out in the debate on the guillotine motion, but I want to repeat the point. Greenwich went to court because of an argument with the Secretary of State about the way in which the grant-related expenditure assessment for road maintenance, which had previously been held by the GLC, should be distributed between the various London boroughs. It is quite untrue, as the Department of the Environment press office has tried to dissemble was the case, that Greenwich had been given GREAs for roads that did not exist. That was never the case and no formula——

Dr. Boyson: Greenwich stole the money.

Mr. Straw: That is very interesting. From a sedentary position the Minister has just said that Greenwich stole the money from other authorities.

Dr. Boyson: As I understand the position—and the Opposition often makes great play of moral cases—money either belongs to someone or it does not. If the Government cannot legally give that money to the person who is entitled to it and someone else takes it gratefully, it would not be stealing in the sense of the law, but to the ordinary person it would appear that the latter had money that belonged to someone else. That is my interpretation of the Greenwich case.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): But it is not stealing.

Dr. Boyson: It is keeping money that one knows one should not have.

Dr. Cunningham: It is not stealing.

Dr. Boyson: If the hon. Gentleman had listened, he would have heard me say clearly—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene, he can do so, but it is a limited debate and it will only stop others from talking.

If someone receives money which, in justice, should go to someone else, and keeps it, many people may not consider that to be stealing in the eyes of the law, but they would say that it was unjust. That is how I see the case. Bromley had the 90 km of roads allocated to it, but the money was not allocated to it as it should have been and it went elsewhere, including to Greenwich and other boroughs. They kept it, legally, but I still believe that the money should have gone to the borough that was allocated the roads. I answered the point in the previous debate. That is my understanding of the case. The interpretation of the courts is a legal, not a moral interpretation.

Mr. Tony Banks: Let us have another Local Government Bill then.

Mr. Straw: I am almost at a loss for words after hearing the Minister parodying the position of Greenwich — [Interruption.] I shall give way to the Secretary of State, too, if that is why he is shifting in his seat.

The Minister sought to parody the position of Greenwich by suggesting that it took money from Bromley. I remind him that Greenwich was in a position to receive money not as a result of any action that it had taken, but as a result of decisions taken by Ministers.

Dr. Boyson: They knew that it was not their money, but they kept the money. The hon. Gentleman would not have done it, and I would not have done it—or would he?

Mr. Straw: It may not have been a decision of this Minister, because there have been so many changes at the Department of the Environment that we cannot keep track of them. Let me spell out what happened. First — the Minister was not responsible for this policy — the Government decided to abolish the GLC. Greenwich did not participate willingly in that decision; indeed, it opposed the abolition. The GLC's grant-related expenditure assessments for highway maintenance had to be transferred to the boroughs, and that was done pro rata to the borough's GREA. The GLC's expenditure had to be spread among the boroughs and then a multiplier was set to equalise the cost to each authority. The formula for highway maintenance GREAs was improved as a result of negotiations between the local authority associations and the Department, with Ministers approving the change. Does the Minister deny that Ministers approved that change? I think that the answer is coming from his officials.

Dr. Boyson: This is a hymn sheet.

Mr. Straw: I wish it was. Does the Minister deny that Ministers approved that improvement in GREAs?

Mr. Meadowcroft: Let him read the answer first.

Dr. Boyson: It does not even answer it.

Mr. Straw: It is the wrong answer to the wrong question. The Minister had better see his officials afterwards.

The Minister must understand that the change in the formula took into account not only the length of the roads but the extent to which they were used and the greater intensity of traffic in inner London compared with outer London.

The point is simply that it was Ministers who agreed the original change in the GREA formula, which had the affect of benefiting Greenwich. Ministers encapsulated that in decisions which were then validated by the Rate Support Grants Act 1986, retrospectively, and it was the courts which then said that that validation meant that a subsequent change could not be overturned by Ministers. It was for that reason that the judge in the case said that the Minister had been hoist on his own petard.

1.30 am

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I intervene only to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on having talked for about 10 minutes, without having mentioned the fact that that was the case arising out of the Bromley error. He does not seem to acknowledge that it arose out of an error, rather than any determined judgment.

Mr. Straw: Of course, it is true that almost every decision that Ministers make on rate support grant is an error and has to be changed. — [Interruption.] I have thick files on the Bromley error. I corresponded with the Minister's predecessor but two on that errror, as his own private office files will show. It is not our fault that Ministers or the Department make errors and then bring forward legislation such as the Rate Support Grants Act 1986, which sets all those errors in concrete — [Interruption.] We shall await the final transcript of the case but I can say only that on the details of the judgment I have received, that is a fact of the case. If the case is as the Secretary of State describes it, it is a matter of surprise that a High Court judge could not only have found for Greenwich, but have said all the things that he did about the Secretary of State.

However, the Secretary of State, having lost on Greenwich, has now revised the rate support grant tables. If the Secretary of State wins on appeal, what happens to the rate support grants for each authority, particularly to those authorities which are in tight circumstances and which are rate-capped.

Dr. Boyson: I shall try not to get bogged down in the debate on any other error anywhere else.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) raised the question of help being given to rate-capped authorities, particularly those rate-capped for the first time. We have to have a formula because otherwise we risk hybridity. That is obvious to anybody. The formula we set seemed to be the fairest and most just in so far as GRE is an indication of what should be spent to provide equal services throughout the length and breadth of the country. We came upon the formula, which had been discussed at an earlier stage of the Bill, to put a new piece in the Bill — grant related expenditure plus 9 per cent. If Tower Hamlets had come into that category, the authority would have had the advantage of the formula. However, it did not. The two authorities that did come into the category were Newham and Gateshead.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Why did the hon. Gentleman not consider—given that it is a legal definition—including the homeless families under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 as a factor in setting the limits higher?

Dr. Boyson: The formula was already so complicated that if we had put all those in one, could have included another 51 and be back to GRE. All the aspects referred to by the hon. Gentleman are part of the GRE formula.

The hon. Members representing Newham have not been over-gracious this evening and we began to wonder whether we should vote against the amendment. I shall put that gently on the record. When one does something to try honestly to help somebody else, both sides should accept that.

The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) referred to the Greenwich judgment. An electoral judgment was made in Greenwich as well as the one we are discussing tonight. — [Interruption.] Greenwich was not a Conservative seat. It has been a Labour seat for 50 years. If we had won the seat it would have been even more amazing and a third Greenwich judgment would have had to be taken.

The rate support grant has to be changed because of the Greenwich judgment, and because we obey the law. What is legally right has been interpreted. If we win on appeal — we hope that we shall — in the first supplementary report we shall have to look at the matter again and put it right, otherwise someone else will object. But the decision has been made. If there is a change, we shall have to meet it, we hope on appeal, in a supplementary report.

Mr. Straw: If there is such a change and then a supplementary report, and if there is a loss of grant to the ratecapped authorities, those authorities could run into deficit as a result of the loss, through no fault of their own. Will that be taken into account in any subsequent decisions?

Dr. Boyson: I cannot deal with that now. We shall look at it within the law and the rules that have been laid down in this and other Acts. We cannot go into the details at present.

The decision on the change of formula was made not by me as Minister of State but by the Secretary of State after we had all discussed it together. The three hon. Members who represent Newham — the hon. Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) — have represented their authority as well as any hon. Members could represent anywhere. I trust that I am not risking their reselection by saying that in the House. That decision was made by the Secretary of State when we met at the time. I thank my right hon. Friend for his co-operation after my visit there. He had to take my work for what was happening in Newham. We now know that Newham will catch up on the sale of houses. There has been a quid pro quo. We look forward to the fulfilment of the sale of houses over the next six months.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Minister for his words about the Secretary of State. Indeed, we are glad and grateful that the anomaly in the formula has been rectified. We made that clear during the Minister's visit. The hon. Gentleman will also realise, in case it be misunderstood, that there will still be great difficulties. In due course I shall acquaint the Secretary of State, the Minister of State and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary with some of the unfortunate consequences of the Bill, to which this is an amendment, which I am afraid cannot be avoided. Perhaps the Minister will understand the spirit behind the thanks, and the difficulty that characterised my words.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords Amendment No. 5 agreed to.

Clause 12

INTERPRETATION

Lords Amendment: No. 6, in page 8, line 29, leave out subsection (3) and insert—

"(3) for the purposes of this Part of this Act as it applies in relation to an intermediate year beginning in 1983, 1984 or 1985—

(a) "local authority" also includes the Greater London Council and the Inner London Education Authority within the meaning of section 30 of the London Government Act 1963,

(b) references to the Inner London Education Authority in section 1(1)(c) above, paragraph (c) below and paragraph 2A(10) of Schedule 3 to this Act shall be construed as references to the Inner London Education Authority within the meaning of section 30 of that Act,

(c) the Greater London Council and the Inner London Education Authority shall be taken to be separate local authorites, and

(d) "local authority" does not include a joint authority or the Inner London Education Authority established by section 18 of the Local Government Act 1985."

Mr. Chope: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Straw: We do not oppose the amendment, but it arises, again, as a complication from the abolition of the Greater London council and the fact that there have been three different animals, all known as the Inner London education authority, in the past two years.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords Amendments Nos. 7 to 33 agreed to. [Special Entry.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

1.40 am

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): I am grateful to my hon. Friends for remaining here to listen to the debate. I am pleased to speak on a matter that is of vital importance to a small number of people and of great strategic significance to the Government and to the investing public.

For three reasons, I have a special interest in licensed financial dealers. First, constituents of mine have lost all or part of their savings because of the failure of licensed financial dealers to whom they had entrusted their money. Secondly, I have an interest as the promoter of the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977 which enshrines much of the philosophy of self-regulation in the insurance brokers' profession, which has been studied and in some ways followed by those who prepared the details of the Financial Services Act 1986 and in which I have been able to see the setting up and working of a compensation fund.

Thirdly, I speak as the chairman of the Savers Union. I do not have to declare an interest because this is a wholly honorary position. The union was set up about seven years ago on an all-party basis to be a supporters' club for people, mostly small savers, with money in national avings schemes, building societies and such organisations.

The chief enemy of the saver is inflation, and we in the Savers Union take a small dram of pride in the success that we have had in informing savers about the virtue of defeating inflation. The Savers Union has done a useful job, with a small and loyal membership. We may have a role in future looking after the interests of the small investor in the same way as the Automobile Association looks after the interests of the private motorist.

There is definitely a gap in consumer representation that needs to be filled quickly. I shall start the main part of my speech by talking about the problems of the small investor. In the last 10 years, the number of people holding shares has jumped from about 2 million to about 12 million. That is a staggering increase. Interestingly enough, of the present 12 million shareholders, more than half — about 7 million — hold shares in only one category, many of them in British Telecom or British Gas or in share schemes developed by companies for their employees. They are inexperienced investors and potential prey for sharp financial operators.

I was stung into action when two extremely nice constituents of mine visited me just before Christmas. They told me that they had an investment of £5,000 in Thames Television and that on one Friday they had taken their share certificates to one of the City Investment Centres offices—known in advertisements as CIC asking it to raise money on part of their shares, and to retain the other part for them in share certificates.

About 10 days later they again went along to the CIC office and found a notice on the door that said that the firm had had its licence to trade withdrawn by the Department of Trade and Industry. My constituents have no idea whether they will suffer a total loss or what percentage of their savings will be saved from the wreck.

I appreciate the Department's difficulties in having to withdraw a licence or close down a licencsed financial dealer. If the Department closes down a dealer too early, it may be considered that that action has caused loss to investors because the operators have not been given the time needed to get the business going properly. However, if the Department closes down a dealer too late, as many people feel happened with CIC, it means that more people's savings will be put at risk. That problem represents the kernel of the situation that I wish the House and the Minister to address.

An Adjournment debate on the subject of McDonald Wheeler Fund Management was initiated by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on 17 November 1986. That debate — in common with this one — was answered by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Therefore, there is no need for me to go over that ground again or the dubious role of Mr. Wheeler. I also have constituents who have suffered at the hands of that firm. Another spectacular collapse concerned Prior Harwin shareholders, but as yet, none of my constituents have told me that they are involved in that disaster.

The good news is that the Government have already taken wise, positive steps in the Financial Services Act 1986 to take care of problems arising from failures similar to those I have mentioned. The most important aspect of that Act has been the establishment of a compensation scheme. Such a scheme also featured in the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977. In that instance, the scheme is also supported by professional indemnity cover.

Just as those who deal with registered insurance brokers are covered by a compensation fund, so in future those who deal with registered investment intermediaries will be covered by a compensation fund. However, regrettably, the regulations covering intermediaries will not take effect for about 12 months. Therefore, the compensation provisions and fund will not be effective. We must take steps to deal with the gap between now and when the new Act comes fully into operation.

I ask the House and my hon. and learned Friend to concentrate their minds on what is to happen next year. The Government and the House must find a way to safeguard investors during that period. We may not be able to lock the stable doors before some of the horses have left, as in the cases which I have mentioned, but we have a duty to put a new padlock on the doors to keep horses in until the new stable block has been built, under the auspices of the Securities and Investments Board, which the Financial Services Act will set up.

At present, there is a category of intermediary known as a licensed dealer. I regret that the licence appears to be worthless as a protection of the public. It would be better if it did not exist. Under the licensing scheme, there exists the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Association which admits dealers to membership. The most important part of the name is "Regulatory". When I was first involved in this problem, I was inclined to be extremely critical of FIMBRA, but I now believe that I was wrong. It is trying and has tried desperately hard to do the right thing by investors, but is not yet invested with the necessary powers to enable it to do the job which will be given to it when the Act is fully in place. The great mistake was to put FIMBRA into operation before the whole Act was in place. I am confident that that should not have been done. There is a danger that the public's faith in FIMBRA has been seriously harmed, although, if my outline plan is carried out, the wounds need not necessarily be fatal.

However, in all seriousness, I have to say that, had it not been for the aura of respectability given to some intermediaries by being able to say in their letters and advertisements, "We are dealers authorised to operate by FIMBRA," my constituents have told me that they, and I believe others, would not have dreamed of giving those dealers that confidence. I therefore challenge the wisdom of operating FIMBRA before its compensation fund has been put in place.

Taking this background into consideration, what action should the Government take to safeguard the small investor during the vital next 12 months? I suggest that the following steps should be taken. First, FIMBRA should immediately instruct its members, except those such as registered insurance brokers who are already covered by a compensation scheme, not to use its logo until the Act is in place, or there should be a Government financial health warning ensuring that FIMBRA members in their advertisements and correspondence clearly state that there is no compensation fund or insurance unless theirs are specifically in existence. However, I have reluctantly been persuaded that it is not possible for retrospective compensation to be arranged to help those who have already suffered loss, and I deeply regret the loss and distress which they have suffered.

Secondly, all current investors who are not fully experienced in financial dealing should at once write to their bank managers, or call on them, to ask whether those who are handling their finances are covered by compensation schemes or other insurance policies, as are stockbrokers, registered insurance brokers and other professional advisers. They should then accept their bank managers' recommendations whether to continue or not with their present dealers.

Thirdly—this is the crux of my argument—I ask the Government to enter into earnest discussions with FIMBRA to persuade it immediately to put a compensation scheme in place such as it will need to do when the Act is fully in operation. The Government should be ready and willing to make a loan to FIMBRA of an appropriate sum—I do not know what that figure might be, but let us say £5 million—to be repaid in full after four or five years, when FIMBRA's own scheme of compensation is in operation. This will mean that the investing public will instantly be given the safeguards which they need and, which I believe they thought they had already. We cannot sit in this place with folded hands and watch calmly while further calamities befall our unsuspecting constituents.

Finally, I urge my hon. and learned Friend the Minister, who is wise, well informed and sympathetic, to talk to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and to FIMBRA about that which I have suggested. By adopting it, he will prove that the Government are determined to protect and encourage the new army of small shareholders whom their policies have rendered willing volunteers in the investment scene.

1.57 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page) on securing the Adjournment debate, and I am grateful to him for the way in which he has raised an important subject. There is, in my view rightly, a deep concern on both sides of the House that investors should be properly protected, and my hon. Friend has drawn attention to a number of important elements in any system of investor protection. My hon. Friend's record in championing the interestes of investors through the Savers' Union and the promotion of the Act which is colloquially known by his name, the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977, is one that needs no embellishment.

I should perhaps start by reminding the House that we are now in something of a transitional phase. The Government recognised some time ago that the existing system of investor protection was inadequate. The Financial Services Act 1986, which received Royal Assent in November, seeks to replace the existing system with a comprehensive new system of investor protection, drawing on the advantages of practitioner-based regulation but giving it firm statutory backing, and introducing also a range of new powers. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his commendation of the legislation. We are determined to bring the new system into effect as soon as possible, but it will inevitably take a little while.

The Securities and Investments Board has applied recently to have powers under the Act transferred to it. In support of the application, the board submitted its draft rules and other relevant material, and these documents are being studied to ascertain whether they satisfy the requirements of the Act. My hon. Friend will be aware that the Act lays down a twofold test for the designated agency's rules. They must provide an adequate level of investor protection, but any significant anti-competitive effects must be limited to those that are necessary in the interests of investors.

If the rules satisfy the requirements of the Act, the next stage will be to lay an order before both Houses transferring powers to the board. I hope that that will be possible in the spring, and it will of course be debated then. Once powers have been transferred, it will be possible for the board to start recognising self-regulating organisations and authorising those applicants who prefer direct authorisation by the board.

All this is bound to take a little time, especially as the Act will extend the regulatory system to a number of new areas, and practitioners in those areas will need time to apply for and obtain authorisation. Nevertheless, it should be possible to bring into force the central provisions of the Act, including those which will make it an offence to carry on investment business without authorisation, by the end of the year.

As my hon. Friend has said, one of the most important features of the new regulatory system will be the provision that is made for compensating investors who lose money as a result of the misconduct of investment businesses. A regrettably large number of cases in recent months have highlighted the importance of such a scheme. Like my hon. Friend and many other hon. Members, I, too, have constituents who have suffered at the hands of some of those against whom regulators have taken action. Even though most investment businesses are perfectly reputable, I am sure that everyone would agree that the consequences of this kind of episode are such that there should be proper arrangements for compensation, funded by the industry as a whole.

That is why section 54 of the Financial Services Act 1986 allows the designated agency to establish a scheme for compensating investors who have a claim against an investment business which, perhaps because of insolvency, that business cannot meet. The board has published its proposals for such a scheme, which I am considering along with all the other material submitted. The proposed scheme is wide-ranging and will cover all kinds of investment businesses. The proposed limits on compensation are considerably higher than those applying to depositors with a bank or building society, and should ensure that full or at least adequate recompense is made in the most distressing cases involving relatively small investors.

Of course, I appreciate that the news of a better deal to come will be cold comfort to some of those who have suffered in some recent cases. My hon. Friend has asked whether the new compensation arrangements could be used to compensate these losses as well as any arising in the future. I much regret that the answer must be no. The Act does not make provision for compensation to be payable retrospectively, and there is a natural presumption against retrospective provision of that kind. Moreover, it is difficult to see how a scheme for retrospective compensation could be established on an equitable basis. It would, I suggest, be extremely unfair to penalise those prepared to submit to the new system of regulation by requiring them to pay for compensation for failures which occurred before the system came into force.

Similarly, I have to say to my hon. Friend that it will not be possible to accelerate the introduction of the compensation scheme independently of the implementation of the rest of the Act. The scheme relies on other provisions of the Act, especially those relating to authorisation, and cannot come into force in advance of them. But once the main provisions come into force there is no reason why the compensation scheme should be long delayed. The Act does not require a fund to be built up before compensation can be paid. Indeed, both the Act and the SIB's proposed rules envisage that a call on the scheme in its early years could be met by borrowing, to be repaid out of a subsequent levy on investment businesses. I think, therefore, that my hon. Friend's fears about the length of time before compensation becomes available may be misplaced.

My hon. Friend has also suggested that FIMBRA might introduce its own compensation scheme to cover the period between now and the coming into force of the Financial Services Act. There is no requirement under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 for FIMBRA to have a compensation scheme, but equally there is no bar to it, and indeed the stock exchange has a compensation scheme. FIMBRA already requires its members to take out professional indemnity insurance but this, of course, provides no solution in cases where the principals of the business concerned act dishonestly.

If FIMBRA wanted to supplement this requirement with a compensation scheme, that would be a matter for it to decide. My hon. Friend also asked whether such a scheme could be financed by a long-term Government loan, and here I fear that I must again disappoint him. The compensation scheme to be established under the Financial Services Act will be financed by the industry itself and not the taxpayer, and I can see no grounds for departing from this principle for any extra-statutory scheme introduced as an interim measure. It is also noteworthy that the stock exchange scheme is not financed by Government.

In addition to the points that he raised about compensation, my hon. Friend made a number of interesting points about the powers of intervention available to regulators under the present scheme. In particular, he was concerned that existing investors may suffer when a regulator moves to restrict the business of or close down a business which has broken the rules. I fully accept this, and it is always a consideration which ranks high in the minds of regulators when deciding whether to take action. Nobody whose function it is to protect investors is liable to take lightly a step which is likely to damage severely the interests of a particular group of investors. But in this as in other areas the regulator will have to strike a balance. It may well be damaging to existing investors to move against a business, but the damage that could be done if he were allowed to continue trading could be much greater. The damage caused to existing investors in such a case is regrettable, but it can be justified in the interests of the investing community as a whole.

None the less, we recognise that investors gain little comfort from the knowledge that their suffering is necessary to protect others from a similar fate. Under the system to be introduced under the Financial Services Act, existing investors will be in a much better position when a regulator takes action. There will be a much wider range of powers of intervention available to the regulator. Those powers are set out in chapter VI of part I of the Act. They include powers to restrict the investment business that a person may carry on, to prohibit a person from disposing of or dealing with specified assets to vest in a trustee assets of the business and assets belonging to investors, and to maintain assets of a specified value in the United Kingdom.

Such powers may be used in a variety of circumstances, and in particular in any case in which their exercise is desirable for the protection of investors. The effect will allow regulators to protect the interests of existing investors at the same time as taking action to protect potential investors.

Another protection that the Act will give to existing investors will be the requirement to segregate clients' money into a separate account. Taken with the rules that the Securities and Investments Board proposes to make about safeguarding of other assets, this should ensure that the assets of a business are distinguishable from those of investors.

I cannot pretend that the provisions will on their own be effective in every case in protecting investors. The clients' money rules, for instance, will protect investors only if they are kept, and the powers to vest assets in a trustee will be effective only if there are assets available to be seized. There is no guarantee in this world that can eliminate once and for all the danger of fraud that can redound to the disadvantage of investors, but standing behind the rules will be the compensation scheme, which will be a considerable protection for any investor who suffers as a result of a regulator's necessary action.

I conclude by again thanking my hon. Friend for raising these important matters tonight. I share his concern at the tribulations of those who have lost money dealing with unscrupulous investment businesses.

[Mr. Michael Howard]

I regret that it is not possible, under existing legislation, to do more to help people in their unfortunate position. However, I hope that I have made it clear that the Financial Services Act will greatly improve the protection available to investors in similar circumstances in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Museums (Allocations)

1. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce the allocations for Northern Ireland museums for 1987-88.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): I refer my hon. Friend to the announcement that I made on 5 March 1987. The total museums' recurrent grant for 1987-88 has increased by over 8 per cent. to £4·3 million and both purchase grants and capital works allocations have been substantially increased. Further details are available in the Library.

Mr. Atkins: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of us will welcome this increased funding and particularly his announcement about the business sponsorship scheme? Will money from the scheme be available to help museums?

Dr. Mawhinney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words and welcome. I believe that the £100,000 which I was able to announce for the scheme has been welcomed by those in the arts world and those in the museums world. I can confirm that the money will be available to the museums.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Does the Minister intend to establish a maritime museum at Harland and Wolff? If he does not, will he explain what this year's £64 million of subvention to Harland and Wolff is for?

Dr. Mawhinney: So far as I am aware, I do not have any direct responsibility for establishing museums.

Community Relations

2. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what role the churches play with the Government in seeking to promote good community relations in the Province.

Dr. Mawhinney: The churches are involved in various education and community work programmes for which they receive Government funding.

Mr. Favell: Will my hon. Friend ask the churches how we can unite the communities in Northern Ireland so long as the schoolchildren are segregated?

Dr. Mawhinney: The tradition of church schools is well established. It commands a degree of appreciation by people who live in Northern Ireland. The Government seek to run an education service which is, as far as possible, responsive to parents' wishes, subject, of course, to acceptable academic standards.

Mr. Stokes: Is my hon. Friend aware that the role of the churches in Northern Ireland, and, one would hope, of churches elsewhere in the United Kingdom and throughout the world, is far wider than merely to promote good community relations? Surely their job is to preach the gospel, administer the sacraments and to do all the things to make Christian communities.

Dr. Mawhinney: As a fellow member of the Synod, my hon. Friend will know that I entirely agree with him and share his views on that. Nevertheless, the churches also have a responsibility to contribute to good community relations. I hope that we can advance along that line, at least in terms of community work. The churches should be able to work together without any theological compromise.

Ms. Clare Short: Does the Minister agree that it confuses the debate to think that the problems of Northern Ireland arise from a difference about religion? Does he agree that it arises from a difference about who controls that statelet, the domination that they have over others and the widespread discrimination? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it confuses the whole debate for people to suggest that all the trouble in Northern Ireland is because of different religious views?

Dr. Mawhinney: I know that the hon. Lady will understand when I say that I do not accept the designation of an integral part of the United Kingdom as a "statelet". I recognise, as does the hon. Lady, that a variety of pressures contribute to the difficulties in the Province. It would be hard to argue against the point that religion has had and continues to have a role to play as one of the factors. The Government have to bear that in mind in terms of seeking not only to endorse the principle of good community relations, but in seeking to advance that with, as far as possible, the co-operation of the people and organisations in the Province.

Mr. Leigh: Following the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell), will my hon. Friend confirm that it is the inalienable right of everybody in this country of all faiths, or no faith, to educate his children in a denominational school of his choice?

Dr. Mawhinney: I think that I have essentially answered that question in the affirmative in the first reply that I gave.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

3. Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Ireland concerning the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I met the last Foreign Minister of the Republic of Ireland on many occasions, most recently at a meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference on 8 December. I look forward to meeting his successor.

Mr. Archer: I thank the Secretary of State for that unsurprising answer, but may I ask him whether, when he meets Mr. Lenihan, he will extend good wishes from all parts of the House to him on his difficult but challenging task? Will the Secretary of State also send affectionate valedictions to the retiring Taoiseach? If Mr. Lenihan should inquire of the Secretary of State how the Intergovernmental Conference can best help in improving daily life, in reconciling people and in finding areas of agreement, will he be ready with a list of topics, and what will be in that list?

Mr. King: On the right hon. and learned Gentleman's last point, I refer him to the communiqués which show a continuing programme of work and, obviously, we look forward to continuing it. I certainly join him in the courteous welcome that he gave on behalf of hon. Members to the new Foreign Minister, Mr. Lenihan. We look forward to confirmation about whether he will be the co-chairman of the Anglo-Irish conference. I have already sent valedictory messages of goodwill to the former Taoiseach and to the former Foreign Minister.

Mr. Benyon: Will my right hon. Friend draw the attention of the Foreign Minister to the large number of unemployed families coming to this country from the Republic? This is causing considerable strain on our services. Will my right hon. Friend point out that this shows the mutual interest that both countries have in achieving prosperity in the south of Ireland?

Mr. King: It would not be interference in the affairs of a foreign country to say that we were all aware of the great concern during the election campaign over the issues of unemployment and emigration. Quite clearly, that is an illustration of aspects in which we have a clear interest, because a number of people who have emigrated from the Republic of Ireland are in this country.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: What odds on the implementation of the European convention against terrorism by the Irish Republic is the Secretary of State now prepared to offer?

Mr. King: I do not think that betting is permitted in this Chamber. I note that the measures to enable the convention to be ratified have passed through both Houses in the Republic of Ireland and will come into effect on 1 December.

Mr. Latham: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Anglo-Irish Agreement was negotiated between two sovereign states, and that any question of changing the agreement would also involve the British Government? Certainly, it cannot unilaterally be done by an incoming Irish Government.

Mr. King: The point at issue is that if either party wishes to raise matters in connection with the agreement that is provided for in the agreement in relation to the operation of the conference. I note that Mr. Haughey was reported in an interview published in The Irish Times on 7 March as saying that he accepted that the Anglo-Irish Agreement was an accord that had been entered into by an Irish Government and therefore had to be accepted as binding.

Mr. Skinner: In his discussions did the Secretary of State mention that a recent poll in the Daily Express said that more than 60 per cent. of the British people want to see the troops out of Northern Ireland? Although not many hon. Members voted against the Anglo-Irish Agreement when it went through the House, if the Secretary of State has kept his eyes and ears open he will have noticed that a growing number of hon. Members are against that agreement because, like all its predecessors, it is bound to fail.

Mr. King: I had not appreciated before how strongly the hon. Gentleman is against the agreement. There must be more to it than I realised, and that gives me some real comfort. In the poll in the Daily Express, the question was "over a period", and a considerable number of people would hope to see an improvement in security that would enable the withdrawal of significant numbers of the British Army over a period.

Taoiseach (Talks)

5. Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to meet the new Taoiseach to discuss the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

6. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to meet the new Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland to discuss Anglo-Irish relations.

Mr. Tom King: I know that the House will join me in congratulating Mr. Haughey on his election as Taoiseach. Although I have no plans at present to meet Mr. Haughey, I look forward to doing so before long.

Mr. Silvester: If Her Majesty's Government are to sustain their policy on the Anglo-Irish Agreement, is it not of great importance that we have urgent talks with the Taoiseach to see whether the continuity of the Republic's policy is sustained?

Mr. King: I accept that. The reality which is reflected in the Anglo-Irish Agreement is still valid. All the evidence of the damage that is being done by terrorism in Northern Ireland, in terms of physical outrage and terror and in terms of economic damage to the Republic, make it clearly of mutual interest to both our countries that there is the most vigorous possible attack against terrorism.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not right that when Mr. Haughey was leader of the Opposition in the Republic he had grave reservations about the Anglo-Irish Agreement and made them obvious in the Dail? Does the Secretary of State remember that in particular he had reservations about what is called the veto of the majority of Northern Ireland? When he sees Mr. Haughey, will he explore this issue?

Mr. King: No. I make it clear that I note the comments that Mr. Haughey made to the political editor of The Irish Times, in which he accepted that the Anglo-Irish Agreement was an accord, and therefore had to be accepted as binding because it had been entered into by an Irish Government. I also note that he said:

"We will endeavour to contribute to the restoration of peace and stability in Northern Ireland in any way which may appear possible and feasible."

If that is correctly reported, I welcome that statement. and I hope that we can have an encouraging and productive working relationship.

Viscount Cranborne: How many items typically did the last Irish premier put on the agenda of the conference? Does my right hon. Friend intend to raise this question with the new Prime Minister and does he expect that number to increase?

Mr. King: I do not know whether I fully grasp the point of my hon. Friend's question. The items that we have discussed are in the communiqués and I expect that programme of work to continue.

Mr. Alton: Is it not the case that the one thing that unites extreme opinion on both sides of the Irish sea is opposition to the Anglo-Irish Agreement, and that anything that is done to dilute the commitment of the House or the Dail to the agreement would be playing into the hands of extremist opinion? Is not one of the best things that could happen for progress to be made on the creation of an Anglo-Irish parliamentary tier, which was envisaged in the signing of the original Hillsborough report?

Mr. King: The hon. Member knows that that matter is more for hon. Members and the House than for me. I see the merits in it. There is no question but that the most violent opposition of all to the Anglo-Irish Agreement comes from the IRA.

Mr. Gow: When it becomes clear to my right hon. Friend that the Anglo-Irish Agreement cannot achieve its declared purpose of peace, stability and reconciliation, will my right hon. Friend propose to the Irish Government a renegotiation of that agreement?

Mr. King: I hope that I have made clear to the House my commitment to the agreement and my belief that it offers the best prospect for a way forward in the difficult problems of Northern Ireland. I do not seek a renegotiation of it.

Community Relations Policy

8. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when his Department last reviewed its community relations policy; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: I am currently reviewing the community policy for which my Department has a statutory responsibility.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend accept that many hon. Members on both sides of the House will welcome this review, and will urge him to continue to take a lead on the matter?

Dr. Mawhinney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his encouragement. The Government recognise that it is important to do all that lies within their power to promote good community relations. That is the end that I should like to see achieved as a consequence of the review.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister realise that one of the matters that is disturbing community relations in Northern Ireland concerns the extremely serious allegations being made by the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Northern Ireland, myself and other persons, against RUC officers, civilian employees of the RUC and solicitors, who are alleged to be involved in an immigration racket? Why has the RUC detective at the centre of these allegations not been suspended while inquiries are made? When will Mr. Chan Hok-Chun, a victim of this immigration racket, be allowed to return to London and rejoin his wife? He is now in detention in Belfast. When will the Minister bust this immigration racket, about which I told him in January and February this year?

Dr. Mawhinney: I am not at all clear what that question has to do with my responsibilities for community relations. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that he has written to me in that capacity, I shall have to ask my Department what has happened to his letter. If, on the other hand, he has not written to me in my community relations role, which is what I understood him to say, then no doubt, if he feels so strongly, he will write to me.

Ulster Defence Regiment (Coleraine Headquarters)

9. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has completed his investigation into the raid on the local Ulster Defence Regiment headquarters in Coleraine, Co. Derry on 22 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: RUC investigations into the raid are continuing. Four men have been charged with serious offences; two are part-time members of the Ulster Defence Regiment. I understand that the Ministry of Defence has convened its own internal board of inquiry, which has reported its findings and those are now being studied. A review of security at all UDR bases and establishments is being carried out. In the meantime, the Ministry of Defence has put into effect a number of measures to improve security at the Coleraine UDR base.

Mr. Duffy: Does the Secretary of State recall the concern that has repeatedly been expressed in the House about the role and integrity of the UDR? What reassurance does he envisage offering to hon. Members when a Loyalist gang can still get into UDR barracks, round up the entire arsenal, load it into a UDR vehicle, and get away, but for the RUC?

Mr. King: The answer to that is on the basis of information that was provided by a UDR member. As the House may know, I take an extremely serious view of this incident, which could have had the gravest consequences. I pay tribute to the action of the RUC, which so quickly repossessed a substantial number of weapons and an amount of ammunition. Obviously, this is a matter of great concern. I do not wish to anticipate the outcome of the inquiry, but that is a matter which the UDR takes very seriously.

ACE Project

10. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what conditions are imposed by the European Community on the use of community funds for ACE projects.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The European Community does not impose any specific conditions on ACE projects in Northern Ireland. The entire Northern Ireland ACE programme qualifies for support from the European social fund on the basis that it meets the eligibility criteria laid down in the social fund guidelines.

Ms. Clare Short: It seems from that answer that the six ACE workers at St. Mathew's, who were so wrongly threatened with dismissal on unspecified security grounds —which led to the closure of the only Irish language nursery in Northern Ireland—have no hope of justice from the EEC. Has the Minister, since the issue was last raised, looked into the threatened closure of that project and can he give us any more welcome news today?

Mr. Scott: The decision was made in compliance with the terms of the answer, with which the hon. Lady will be familiar, by my right hon.Friend the Home Secretary when he was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. On at least one occasion where a grant had been denied on the basis of that parliamentary answer, it was possible for the organisation concerned so to reorganise its affairs that ultimately it became eligible for grant.

Mr. Archer: Does the Minister of State appreciate that the withdrawal of funding, without assigning any reason which can be challenged or argued, can have a devastating effect on the community and on the employees, and that it can operate unjustly. Does he realise that there is a genuine problem which should be discussed?

Mr. Scott: Certainly, as has been shown in the past, we are willing to discuss these matters, but the terms of my right hon. Friend's parliamentary answer, that it is important that where public funds are concerned there should be minimal risk of those funds ending up in the hands of paramilitary organisations, is a principle with which the House will agree.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

11. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions have taken place with the newly elected Government of the Irish Republic regarding the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Tom King: There have not yet been any discussions with the new Irish Government, but we look forward to full co-operation with them in operating the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Winnick: The Anglo-Irish Agreement was not apparently an issue in the recent Irish elections, but would it not be true to say from surveys and various opinion polls that that agreement has as much broadly based support in the Irish Republic as it certainly has in the United Kingdom? Bearing in mind that the Provisional Sinn Fein received less than 2 per cent. of the vote in the Irish election, where is its mandate, can I ask, as I asked the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) and his colleagues in Northern Ireland directly in 1983, for the continuing campaign of killings and terrorism by the Provisional IRA? How can that organisation say that it is acting in the traditions of 1798 and 1916 with a mandate from the Irish people?

Mr. King: I rarely agree with what the hon. Gentleman says in the House, but I entirely endorse and applaud what he has just said. Whatever views and judgments one draws from the outcome of the election in the Republic, the one absolutely clear conclusion to be drawn from the humiliating derisory vote for Sinn Fein is that it represents nobody in what it claims to be its attempt to represent some great Irish aspiration. That development was most encouraging and it completely removes any conceivable justification, were there ever to be one, for its intolerable campaign of violence in the north.

Mr. Stanbrook: What specific benefits does my right hon. Friend claim have accrued to Northern Ireland since the conclusion of the Anglo-Irish Agreement?

Mr. King: There certainly have been benefits, as was shown in the by-elections, for a start. Part of the concern of the Anglo-Irish Agreement is not merely that the majority, but the minority, should feel that their traditions and aspirations are respected. Anybody, above all Unionists, who cares about Northern Ireland must be concerned about the attitude of the minority, not just that of the majority. The most significant single factor was, perhaps, in the early stage, the significant switch of voting from Sinn Fein to the constitutional democratic parties.

Mr. Mason: Further to the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), I hope that the Secretary of State will discuss with the Taoiseach the fact that people in the north have now become wise to the Provisional Sinn Fein's bomb and bullet campaign? Will he also note that the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) is scurrying around Britain trying to rally support for his party? The Provisional Sinn Fein got a black eye in the southern Republican elections and I hope that the Secretary of State and the Taoiseach will now raise their profile politically and defeat the Provisional Sinn Fein still further.

Mr. King: I certainly would like to see that happen and I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his support. It is undoubtedly true that, as I said earlier, while the IRA may conduct its violence in the north, the violent damage that it does to the economy of the south is all too clear, and it is the godfather of the appalling unemployment level through the island of Ireland.

Mr. Cormack: Before, quite properly, seeking to establish relations with the new Government, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to thank Dr. FitzGerald for what he did during his period of leadership of his party and his country?

Mr. King: I think that the whole House will have noted the universal tributes that have been paid throughout the British press following the announcement, by Dr. FitzGerald, of his retirement from the leadership of Fine Gael. I would certainly like to put on record the admiration and respect of myself, my colleagues serving in the Northern Ireland Office, and indeed, the House for someone who has been an outstanding representative of this country.

Mr. Bell: In relation to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall North, (Mr. Winnick), the response given by the Secretary of State, and given the rather peculiar attitude and outburst of some members of the Government Back Benches, can it be made clear that, at all times in the past and at all times in the future, a Labour Administration and a Labour Opposition condemn, totally and outrightly, the use of the ballot paper in the one hand and the Armalite in the other? This House associates itself absolutely and categorically with the total condemnation of Provisional Sinn Fein and states that the only route for those in Northern Ireland in the majority and minority communities is that of constitutional nationalism. That must be in the interests of all the people of the island of Ireland.

Mr. King: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the way he has spoken with the authority of the Front Bench on behalf of his right hon. and hon. Friends. I believe that the firmness of the House in the rejection of violence and terrorism are reinforced by events, especially the derisory vote for Sinn Fein. That shows that we are absolutely right in our determination to stand against it.

13. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the working of the Anglo-Irish Agreement with specific reference to cross-border co-operation on security.

Mr. Scott: Progress has been made since the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement in developing further cross-border security co-operation. There has been increased contact at all levels between the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Garda Siochana. The programme of work agreed by the two police forces is now being implemented.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: With regard to security matters and assessing the Anglo-Irish Agreement will not the Parliament of the United Kingdom greatly miss the counsel and border experience of the late Lord Brookeborough? Do we not salute and grieve with the family of the right hon. and noble Viscount?

Mr. Scott: I certainly echo those sentiments and pay tribute to the contribution that Lord Brookeborough made on behalf of his community in Northern Ireland, on behalf of Northern Ireland as a whole, and to the way that he enabled the voice of his beliefs to be heard in this Parliament.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not the Anglo-Irish Agreement gravely jeopardised by the unanswered allegations of Wallace and Holroyd? Now that the Taoiseach, Mr. Haughey, has said that he intends to carry out an inquiry into the allegations and, in particular, the alleged attempt to destabilise the Government of the Republic in the 1970s, surely the British Government should respond likewise. Surely Parliament is entitled to know whether Mr. Wallace and Mr. Holroyd are lying or whether they are telling the truth?

Mr. Scott: As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces said in a parliamentary answer the other day, there has been no evidence whatsoever advanced in support of the allegations made by Messrs. Holroyd and Wallace.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Before my hon. Friend leaves the subject of the expression of appreciation to the outgoing Prime Minister, does he not agree with me that that man has stood out among his contemporary rivals as the only real statesman among them?

Mr. Scott: I will not get into that territory, but I certainly echo the compliments that my right hon. Friend paid to Dr. FitzGerald for the role that he has played in Ireland and in the European Community during his time as Taoiseach. Obviously, we look forward to working with whoever is Head of Government in the Irish Republic.

Intergovernmental Conference

14. Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what recent talks he has had with representatives of the Government of the Republic of Ireland through the Intergovernmental Conference.

Mr. Scott: Our most recent discussions with Irish Government representatives took place at the meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference on 8 December. The statement issued after the meeting sets out the subjects discussed. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Bell: Now that the new Government are in place in the Republic can we see to it that an early meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference is convened? Can we also see more economic progress and more economic items on the agenda so that the people of Northern Ireland and the people in the island of Ireland as a whole can see some benefit from the economy improving as a result of the Anglo-Irish Agreement?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman knows that we never announce the dates of meetings of the Intergovernmental Conference in advance. It is too early to say when one might be likely to take place. We want the work of the conference to be sustained. We have had some discussions on economic matters already, and I am sure that we shall continue to do so.

Mr. Wilkinson: In any talks that the Government may have with the new Government of the Republic, will Ministers make it clear that the co-operation of the Republic will be judged by the amount of assistance that is given directly to security forces of Her Majesty's Government in pursuing terrorists, and that we would expect the south to desist from arresting British soldiers who inadvertently stray over the border in the course of their dangerous duties?

Mr. Scott: I am sure that we shall look forward to cross-border co-operation with the new Administration in Dublin. Any Irish Government must understand that the activities of terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland present a threat to democracy throughout the island of Ireland, and they will be as concerned as we are to further develop cross-border co-operation.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

15. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to promote the Anglo-Irish Agreement in the Province.

Mr. Tom King: Ministers take every opportunity to explain why the agreement is of benefit to everyone in Northern Ireland, and to remove misapprehensions about it.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his answer, but he may be aware that there is an impression that since the Anglo-Irish Agreement was passed by the House and by another place with overwhelming majorities, the Government have been inclined to sit on their hands and not go out to the people of Northern Ireland to explain the benefits of the agreement. How many public meetings have he and his Ministers addressed in the Province? What sort of advertising campaign has been carried out? Has an attempt been made to send a leaflet to every household in the north explaining the benefits of the agreement?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his suggestions. We do not believe that a massive advertising campaign would be helpful, although we have placed certain advertisements to deal with clear misapprehensions. We have sought to discuss the concerns of political leaders and unfortunately, as my hon. Friend will know, they have felt unwilling to discuss them with us.

Mr. Porter: Does my right hon. Friend accept that advertisements must be based on fact, that it is a fact that over the months since the introduction of the agreement the majority of the population of Northern Ireland has seen little in it, and that, therefore, advertising would do little to promote it?

Mr. King: The agreement will not produce benefits that will lead to instant improvement. We are tackling difficulties and problems that have lasted over decades. I am certain that the population of Northern Ireland, especially the majority community, will regard a real improvement in security as a benefit stemming from the agreement, but my hon. Friend knows well that that is not something that we shall achieve overnight.

Mr. Mason: Is it not true that if the Secretary of State wishes successfully to promote the agreement in the Province, it must be understood that the most crucial aspect of it concerns security, including security for the Province as a whole and border security? What examples can the right hon. Gentleman give to the House or the Taoiseach, when he next meets him, that the agreement has worked in that regard? Can he prove to us that cross-border security has been improved?

Mr. King: Foundations have been laid, undoubtedly, for much closer co-operation. I think that the right hon. Gentleman will be aware of the joint threat assessment, for the first time ever, agreed between the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Garda Siochana, the agreement on the need for close co-operation and the meetings that are taking place between senior police officers and police officers at all levels. There have been a number of individual successes. I accept entirely, however, that there have been outrages committed across the border, and it is our continuing ambition to improve our record in that respect.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there has been an increase in the campaign of terror, especially by the IRA, and that in 1986, 61 people lost their lives and 1,450 were injured, including 622 policemen? Does he agree that it is most important to bring in more regular border patrols? If there is to be any cross-border incursions, does he agree that there should be give and take on both sides.

Mr. King: I certainly agree with the last point that my hon. Friend raised. On the matter of violence, it is not all IRA violence to which he referred.

Local Councils (Boycott)

16. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current situation regarding the boycott of local councils by certain members.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): I deprecate the actions of some district councillors in Northern Ireland who have failed to discharge their responsibilities to their ratepayers. I very much hope that they will return to the council chamber to represent their constituents. In the meantime, the Government will continue to take such action as is necessary to ensure that essential services and jobs are not put at risk.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I accept and sympathise with the genuine dilemma faced by many Unionist councillors as between their deep loyalty to local government and their commitment to their party. I note that some of them have returned to their duties. Does the Secretary of State accept that it is an interesting point that the apparent solidarity of Unionist representation here does not reflect the differences between different parts of the Unionist cause in the north of Ireland?

Mr. Needham: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that, whatever the depth of feeling that Unionist councillors may have, there is no excuse for not looking after their constituents, not attending councils and not abiding by the law of the land.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that if Unionists are as divided as they clearly are in the Province of Northern Ireland, it does not help those of us who would like to see some degree of devolution in local government as well as in the more general political sense in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Needham: I agree with my hon. Friend. The sooner that Unionist councillors go back to their councils—many of them have done so—the better it will be for everybody.

Foreign Minister of the Republic

18. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that my right hon. Friend gave to a question by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) earlier today.

Mr. Dubs: In discussions with the Irish Government about the Anglo-Irish Agreement, will the Minister make it clear that, although improved security must be an important objective, the nationalist population of the six counties would be let down badly if it were to be seen by them as the only objective? Is he aware that they will quite rightly wish to see further progress in other areas?

Mr. Scott: I agree with the point made by the hon. Gentleman. Indeed, reassurance of the nationalist community can be a help to the activities of the security forces in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Holt: As part of the Anglo-Irish Agreement includes a £50 million donation to this country from America, will my hon. Friend say whether we have yet received the £50 million, and, if so, how has it been spent?

Mr. Scott: Legislation has been passed to establish the international fund for Ireland, representing both parts of Ireland. The board has already had a number of meetings to consider how the money might most sensibly be disbursed.

Ms. Clare Short: When the Minister meets the Foreign Secretary, might it help to persuade him that the Anglo-Irish Agreement has been of some value if he points out that what it has really achieved is to expose the people of Britain to the unreasonableness and intransigence of unionism in Northern Ireland? Will he also point out that, according to the Daily Express poll, a majority of people in Britain want to withdraw from Northern Ireland and that more people in Britain think that the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) is an evil presence than there are people who think that the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) is an evil presence?

Mr. Scott: We so operate the Anglo-Irish Agreement with the Administration in Dublin that the benefits become manifest to all the people in Northern Ireland.

Security

19. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest security position in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tom King: Since I last reported to the House on 15 January, six people—a major in the Ulster Defence Regiment, a Royal Ulster Constabulary reserve constable and four civilians—have died as a result of the security situation. Three of the civilian deaths are believed to have been as a result of the Irish National Liberation Army feud. The efforts of the security forces are continuing to yield results. Since the beginning of the year, a total of 72 people have beeen charged with serious offences, 47 weapons, 810 rounds of ammunition and 1,617lbs of explosives have been recovered in Northern Ireland. In addition to those finds in Northern Ireland, there was a significant find of arms, ammunition and explosives by the Garda Siochana in the border region on 27 January.

Mr. Spencer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that even minor acts of violence by prominent elected figures undermine the position of the security forces and needlessly make their task more difficult?

Mr. King: Certainly I deplore any public protest activities that distract the security forces from their overwhelming and clear responsibility, for which they should have the support of the whole population, and that is the fight against terrorism.

20. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tom King: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I have just given to a question by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer).

Sir John Farr: What evidence does my hon. Friend have of any new sources of supply of terrorist arms from overseas to Northern Ireland, and in particular what importance does he attach to the threat by colonel Gaddafi to supply the IRA?

Mr. King: The House will be aware of earlier attempts some years ago to obtain arms from Libya. We are under no illusions about terrorist attempts to secure arms from a number of sources. We are grateful that the assistance of the intelligence and security services of a number of other countries has successfully prevented the supply of such weapons.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the Prime Minister of Thailand.

Mr. McLoughlin: During her busy day will my right hon. Friend find time to consider the action that is being taken by some teaching unions? Does she not find it strange that they took action to get a pay rise, that they have now been awarded a pay rise, and that they are taking action again? Is it not true that the only people who will suffer as a result are the teaching professions and those in state education?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his own point very effectively. The disruption in our schools is now totally unjustified, and I think it is absolutely appalling that some teachers pursue their own interests by damaging the education of the children in their care.

Mr. Kinnock: As information about an illegal concert party operating in the shares of Westland plc has been available to the Government for some months, what action have the Government taken to establish who precisely was involved with the nominee companies and what measures can be taken against such persons?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made it quite clear some time ago that he was not taking any further action on this matter. I believe that that was announced some time in August.

Mr. Kinnock: Does that answer come from the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister because they are certain that no one who is involved in this operation falls within United Kingdom jurisdiction? If they are certain, can they tell us how they know that?

The Prime Minister: I am not quite certain whether the right hon. Gentleman is referring to something that has come to light in recent times. That, of course, will be considered in the appropriate way.

Mr. Kinnock: I was trying to clarify the basis upon which the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and now the Prime Minister have taken their view. That is especially necessary, is it not, because 12 months ago the Prime Minister said that decisions about Westland plc should be in the hands of the shareholders. When, so obviously, a concert party was operating that had a major effect on the outcome, does the Prime Minister not think that she ought to pursue the matter further?

The Prime Minister: I understand that on 28 August 1986, following receipt of advice from the Attorney-General, the Secretary of State decided, finally, not to appoint inspectors. Westland, the solicitors of Societe Nationale Industrielle Aerospatiale, the Takeover Panel and the Stock Exchange were all informed on 10 September. There has been no reaction from any of these parties.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my right hon. Friend, during the day, give instructions to those who may be accompanying her to Moscow to the effect that, for the defence of Europe, it is imperative that any agreement on disarmament should cover not only intermediate-range nuclear weapons but the shorter-range weapons, which may be no danger to the United States but are a major danger to European defence?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. This is a highly complicated matter, as he knows. As I have made clear in the House on several occasions, we cannot look at any single aspect of arms control in isolation. An INF agreement must provide for restraints on those shorter-range systems which could be used to circumvent an INF agreement. These are the longer-range SRINF; in practice it means the Soviet SS12, SS22 and SS23. I believe that the draft treaty tabled by the United States will do that effectively. At the same time, there must be provision for follow-on negotiations to deal further with those systems and to rectify the imbalance in shorter-range systems, comprising shorter range INF and SNF with a range of less than 500 kilometres. We also need to tackle the conventional imbalance: as nuclear weapons are reduced, measures to deal with disparities in conventional forces become even more important. [Interruption.] Yes, it is a very important question. Because of its complexity I thought it right to get the position absolutely clear.

Mr. Steel: In view of the judgment in the House of Lords this afternoon disqualifying 47 councillors in Liverpool, will the Prime Minister recognise that the financial damage that they have left behind will require united action in the city and co-operation from the Government to rectify it? Will she, therefore, agree to meet next week a broadly based deputation of the political, church and industrial leaders from the city?

The Prime Minister: No, Mr. Speaker. Liverpool council was democratically elected. The decision which has been taken today has been reached properly in accordance with the law. There will be local elections and by-elections, I expect, on 7 May, when the council will be reconstituted. Those democratically elected must learn to take responsibility for their actions.

Mr. Shersby: Will my right hon. Friend take time during her busy day to consider the very serious concern expressed by many sections of the community about the possession of chemical weapons by the Soviet Union? Will she discuss the matter with Mr. Gorbachev during her forthcoming visit?

The Prime Minister: We have been gravely concerned about chemical weapons and we have been active in trying to secure disarmament in these weapons, as we gave them up a considerable time ago. I expect that that matter will come up during the deliberations.

Q2. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Prime Minister aware of the outrage felt throughout the northern region over the switch by the BBC of the transmission of programmes for Cumbria from Newcastle to Manchester? Is the Prime Minister aware—[Interruption.] Is is a very important distinction. Is the Prime Minister aware that despite a poll of 6,042 people carried out by Cumbrian Newspapers in which 96·8 per cent. of the respondents opposed the switch, and a poll that I carried out in the Grasslot miners' welfare in Maryport, where only two of 260 people I consulted agreed with the switch——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This does not relate to the Prime Minister's responsibility.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The BBC insists——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Come to the question. Opinion polls are not a matter for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The BBC insists on this decision—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his question to the Prime Minister's responsibility. I think the hon. Gentleman has asked his question. Opinion polls are not a matter for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Prime Minister believe that the BBC should respond to what the people want and not take arbitrary decisions on its own behalf, without consulting the people?

The Prime Minister: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's concern because he has written to me extensively about this matter. I believe my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has explained to him that the reorganisation of television services by the BBC is wholly a matter for the BBC and the Government have no power to intervene in the regional organisation of BBC services. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will have put his own protests through to the relevant Committee, but by drawing attention to this matter in the House he has demonstrated his concern to the BBC.

Q3. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Bottomley: Will the Prime Minister urgently send President Reagan a copy of Monday's Hansard to remind him, prior to his meeting with the Leader of the Opposition, that successive Governments of all parties, and all sensible people, support effective defence policies?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the defence policies of the Opposition would gravely endanger, the NATO Alliance, which is the cornerstone of our security. We cannot claim to be a loyal member of that Alliance while disassociating ourselves from its strategy, based on nuclear deterrence. My hon. Friend is quite correct.

Mr. Heffer: Is the right hon. Lady aware that the so-called irresponsible council of Liverpool in the last three years has built 4,600 houses, put 11,600 people into work in the construction industry, built sports centres and nursing schools, kept down the rents of people living in council houses, and at the same time has kept down rates to 5 per cent.? If that is irresponsible, what about the actions of the Secretary of State for the Environment, who has broken the law five times and has had to come to this House in order to get legislation to put it right? It is a scandal.

The Prime Minister: Liverpool city council is responsible for running its financial affairs prudently. Three separate courts—the High Court, the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords—have now confirmed the district auditors' view that Liverpool councillors incurred losses for the city council by deliberately delaying the setting of a rate for 1985-86. The courts found that they acted wilfully or at best with disregard for the legality of their actions.

Q4. Mr. Watts asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Watts: Will my right hon. Friend find time to consider the relative merits of public expenditure and tax cuts? In doing so will she reject the advice of those, like the Leader of the Opposition, who have substantial incomes, and consider instead the needs of families on average incomes who need large tax cuts to meet excessive rate increases imposed by local authorities?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. As he knows, our aim has been, and will continue to be, to reduce the burden of income tax when it is prudent to do so, particularly to help those on modest incomes. He knows some of the examples which I have frequently used which demonstrate the point. A nurse on earnings of £155 a week pays £43 of that gross pay in income tax and national insurance contributions. A primary school teacher pays, out of a weekly salary of £205, some £61 in tax and national insurance contributions. Both of those figures make the case for reductions in income tax.

Mr. Dormand: In the little time left to the right hon. Lady before her defeat in the next general election, what does she intend to do to repair the damage to personal freedoms, to reverse the trend towards centralisation of power and to restore some regard for truth in public affairs?

The Prime Minister: On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I would not deny him the pleasure of whistling in the dark. On the second part, I point out the steps that the Government have taken to enlarge freedom by the number of controls that we have cut and by taking away from trade union bosses practically the government of this country as well as the power to dictate to their members.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 16 MARCH — Second Reading of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Bill.

At Ten o'clock the Question will be put on all outstanding Supplementary Estimates and Votes.

TUESDAY 17 MARCH — My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will open his Budget Statement. EC documents relevant to the Budget debate will be shown in the Official Report.

WEDNESDAY 18 MARCH AND THURSDAY 19 MARCH—Continuation of the Budget debate.

FRIDAY 20 MARCH—Private Members' motions.

MONDAY 23 MARCH—Conclusion of the debate on the Budget Statement.

Mr. Kinnock: Has the Leader of the House seen the report from the National Children's Home today entitled "Children in Danger"? In view of the obvious and serious need for help with housing, income support and improved health and welfare services for so many children in Britain, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the House should debate these matters as soon as possible, and will he undertake to make appropriate time available for such a debate?

Following the haste in pushing through the Local Government Bill, the Secretary of State for the Environment's latest folly, when will the House have the opportunity to debate the rate support grant settlement?

Will the right hon. Gentleman make time for an urgent debate on the funding of scientific research and the accelerating brain drain whereby some of our best scientists in essential areas of research are taking up careers in countries where their justifiable needs for facilities and support are properly recognised?

Finally, there is to be a statement today about Sizewell B. Does the Leader of the House recall that on 12 February he agreed that there would be a debate on the subject as soon as possible after such a statement? Will that debate take place before the Easter recess?

Mr. Biffen: On the first point, I have not seen the report "Children in Danger", but I heard a radio programme about it this morning in which it was suggested that the subject could be considered in the context of income tax levels. I shall certainly bear in mind the right hon. Gentleman's point and consider what possibilities there may be for a debate, although undoubtedly many of the suggestions will fall within the debate that will be available following the Budget.

On the matter of a debate upon the rate support grant settlement, I hope that that can take place in the fairly near future and, doubtless, it will be a matter for consultation. Perhaps we could consider through the usual channels a debate upon the funding of research, although I must concede that there is not much Government time immediately available.

I take note of what the right hon. Gentleman said about consideration of any decision on Sizewell B, and I am happy to repeat the assurance I gave earlier. Perhaps the precise timing could be a matter for discussion through the usual channels.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in Dorset there is continuing concern about over-development and some confusion about the relationship between the Government's proposed new planning circular and existing planning circulars? In view of the great public interest and concern about that, will my right hon. Friend please ensure that the House has a chance to debate the planning circular at about the time of the closing date for the receipt of applications by the Secretary of State?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of what my hon. Friend said. I have indicated to the House that I think that it would be appropriate that there should be a debate on countryside policy, and, within that broad ambit, I shall consider sympathetically my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Is the Leader of the House aware that there will be widespread consternation and dismay among the 500,000 people who live in the city of Liverpool at the Prime Minister's announcement to the House this afternoon that she is not prepared to meet a delegation of Church leaders, business men and politicians from the city to discuss the city's grave problems? Is he further aware that there is currently some £800 million of corporate debt in the city but that contracts worth over £24 million have been entered into in the past 48 hours? The city will regard the right hon. Lady's decision as leaving its citizens to stew in their juice.

Surely the Leader of the House recognises that the situation is grave and serious and that there should be a debate next week. Will he provide time for it?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is making a number of assertions that he knows perfectly well I am not prepared to take up in the context of next week's business, because it is my task to say what arrangements can or cannot be made for our immediate and future debates. However, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on having Liverpool as a topic for an Adjournment debate next Wednesday and perhaps we shall see how things go then.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Will my right hon. Friend accept that there is growing anxiety at the increasing rate of discharge from hospitals of people suffering from schizophrenia to local authorities which do not have adequate accommodation for their care? Will he accept that in Southampton that is done well and in places such as Winchester it has been planned well but that concern is at such a level that the Government should be diverting more resources to that area, particularly to the National Schizophrenia Fellowship? Will he also accept that it is a subject worthy of debate?

Mr. Biffen: I understand my hon. Friend's point, and I underline the significance of it. However, he will realise that during the coming week, when we shall have a debate upon the Budget, the whole area of public spending is available for consideration. I hope that he will have an opportunity then to raise the point that he is seeking to make briefly now.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Perhaps the Leader of the House will recall my plea last Tuesday, after the Minister's statement on the future of the artificial limb and appliance service, for a debate in Government time on that important matter at the earliest possible opportunity. Although I appreciate that the debate cannot take place next week, will the right hon. Gentleman look sympathetically at that request?

Mr. Biffen: Sympathy comes more easily from the Leader of the House than action. However, I shall look at the point that the right hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): On the matter of the answer my right hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on countryside policy, will my right hon. Friend ensure that this subject is given priority in the week after next? Is he aware that, following publication of the Government papers, it is essential that we have such a debate to discuss not only the countryside, but the role of agriculture within it?

Mr. Biffen: I totally accept my hon. Friend's point about the relationship between agriculture and a policy for the countryside. I cannot be precise about the timing of a debate, but I take note of what he has said and have sympathy with him.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): The right hon. Gentleman must bear some responsibility for the conduct of his colleagues. Can he take some action to try to prevent the honourable oicks and yobbos behind him who now chiack every leading Labour party speaker from the Front Bench? Is he not aware that that is not good enough for parliamentary conduct, and should he not remember that, if it comes to it, some of us have more powerful organs than the rest of them put together?

Mr. Biffen: Of course I take account of all of that. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that I have never set myself out to be a Stalinist in my execution of duties as Leader of the House. However, I will exhort my hon. Friends to go to the Tea Room to see whether they can pick up good manners.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): My right hon. Friend will be aware that there has recently been much talk of self-discipline and self-restraint. Will he consider having a day's debate next week on self-discipline and self-restraint? Will he suggest that the debate might be led off by the "Tandoori Tiger", the Leader of the Opposition, and might well be summed up by the "Tea Room Teaser", the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), so that Conservative Members may learn the secrets of self-discipline and self-restraint so admirably shown by Opposition Members?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that self-discipline is helpful to us all and necessary for a modest hon. Member. I also believe that the history of Parliament is one of controlled incontinence.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is it the Government's intention to avoid holding the debate that is normally held on the proposals by the European Commission with regard to agricultural price fixing prior to the important meetings in which the Minister is engaged?

Mr. Biffen: Those are very important subjects, and I will certainly bear the hon. Gentleman's point in mind.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is considerable concern about the working of the legal aid scheme, which is supposed to help very poor people——

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): And lawyers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have often reflected that we need different microphones in the Chamber.

Mr. Stokes: —in view of the fact that a defendant recently received legal aid who owned a hotel worth £100,000 and a motor car worth £28,000?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot comment on the specific point mentioned by my hon. Friend. However, I suggest that, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will be answering questions on Monday, he might like to put his points then.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that there are thousands of young people with a limited life expectancy because they have serious and severe muscular dystrophy and, as a consequence, are prisoners in their own homes or are confined behind garden gates like dogs or toddlers because the Government will not provide them with outdoor powered wheelchairs despite parliamentary questions, deputations to Ministers and early-day motions? May we have a debate on that subject, if not next week, as soon as possible afterwards?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman, who is a fair controversialist, will recognise that it was not so very long ago that we had a debate on the disabled. However, I will certainly bear his comments in mind.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend find time to debate the relationship between local authorities that are controlled by the Labour party and the police, particularly in view of the disgraceful behaviour of the acting leader of the Labour party in Wolverhampton who cast doubt upon the impartiality of the Police Complaints Authority and where two Labour councillors last Saturday joined a march organised to abuse and revile the police?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises an immensely serious point, and I am sure that it is not confined to Wolverhampton. I see no early prospect of such a debate in Government time. However, I wish him well in seeking the opportunity for a debate in other ways.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Is the Leader of the House aware that this afternoon a number of Liverpool city councillors were denied admittance to the Palace of Westminster? They intended to attend the other place to hear the decision on the appeal against their banning from public office. They had also made appointments with hon. Members. Will the right hon. Gentleman have words with the Serjeant at Arms to look into this matter? I am certain that if these people had been brokers from the City lobbying on behalf of big business they would have had no trouble getting into the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Biffen: Of course, I shall look into the circumstances attending the matter raised by the hon. Gentleman. He will appreciate that, in so doing, I do not in any sense imply that there has been any fault by the authorities of the House.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there will be a widespread welcome for the response by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to a parliamentary question last Friday which showed that the entire Government were behind the efforts of Cable and Wireless to obtain a share of the Japanese telecommunications market? Does he agree that we should have time for a debate, given the massive Japanese investment in this country, the balance of payments, which is substantially in Japan's favour, and the unwillingness of many Japanese interests to allow British investment in their country?

Mr. Biffen: Of course I recognise the importance of that issue, but I do not believe that there is an early prospect of Government time to debate the topic. I am certain that my hon. Friend will, in his own way, use the opportunities that the procedures of the House provide.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): When may we have a debate on the right of men to retire voluntarily at 60? Is it not ludicrous that, at a time of continuing high unemployment, men are forced to stay on at work when they are desperate to retire while younger people are kept out of the jobs that those people want to leave?

Mr. Biffen: I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman is implying that there should be a debate on pension levels. That has wide financial implications. As next week is devoted to the Budget debate, the hon. and learned Gentleman will be able to make his speech then.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I hesitate to put this question after what the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) has said, but at least I am retiring at the next election. My right hon. Friend knows perfectly well that we like to facilitate Government business and are enthusiastic about doing so. Will he tell the House when we are likely to return after the Easter recess so that we may facilitate our personal arrangements, both outside and within the House? We should like to know whether we can meet people here on Tuesday or Wednesday. It is important that we know the day.

Mr. Biffen: I shall ensure that my hon. Friend and the House generally know the day as quickly as possible.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): If the Leader of the House and the Conservative party are really concerned about local democracy, we should have a debate on it, in view of the cock-ups by the Secretary of State for the Environment and the fact that today elected councillors were disqualified by the Lords. It is time for the House to have a debate on local government democracy, taking into account the impositions placed on local authorities by the Secretary of State and by the courts which have rejected those representatives. No doubt the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is gratified by the fact that the Government have passed control of Liverpool council into the hands of the Liberal party without the electorate being involved.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not, even by inference, challenging the validity of the judgment of their Lordships. There is to be a debate next week on Liverpool. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will try to use that opportunity to make his remarks.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In view of Mr. Justice Latey's judgment in a recent surrogacy case, will my right hon. Friend consider having a debate on the Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985, which supposedly was designed to outlaw commercial surrogacy? Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people are deeply offended that Miss Lorrien Finley and others, who arrange for womb leasing to take place, are allowed to get away with it? May we at least have a statement about measures to protect the unborn child?

Mr. Biffen: If my hon. Friend implies that the case to which he refers involved commercial surrogacy, I note what he said; but that would be a highly controversial interpretation of that case. I must be realistic about this; there is no prospect of Government time being available for such a debate, although I realise that it is well within the competence of any hon. Member, by private enterprise, to raise it in the House.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Will the Leader of the House recommend to the Prime Minister that she makes a statement on the number of meetings that she has had with Major Walker of KMS concerning United Kingdom Government sales of arms to the Contra terrorists in Nicaragua? Will he also make plain to the Prime Minister that it is already evident outside the House that Major Walker is the Colonel North of this Government's Irangate, and that it is time the Government came clean on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: There are tasks for me other than to be a mere intermediary between the hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister. I suggest that he makes direct representations.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): In his consideration of how business in the House is conducted, will my right hon. Friend look carefully at the possibility of re-establishing in the House the Committee on Science and Technology? It is quite wrong that we should be dependent on the deliberations, however expert, of the other place on important matters like civil research and development. There is need for a body of this kind.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes an interesting suggestion, but it runs to the very heart of the departmental Select Committee structure which was established for the assistance of the House in its work. I shall bear in mind what he says, but I suspect that a debate on the matter belongs to the next Parliament rather than to this one.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his answer about the need for a statement or a debate on arms being supplied to the Contras in Nicaragua? Is he not aware that the United States Government have run into trouble because of illegal supplies to the Contras? It has been reported that decisions have been made by the British Government to help the Contras in this way. If any assistance is being given by the Government in that way, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that it is made known to the House?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will have ample and early opportunity next Wednesday when my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will be answering questions.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): In view of the Zeebrugge tragedy, will my right hon. Friend consider initiating a debate at the earliest opportunity? There is public disquiet in Yorkshire and in many other parts of the country about the public liability aspects of transport, and the Government have been pressing for an uprating of the Athens convention which limits liability to under £38,000 for death or serious injury. Even worse, in the event of death or serious injury on an aeroplane the Warsaw convention limits liability to under £14,000. Is it not right that in the very near future the House should have an opportunity to debate this?

Mr. Biffen: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that topic. It would have been rather extraordinary if this afternoon had passed without some reference to it. He will know that an inquiry has already been commissioned, but I note what he says about the possibilities of a debate. While I do not wish to hold out any immediate hope, I take account of what he says.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Bearing in mind that the new Member of Parliament for Truro will take his seat on Tuesday, will the Leader of the House assure us that there will be a full quota of ministerial statements to delay the new Member in taking his seat? Could one of those ministerial statements be on the subject of a private notice question that is to be tabled tomorrow on the dangers of passive smoking?

Mr. Biffen: In all charity I must tell the hon. Gentleman that the conclusion of his question was a mild anti-climax after all the expectation that was aroused by his earlier comment. Of course, all things are taken into account through the usual channels.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): It is the intention of the BBC to screen a series of programmes starting this weekend on the world of UB40 based on a very partial, shoddy report prepared by a pseudo-academic unit of Newcastle university. Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on the BBC and its obligations under the charter?

Mr. Biffen: It must be heroic optimism that prompts that question, because, even if I were disposed to have the matter debated, I could not do it in time to place the debate alongside when the programmes are to be shown.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House make arrangements for an early debate on the Government's foreign policy, particularly towards central America, so that hon. Members can raise the serious matter of the supply of arms illegally from this country to a group of terrorists trying to kill people in Nicaragua? Will he also say whether the Government are prepared to undertake an investigation into the work of a mercenary recruiting organisation here that appears to have the tacit approval of Her Majesty's Government in their attempts to destroy the democratically elected Government of the people of Nicaragua?

Mr. Biffen: I have received a number of requests that there should be a general foreign affairs debate, and I hope that that can be undertaken reasonably soon. Meanwhile, however, all the hon. Gentleman's deep feelings will have to be sublimated into Question Time on Wednesday.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 634, with a supporting amendment?

[That this House believes that overseas Civil Service pensioners should be allowed to count war service towards their pension entitlement in the same way as every other branch of the public service; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to do justice towards a small number of mostly elderly people whose working lives were spent abroad in the service of the Crown.]

It has been signed by 108 Members. It refers to the fact that all the public services of this country are entitled to count war service in the computation of their pensions, except where that public service was overseas. Is it not a disgrace that this injustice should have been perpetuated for so long? Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on the matter so that that injustice can be removed as soon as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I must confess that I do not see the likelihood of an early debate in Government time on this topic, but it touches intimately on the financing of public sector pensions. Therefore, it would be appropriate for my hon. Friend to make a speech in the debate on the Budget.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Has the Leader of the House made any progress in trying to tempt the Attorney-General to come to the House to make a statement on the subject of equality before the law, especially with reference to the fact that the Lord Chancellor said in the other place last week that the case involving all those connected with the swindle at Unimar and the Lloyd's insurance market, in which 1,000 people were cheated out of their money, should not be pursued because it would be a waste of time, too expensive and too exhaustive of the legal procedures?

Is not the fact that the £30 million involved in that case has now gone down the drain in stark contrast to the way in which today the Law Lords have made a decision about 47 councillors in Liverpool and Lambeth, who have been surcharged to the tune of less than £250,000? Is there not something wrong with the system of law in Britain and freedom under it when these people in the City, these crooks, these swindlers, these friends of the Tory party ——[Interruption.] Yes, and they have given money to the Tory party. There is something wrong in Britain when these people can get away with it, but councillors who are building homes and doing their best to provide services for the people in their communities can be kicked out of office by people who represent the establishment that has allowed these crooks to get away.

Mr. Biffen: It is to be deprecated when hon. Members attack a decision made by the Law Lords merely because it happens to be politically inconvenient. The hon. Gentleman has elaborated his case. It so happens that, on Monday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will be answering questions.

Mr. Skinner: I know.

Mr. Biffen: If the hon. Gentleman knows, I wonder why he asked me the question. He will have the chance to address his questions to the quarter to which they should be directed.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the most important Secondary Heads Association report on the serious decline in competitive games and physical education in schools. May we have an early debate on this matter, which is important from the point of view of both the nation and our children?

Mr. Biffen: There is widespread recognition that games and team spirit imply qualities needed in this House and outside.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): In view of the Prime Minister's comment that those who are democratically elected must learn to take responsibility for their actions, will the Leader of the House draw the attention of the right hon. Lady to page 9 of today's copy of the Newcastle Journal, which carries a photograph of hundreds of my constituents queuing for free EEC food, some of whom described butter as a luxury? Is that not a damning indictment of the Tory party's policies? Will he ask the right hon. Lady to come to the Dispatch Box, or, better still, the ballot box, to take responsibility for her actions?

Mr. Biffen: I do not for one moment accept the highly coloured views that the hon. Gentleman has expressed, but I shall convey his remarks to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I shall do that more willingly as they are connected with the Newcastle Journal.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Will my right hon. Friend say when he expects to make time available to debate the reports of the Public Accounts Committee, one of which is on the operation of the legal aid scheme?

Mr. Biffen: There are well-established conventions regarding reports of the Public Accounts Committee and the debating of them. I shall try to follow those as faithfully as I can, and in so doing I hope to satisfy my hon. Friend.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Is the Leader of the House concerned about the allegations that DHSS liable relative officers are asking most intimate questions of 16-year-old pregnant girls? Is he aware that the questions are alleged to include, "When did you first have sex? When was your baby conceived? What is your precise relationship with the father of your baby?" Will he ensure that the Secretary of State for Social Services issues an urgent instruction to all DHSS staff that such questions are not permissible and should not be put?

Mr. Biffen: I was not aware of the situation that the hon. Gentleman has outlined, but I shall convey his remarks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): May I join my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) in asking for an urgent debate on parliamentary behaviour? It would give the Labour party an interesting opportunity of explaining whether its new doctrine of self-discipline would apply to macho little Welshmen outside Pakistani chippies in Ealing.

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says, and he clearly demonstrates that such a debate would be colourful, but essentially I have nothing further to add to the reply that I have already given.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): In view of the extraordinary outburst in Monday night's defence debate from the official alliance spokesman, who said that he was not responsible for Liberal policies, and the intervention in that debate by the leader of the SDP, who said that alliance policies were quite distinct from Liberal policies, may we have an urgent defence debate so that the House may establish once and for all whether the official 1986 Liberal publication, "These are Liberal policies" should be renamed, for election purposes, "These are not Liberal policies"?

Mr. Biffen: That is an interesting line of approach, but my hon. Friend must realise that I am circumscribed for debating time, and therefore he will have to use some ingenuity with the Order Paper as it stands. I should have thought that the varied financial implications of the alternative defence policies of the alliance would make that an appropriate topic for the Budget debate.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Bearing in mind the remarks that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Employment made this morning on the black economy, and the resentment of those who milk the system that is felt by millions of honest taxpayers, may we expect an early debate on the subject?

Mr. Biffen: I have the great advantage of not having heard the remarks of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, but I will take a swing. I should have thought that next week's Budget debate, the levels of direct taxation and the implications for the black economy all hold together magnificently.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will my right hon. Friend associate my name with the first request this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition for a debate on the plight of children? Such a debate would give me an opportunity to tell people of the jeers, smears and smirks that I have had to suffer from the Opposition, and also for my colleagues and I to tell people that we remain undaunted in our efforts to protect children.

Mr. Biffen: I am so glad that the Leader of the Opposition has provided solace for someone. I associate my hon. Friend's name with his in a request for a debate.

Mr. Faulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take it after the statement.

Sizewell B Nuclear Power Station

4.6 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that I have reached a decision on the application by the Central Electricity Generating Board to construct a nuclear power station using a pressurised water reactor; the Sizewell B station in Suffolk. In accordance with the statutory requirements of the inquiry rules, I am notifying the board, the local planning authorities and the objectors of my decision and my reasons therefor. I am placing copies of my decision letter in the Library of the House.

The CEGB's application has been the subject of the most wide-ranging and longest public inquiry that has been carried out in this country. I published the report on 26 January 1987. It was debated by the House on 23 February. On that occasion the thoroughness and well-written nature of Sir Frank Layfield's work were generally acknowledged by all hon. Members.

I can assure the House that, before reaching my decision, I have carefully considered the points raised during that debate and those that were made in the debate in another place last week.

Hon. Members have clearly studied the inspector's report with care. They will be familiar with the conclusion that there is a national interest in building a PWR, and that that can best be met at Sizewell. He found that a new power station is required to meet anticipated capacity need; that it should be approved in the near future; and that the proposed PWR is likely to be the least-cost means of adding that capacity. The inspector further concluded that there is good confidence that Sizewell B was sufficiently safe to be tolerable, and that the national need for the station overrides the local interest in favour of conservation.

Sir Frank therefore recommended that consent and deemed planning permission should be given for the station, but should be refused for the second access road. He also made a number of detailed subsidiary recommendations.

The inspector closed the inquiry in March 1985 and, properly, reported only on the evidence he received before then. In reaching my decision, however, I must consider whether anything has occurred since that date which is material to my decision and, if so, what weight I should give to any such matters.

I have, in particular, considered the relevance of Chernobyl to the safety of the proposed station. I have also taken into account recent changes in electricity demand and fossil fuel prices.

First, in relation to the Chernobyl accident, the chief inspector of nuclear installations has advised me that the PWR design for Sizewell B is of a different reactor type from the Soviet RBMK design. All nuclear power stations in the United Kingdom, unlike those in the Soviet Union, must have engineered control and automatic protection systems. Moreover, our system of regulation, unlike that which applied in the Soviet Union, ensures that there is a proper and reliable procedural framework of controls. All our experience in the United Kingdom has demonstrated that there is a superior safety culture to that which apparently existed at Chernobyl, and which allowed the repeated deliberate non-compliance with safety procedures.

The chief inspector of nuclear installations therefore advises me that the Chernobyl accident does not call for any reconsideration of the conclusions or recommendations of the Layfield report. I agree with his advice, a copy of which I am placing in the Library.

In his report, Sir Frank Layfield also discusses emergency plans in the event of a nuclear accident. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 18 December that the Government were undertaking a review — in the light of our experience of the Chernobyl accident — of the United Kingdom's emergency plans and procedures in the event of a nuclear accident either in the United Kingdom or abroad. The conclusion of the first stage of the review was that, while planning needs to provide more specifically for an accident outside the United Kingdom, existing emergency plans continue to provide a valid basis for the response to any nuclear accident in the United Kingdom.

Turning to the economic case, I have noted that since the inquiry closed economic activity has risen, with associated growth in demand for electricity. Sizewell B, even if started now, is unlikely to be ready ahead of need.

On the other hand, fossil fuel prices have fallen since 1985. Projecting these forward to the end of the century and beyond is subject to great uncertainty. I have, however, examined the inspector's economic case against a range of coal prices considerably lower than those discussed in the report.

Even against that lower range, I have concluded that Sizewell B remains the cheapest option for meeting the anticipated need for new capacity. I have also concluded, as did the inspector, that the development of a further nuclear station would be a valuable step in achieving greater fuel diversity in our generating system.

In view of the inspector's conclusions and recommendations, together with my own consideration of the issues, I agree with his conclusions that Sizewell B is acceptably safe and would meet a national need by providing new capacity at least cost. That outweighs any disadvantage from disturbances to the locality.

I have therefore decided to give my consent, under section 2 of the Electric Lighting Act 1909, to the CEGB's application to construct the Sizewell B power station, together with deemed planning permission under section 40 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, and the necessary investment approval. In order to minimise disturbance to the locality, I have decided that this should be subject to the detailed local planning conditions proposed by the inspector, and should exclude the CEGB's proposal for a new access road, consent for which is refused.

In my decision letter, which sets out my detailed response, I also accept the substance of the inspector's other recommendations. A number of these recommendations will now need to be actively followed up outside Government. In particular, I agree with the inspector that a study of alternatives to the B1122 for heavy traffic should be made, and I am commending that to the Suffolk county council.

Sir Frank Layfield also helpfully made a number of observations and informal proposals for further action which he considered desirable. I am not required to reach a conclusion on those for the purposes of my section 2 consent. I have, however, examined them carefully and, where appropriate, they will be further considered by Government.

[Mr. Peter Walker]

In reaching my decision I have considered most carefully Sir Frank Layfield's comments on safety. I should make it clear that, as a separate process, under different statute, the CEGB also requires a licence from the independent nuclear installations inspectorate as well as my consent before it can start construction. The chief inspector of nuclear installations informs me that the nuclear installations inspectorate judges that there are now no safety obstacles of substance which would prevent the licensing of Sizewell B in the next couple of months. He has assured me that the nuclear installations inspectorate will consider carefully Sir Frank Layfield's comments and proposals on the safety of the reactor before issuing a licence. Sir Frank Layfield commented that both the CEGB and the nuclear installations inspectorate possessed impressive technical competence and engineering judgment of a high quality.

I am fully confident that the nuclear installations inspectorate will continue to satisfy itself about the safety of the station throughout the rest of its design, construction, operation and decommissioning. At each major stage in the construction and commissioning process, the approval of the nuclear installations inspectorate is required before the CEGB can proceed further.

Turning briefly to alternative sources of electricity I should make it clear that the Government are determined that renewable techniques should, in the longer term, make the maximum contribution of which they are economically capable. We are supporting a major research and development programme on which over £100 million has been spent to date. Strong support will continue to be provided for our programmes on wind, tide and geothermal hot rocks.

My decision on Sizewell B reinforces the importance that the Government attach to the role already played by nuclear power within the United Kingdom. It now provides some 20 per cent. of our electricity requirements and with those stations due for commissioning in the near future, a quarter of Britain's electricity will come from nuclear power. On any projection of world energy needs there is no way of meeting those needs in the coming decades without the emergence of a substantial contribution from nuclear power. My Sizewell decision today will enable Britain to play its part in that endeavour.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): We regret this decision. It sets the wrong pattern for future energy requirements in the United Kingdom for the next decade and beyond.

Sir Frank Layfield laboured long and hard to produce his report, but that report is out of date both on the economics of electricity generation and on safety, particularly as Sir Frank Layfield did not deal with the Chernobyl disaster. We are astonished that those new factors have been dismissed by the Secretary of State. Will the right hon. Gentleman publish the evidence that convinced him on those particular points?

There is no justification for building the imported technology of the PWR in Britain. In view of the right hon. Gentleman's announcement, can he assure the House that that will not lead to the construction of the PWR family throughout Britain, which was recommended by Sir Frank Layfield, and that any further applications for the construction of PWRs will each be judged independently?

When does the right hon. Gentleman expect publication of the pre-construction safety report and the final safety report as recommended by Sir Frank Layfield? In his report Sir Frank Layfield lays considerable emphasis on the responsibility of the nuclear installations inspectorate. What steps are being taken to ensure that the NII is adequately staffed to fulfil its responsibilities?

Sir Frank Layfield makes a series of recommendations throughout the report. He lists 14 that he regards as the minimum that should be done if consent is given. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that that minimum is being done, and, indeed, that many more of the recommendations have been accepted and acted upon. In particular, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that all the elements of Layfield's recommendation 4 on safety criteria will be complied with, including those on parliamentary and public consultation? When will the review of emergency plans in case of nuclear accident be completed and when will the report be published?

It seems extraordinary that the decision has been taken to proceed with the PWR before the Government and responsible agencies have solved the problems of the disposal of nuclear waste. I am sure that many Conservative Members will share my misgivings on that matter and will join me in urging the Government to produce an acceptable solution before proceeding with the PWR.

Finally, in a nation rich in indigenous energy sources, a saner, more economic and safer option would be the construction of modern and clean coal-fired power stations. To meet the nation's capacity need more quickly, and, we would argue, more cheaply, we shall continue to urge that policy upon the Government.

Mr. Walker: The right hon. Gentleman ended his question by referring to a nation rich in energy resources, but in the next few decades, as Britain's oil and gas resources decline, the Labour party wishes to eradicate the nuclear industry leaving Britain dependent on only one form of energy. I cannot think of a more irresponsible energy policy than that.

Fortunately, the Soviet Union published in detail for the International Atomic Energy Agency every detail of the Chernobyl event.

Mr. Orme: Human error.

Mr. Walker: No, it said first, that it was due to a wrongly designed reactor; secondly, to faulty engineering; and thirdly to human error. The chief inspector—the right hon. Gentleman considered the strength of the NII to be paramount—has advised me on the basis of all the evidence available to him and a copy has been placed in the Library.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the PWR being imported, but I must point out to the House that 93 per cent. of the work done at Sizewell B will be produced in Britain by British firms. As a result of building Sizewell B Britain will, for the first time, have an opportunity in the massively expanding PWR market that is taking place throughout the world. Therefore, in terms of our trade policy, it is a considerable advantage to Britain.

I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that we shall guarantee that the NII is properly staffed. At present, a substantial recruitment programme is taking place in order to meet the requirements.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the 14 recommendations. I can only say that the Government have accepted all the major recommendations that apply to them. The right hon. Gentleman will see that each of those recommendations is dealt with in the detailed letter that has been sent to the CEGB, a copy of which will be available in the Library.

On the alternative of coal, the right hon. Gentleman knows that it is up to the CEGB to apply to the Government and, as he well knows, it has been looking at the possibility of a number of coal-fired stations. I anticipate that in the near future it will probably be making such an application.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I thank my right hon. Friend for making the right decision in this crucially important area, but in view of the importance to Britain in future of maintaining competitive electricity prices, how does his announcement of this nuclear programme today compare with the programmes of our major industrial competitors throughout the world?

Mr. Walker: I am afraid to say that I have only announced this afternoon the go-ahead for one PWR station in the foreseeable future. That is a modest contribution compared with our major competitors. France intends to build 15 new nuclear power stations by 1995. The Japanese have embarked on a programme of 16 new nuclear power stations before 1995, and have proposed a much bigger programme to move to 60 per cent. dependence on nuclear energy in the foreseeable future. Germany has reaffirmed its programme of four new nuclear power stations to be built by 1990. The United States has commissioned 12 new nuclear power stations in the past two years and 19 new nuclear power stations are under construction. Since Chernobyl, the Soviet Union has announced that it will double its nuclear power programme.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The Secretary of State will be aware that my colleagues and I much regret and are opposed to today's decision. The Secretary of State's statement has virtually evaded every question associated with the decision.

Will he first explain whether consideration was given to investing the money that the PWR will cost into energy conservation instead? Does he agree that the savings that could be achieved would be greater than the power that will be created by building the PWR? Secondly, will he explain what the procedure will be for building further PWRs, especially as Sir Frank Layfield said that he regarded Sizewell as a prototype to be tested? Thirdly, does he agree with Sir Frank Layfield that a simulator should be built before the final power station is constructed?

Will the right hon. Gentleman explain exactly what the phrase "superior safety culture" means? I hope, for his sake, that it is not a phrase that will come home to haunt him. With regard to the nuclear installations inspectorate, is he satisfied that he will be able to secure the technical staff necessary to honour the guarantees that he has just made?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman said that I would understand that he would be opposed to the decision, and in preparation for this afternoon I studied the policy of his parties. I discovered that one policy of the Liberal party is virtually identical to that of the Labour party. One SDP policy is completely different, and I discovered a new alliance policy that is difficult to comprehend from trying to read it. I presume that is a way of fudging what is now alliance policy. In fairness to the alliance, there is one area of the nuclear industry that they wish to retain — Dounreay — because it is in an area represented by an SDP Member.

As for nuclear inspectors, I am satisfied that we shall be able to recruit nuclear inspectors of the appropriate quality. With regard to PWRs, if I receive another application from the CEGB it will be carefully considered in the light of the factors made known.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin (Wanstead and Woodford): Does my right hon. Friend accept that his decision will be widely welcomed on the Conservative Benches, not least by those of us who have been arguing that we should bring our nuclear industry into the mainstream of the world's nuclear industry? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, far from being against the interests of the environment, the Royal Commission on environmental pollution recommended a modest programme of nuclear power stations to improve the atmospheric environment?

Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the further stations in this modest programme will be subject to public inquiry, but that those inquiries will be limited to site-specific issues and will not cover the wide range of the Sizewell inquiry?

Mr. Walker: Future public inquiries must depend on the nature of the reactor and the nature of the request from the CEGB. With regard to this type of reactor, the Sizewell inquiry has served to ascertain the full facts and the full arguments on the topic.

My right hon. Friend has occupied posts connected with energy and the environment, and he is absolutely right that the Royal Commission pointed out the considerable environmental advantages of nuclear energy.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement will be widely understood as a complete victory for the nuclear lobby that, to my certain personal knowledge, for over 20 years has wanted us to adopt an American reactor? However, the right hon. Gentleman's announcement comes 10 years after the Americans abandoned the very reactor that he has now decided to buy. That is not a credible position to occupy.

Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that on a decision of this magnitude he should not make the decision; Parliament should decide. It is quite wrong for him to listen like some managing director and then announce his decision. The House should have a debate in which the matter can be voted upon before a decision is finally reached.

Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that, despite the ceaseless and ruthless campaign by Lord Marshall and others, public opinion is well ahead of him and the lobby in arguing that the time has come to pause. People want a pause.

[Mr. Tony Benn]

Is he aware that this question will arise in the general election? If the reactor is built, there will be a long period before we see the full uncertainty about adopting a reactor that the Americans have abandoned.

Mr. Walker: I wish to record the considerable contribution that the right hon. Gentleman made to the advance of nuclear energy in this country when he was Secretary of State for Energy. I know that he now regrets that contribution, but I do not think that many in this House do so.

It is nonsense to say that the United States has abandoned this type of reactor. At present, there is 11 times as much nuclear energy capacity in the United States as in Britain. The figures that I gave earlier to the House show that in the past two years the Americans have completed 12 new PWR stations, and currently 19 are under construction.

As for public opinion, I express my gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman because, over the years, the impact of his views on public opinion has always been to the benefit of my party.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I pay tribute to the Secretary of State for implementing the substantial report. I ask him to lay at rest one of the greatest public anxieties which is that, at nuclear power stations leukaemia cases can arise that can be destructive.

What is the date for commissioning? Is my right hon. Friend prepared to recommend to the Leader of the House that we have a further debate so that these matters can be extensively canvassed?

Mr. Walker: Obviously the Leader of the House will take note of what my hon. Friend said about a debate, and that matter was raised by the Leader of the Opposition.

On the question of leukaemia, a most incredibly irresponsible press release was issued by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), the shadow Secretary of State for Social Services in which he referred to Sellafield as having "killing fields". I can guarantee that that view was totally and passionately opposed by the shadow Secretary of State for the Environment whose constituents live in that area and work at that station. The manner in which the figures were used in that statement gave a wholly false impression. I would be only too delighted for anybody to study the true evidence that has been produced. It certainly shows that there is no connection between the incidence of leukaemia and nuclear power stations.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I note the right hon. Gentleman's assurances about safety, but in my view they are rather injudicious. These stations are human artefacts and can be subject to human error, faults in design, metal fatigue, and so on. Many people believe that even the Russians do not build nuclear power stations to blow up in their faces. Accidents can happen anywhere, as we have seen in America.

The right hon. Gentleman has given us assurances about support for alternative sources of energy generation, but many of us do not accept those assurances. I am aware that funds have been reduced for the production of electricity from wave power. That has been the pattern followed all along by the Government. In view of the doubts about the cost and the disposal of waste, does he not think that the nuclear programme should be abandoned?

Mr. Walker: No. I believe that it has been proved throughout the western world that nuclear energy is an extremely safe form of energy and its safety record compares exceedingly favourably with other forms of energy.

As for Scotland, the continuance of a nuclear power programme has considerable employment implications for Scottish industry. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will remember that.

In every major area of renewable sources of energy the Government have increased expenditure and improved activity. We shall continue to do so.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): May I offer my right hon. Friend my strongest possible endorsement of his decision, which I believe to be realistic, relevant, courageous and long overdue? Will he resist the siren voices that argue generally that because there has been no new order for a PWR power station in the United States, we should not take that route? As my right hon. Friend has said, about 30 such reactors have been built in the United States, and about 60 worldwide. We know that more are under construction and that more are likely to be ordered.

Would it not be true to say that to decide not to build a PWR station because of what happened at Chernobyl would be comparable to refusing to grant an airworthiness certificate to Concorde because a DC3 had crashed?

Mr. Walker: I agree very much with what my hon. Friend has said about Chernobyl. It is interesting that all the signs from the Soviet Union are that they will double their nuclear programme, and that they are almost certainly to take the PWR route. They will do so with their great awareness of the problems of safety.

There is no doubt that a great deal of activity is taking place in the United States. Our major industrial competitors, France, Germany, Japan and the United States, are all going ahead with nuclear power programmes that are far greater than ours.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Has my right hon. Friend been able to calculate the impact on jobs if the Labour party's proposals to scrap all nuclear industry were pursued?

Mr. Walker: The Labour party agreed at its last conference—this has become its policy—to eradicate the nuclear industry over the coming decades by phasing out, first, Magnox and, secondly, the advanced gas-cooled reactor. At that same conference a motion was proposed by Arthur Scargill, which was passed by an enormous majority, that sought to eradicate all nuclear energy during the lifetime of the next Parliament. It needs a move of only less than half of 1 per cent. at the next Labour party conference to cause that to become permanent Labour party policy. If that policy were implemented, the loss of jobs would be massive immediately.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Secretary of State aware that he is making the biggest mistake of his life and that the consequences of any possible future accident will be suffered by his children and all our children? Will he recognise that the assurances that he has given about PWR being "sufficiently" safe and being "acceptably" safe are a ghostly echo of the sort of assurances that were given in the United States before the Three Mile Island PWR explosion, which was extremely close to a disaster?

Mr. Walker: There are Opposition Members who rather share my view on nuclear energy and its safety, and perhaps no one more than the shadow Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). His educational background equips him rather well to understand these matters, and he has lived among a nuclear power station work force. Only a few days ago he wrote:

> "What I think the nuclear industry needs to do to widen its public support is expand its existing policy of more openness. This will add to the public's understanding of the issues, problems and advantages which the industry brings. The more open and informed the debate the better it will be for the nuclear industry".

I hope that the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) will take note of that.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): My right hon. Friend knows the anxieties of some of my constituents in Cambridgeshire, which I have expressed to him. Is he aware that what he has said today will go a long way towards reassuring them? Is it not sensible to reflect, when considering safety, that every year about 5,000 people are slaughtered on our roads and that there is no protest against petrol by the Liberal or Labour parties? As the area most concerned is East Anglia, will my right hon. Friend give a firm assurance that everything possible will be done to preserve the environment in that area?

Mr. Walker: I know that my hon. Friend is aware that Sir Frank Layfield took great care to examine the environmental impact of Sizewell B. He eradicated certain proposals that he considered to be environmentally unsound. I can assure my hon. Friend that careful consideration will be given by the Departments of Environment and Transport to any matters affecting the environment of East Anglia.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the Secretary of State accept that his statement is seen as a reflection of the commitment that the Government have had towards the nuclear industry since taking office? Despite the investment in the coal industry, the right hon. Gentleman's announcement demonstrates the Government's prejudice towards it. The Government have been in office for nearly eight years and during that period there has been no new order for a coal-fired power station. Although the Treasury wins the argument on this occasion, Sizewell B alone will not meet the capacity that will be needed for the production of electricity in the mid-1990s. When will the House be told where sensible energy will come from in the form of new coal-fired power stations?

Mr. Walker: If our view were that the coal industry should be eradicated and that the nuclear industry should take its place, I would not approve the investment of £2 billion over the next three years in the coal industry. The Government's investment policies have led to the coal industry's productivity surpassing anything that was even dreamed of by the Labour Government. I believe that in the near future applications will be made by the consideration that has ben given to various sites. I can promise the hon. Gentleman that any such applications will quickly be considered.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on making the right decision for all the right reasons? I wish to ask him a question which I think would be asked by my near neighbour, my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, if he were able to ask it. We know that the public at large do not have as much knowledge of nuclear matters as we would like them to have and that this relative lack of knowledge is exploited by those who have anti nuclear feelings. Will my right hon. Friend ask his Department to organise a campaign of public education so that much of their anxiety can be alleviated?

Mr. Walker: It is important that the facts are conveyed to the public instead of the distortions, especially in a locality that is involved in the nuclear industry. The industry itself, including the CEGB and the electricity authorities, have a duty to ensure that the facts are circulated.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The Secretary of State has asked the House to have regard to the "true evidence." Will he acknowledge that the Layfield report is essentially incomplete? The committee was promised an account of the British design and none was ever presented to it. It remains unfinished. That means that no licensing could ever have taken place. Will the right hon. Gentleman take account of the facts that the working pressure and temperature of a PWR are so high and reaction time so short that human capacity cannot deal with it?

In view of the right hon. Gentleman's exhortation to depend on the nuclear installations inspectorate, and remembering its craven refusal to accept an investigation of weld assurance records at Hinckley Point, how the hell does he expect it to take on board the complex assessment that is necessary for a PWR design?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his colleagues have been giving their constituents an assurance that the House would have a second opportunity to discuss this issue on a reasoned and considered motion that would be open to reasoned and considered amendment? Will he have the courage now to leave his decision until the general election so that the British electorate can decide?

Mr. Walker: I shall be delighted if, during the next election, the Labour party continues with its policy to eradicate the nuclear industry. If it does so, it will deservedly lose thousands of votes on that entirely irresponsible policy. I have total confidence in the NII. It has a fine record, and the inspector said so. The more debates that take place on this issue on the Floor of the House, the more I shall be delighted.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Those who live in my constituency and others who live in the area around it will welcome the extra work and jobs that will result from my right hon. Friend's decision. Will he consider the concern that has been expressed during the winter months about the price of electricity, especially among pensioners and particularly during the harsh weather that we have faced? What will be the effects of the Opposition's policy on electricity prices?

Mr. Walker: It depends on which of the Opposition's policies one chooses. If one chooses Mr. Scargill's proposal, which was greeted by a hefty majority, it would cost an enormous amount. If they phased out nuclear power, as is the official policy, at present, it is considered that that would add about 15 per cent. to the cost of electricity. The industries concerned — they employ 800,000 people and have a high use of electricity—will be adversely affected.

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that this is a regrettable decision? Is he aware that we have heard comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), who outlined a defect in the report? Is he also aware that the coal prices quoted in the report are hopelessly out of date and have been over-exaggerated? They would put a different complexion on the matter if they were brought up to date.

In what way does the proposed design differ from that of the Three Mile Island station? We cannot escape the fact that that station has been closed down for several years, is hardly likely to be opened for a long time and has cost a fortune. Is the Secretary of State further aware that since I have been an hon. Member I have heard Ministers on both sides—the right hon. Gentleman made a fair point —so exaggerate the benefits of nuclear power that the matter has almost become like a fairy story? I remember when we were promised nuclear power that was to be so cheap that it would not be metered. We have also heard the argument today that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman ask a question, please?

Mr. McGuire: I shall put it in the form of a question, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Secretary of State also aware, on the matter of export orders, that if future orders are as good as the ones in the past, we shall not sell anything because our nuclear exports have been a disaster? Can the Secretary of State assure us that in the past — if I may use a homely expression — nuclear power advocates have been bragging on a pair of deuces. When shall we have the promised debate——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall use a homely expression. An important arts debate is to follow this. I ask hon. Members whom I endeavour to call on the statement to put their questions briefly.

Mr. McGuire: One final point, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman's contribution would have been somewhat shorter if he had been present for the statement. He would have heard the answers to some of his questions. I dealt with the cost of coal and what has happened since. I shall be interested to hear from Opposition Members whether, when they talk about the coal cost equivalent, they really talk about the international coal price. Will they deal with coal at the international coal price? If they did so, they would do immense damage to the British coal industry. Our nuclear industry has achieved massive export orders, of which I hope the hon. Gentleman is proud.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on bringing forward a policy that he and I first started in 1973? Thank goodness it has come to fruition at last. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House quickly what, at the moment, is the estimated total cost for the power station? When does he estimate that it will be completed? Can he assure the House that research is still being carried out into the application of the fast-breeder reactor?

Mr. Walker: Work on the fast-breeder reactor is continuing. The latest cost estimate for Sizewell B is just in excess of £1·5 billion. The research programme will certainly continue.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is the Secretary of State aware that supporters of the British nuclear industry, including those within the industry, such as the chairman of the South of Scotland electricity board, have not all been enthusiasts for the PWR? What is the future of the British AGR programme? Will the Secretary of State assure the House that the limited resources of manpower and money that are necessary to develop the fast reactor programme will not be pre-empted by the decision?

Mr. Walker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his question. His views on the nuclear industry differ from the overall view of the party with which he is associated, which makes it clear that, in its view, nuclear power is not safe. Therefore, I suggest that, with his constituency interest, he must examine whether he can continue in alliance with such a party. Of course the AGRs will continue. On the AGR-PWR argument, the hon. Gentleman's party policy of making no orders for the foreseeable future would soon bring to an end the feasibility of going ahead with an AGR. The report clearly states that there is a cost advantage with the PWR and that it is safe. Alas, we have never obtained an overseas order for an AGR during a period in which the world has been building a great number of PWRs.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, today, he announced the biggest jobs boost for Teesside in 10 years and that it will be warmly welcomed by my constituents who work at Davy McKee, Cleveland Bridge, Darchem, and other companies? Is he further aware that their only nuclear fear is not simply the Labour party's conference resolution but the specific pledge of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to scrap Sizewell if a Labour Government come to power?

Mr. Walker: Certainly the policies propounded by the Opposition will be exceedingly bad for the north-east. As my hon. Friend knows, I was in his constituency and in the north-east about a week or so ago. There was no doubt about their anxiety that we should proceed with the policy.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Secretary of State spoke of an energy shortfall that Sizewell will not come on stream in time to meet. Will he acknowledge that there will be tremendous sadness on Tyneside at his failure to order coal-fired power stations, for which the power plant industry on Tyneside could have a hope of tendering? Such stations would provide employment on Tyneside for the power plant industry and for the people who work in coal production.

Mr. Walker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government have given considerable support in recent years to the procurement of some quite important overseas orders by industry on Tyneside and elsewhere. I am pleased that that has taken place. I have not rejected any application for a coal-fired station. I must wait for the CEGB to make an application. It has been studying the sites. I have reason to believe that it will make such an application in the near future.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his bold and realistic decision, but it relates to one type of reactor in one location. I welcome the fact that he has referred to wind, tidal and thermal energy. I should like him to emphasise that fact, because he also spoke about new coal-fired power stations. Will he bear in mind the fact that consumers of energy want a power programme that will give industrial users prices that are competitive with those in other countries? I hope that he will be in a position to make a statment about further reactors. After his views are put forward, I hope that it will not take five years to reach a decision.

Mr. Walker: I certainly share the last hope that my hon. Friend mentioned. Certainly, when further applications come in from the CEGB, they will be carefully and quickly considered. Progress has been made in looking at the potential of such enormous schemes as the Severn barrage scheme and the Mersey barrage scheme. The developments that are taking place in geothermal energy are exciting. Alas, they are unlikely to make any major contribution to our energy supplies for some decades to come.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Secretary of State refrain from misrepresenting the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who is opposed to PWRs, and yet, like myself, is a vigorous supporter of nuclear power? Will the Secretary of State accept that the design of an AGR station is inherently safer than that of a PWR station? Do not all previous experiences point to that fact?

Mr. Walker: I completely reject that statement.

Mr. Frank Cook: On what basis?

Mr. Walker: On the same basis as it was examined by Frank Layfield, and on all the evidence. A massive number of pressurised water reactors are operating safely throughout the world. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's opposition to the policy of his own party on nuclear energy. He must be very concerned, as is his right hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for the Environment, about the Labour party's ghastly policy towards Sellafield, which would absolutely destroy the prospects for that part of the country if the Labour party ever came to power.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Do not the protestations that we have heard today come ill from hon. Members who supported Mr. Scargill's strike to the hilt? Was that strike not intended to put the lights out in Britain and to leave the elderly and families with young children in the cold?

Mr. Walker: There is no doubt that the Labour party's energy policy is fully supported by Mr. Scargill.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the Minister aware that millions of people will be deeply angered by the decision that he has at last been forced to announce? For all his alleged understanding of the issue, the Minister cannot solve the problem of nuclear waste, and he knows it. So long as there is a nuclear industry there will be the problem of nuclear waste. Is the Minister further aware that the building of the Sizewell power station will increase the transport of nuclear waste through north London to Sellafield and that that in itself will meet massive opposition? Finally, is he aware that the number of accidents that have been reported at Sellafield and other stations leads people to be very suspicious of chauvinistic claims about the safety of British nuclear power stations compared with others when, in reality, the industry is fundamentally dangerous? The Minister ought to be providing resources for the development of renewable energy sources. Finally——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has already asked two questions.

Mr. Walker: I believe that nuclear waste problems can be dealt with in total safety. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should ask his right hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for the Environment to take him on a visit to Sellafield and then he will be convinced, too.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. A very important arts debate is to follow this statement. I shall endeavour to call all hon. Members who want to ask questions, but I should like to move on to the next business by 5 o'clock. Questions should be directed to nuclear energy not to coal.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): I, too, greatly welcome my right hon. Friend's decision in principle. However, he will be as aware as I am that his decision will almost immediately trigger an application from the Central Electricity Generating Board to build one and possibly two PWRs at Winfrith in my constituency, which will involve at least 90 m high cooling towers in the middle of Hardy country. Will he assure me that aesthetic grounds will play a very important part in the decision about whether to allow such a development?

Mr. Walker: Any application will involve the appropriate planning procedures. I can only consider a specific proposal when I receive it from the CEGB.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Following my right hon. Friend's answer to the right hon. Member for the Western Isles (Mr. Stewart), is my right hon. Friend aware that the importance of Sizewell orders has been emphasised as "crucial" by a number of key companies in Glasgow and Renfrewshire? Does he agree with me that his announcement will be warmly welcomed by companies such as Weir and Babcock? Is it not a disgrace that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) should wholly ignore the interests of heavy industry in the west of Scotland?

Mr. Walker: Anybody who examines the list of contracts that will be placed as a result of building this reactor will recognise the considerable immediate advantages to Scotland, the north and other similar areas and the long-term advantage of potential export orders.

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on reaching a courageous and bold decision. It will be welcomed particularly in west and south-west Cumbria. It will be welcomed not just in my constituency but also in the Copeland constituency where Sellafield is situated—as the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) would confirm if he were here—and in the Workington constituency, which the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) would also confirm if he had the courage to do so. Will my right hon. Friend comment on the Government's policy regarding nuclear energy in general and on the prospects for west Cumbria and south-west Cumbria in particular?

Mr. Walker: The impact on Cumbria and on Sellafield is very considerable. It is interesting to note that locally the Labour party has one policy but nationally it has another. The Labour party's policy decision to stop processing nuclear fuels from abroad, which is the main reason for the financing of the development there—[Interruption.] As the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) says, he constantly proclaims locally that Labour party policy will never be put into operation. Indeed, a member of the Shadow Cabinet has said that breaking these contracts, worth millions of pounds, would involve the Government in huge compensation claims, as well as damaging our position as a trading nation. He went on to say:

"I just cannot see a government, which will be looking for every pound that it can get to create new jobs, frittering away money like that."

When a member of the Shadow Cabinet says that the Labour party's policy on nuclear power would be to fritter away money, I think that the whole nation should take note.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Would not the average voter say that if nuclear power stations were not built coal-fired power stations would be needed to provide energy and that at least an equivalent number of jobs would therefore be needed to provide that energy? Is it not curious that the Secretary of State should say that the Opposition ought to provide estimates of the cost of future coal-fired power stations when he cannot provide estimates for the cost of Sizewell? [HON. MEMBERS: "He has done that."] No, he has not. He has not provided the projected costs. Is not the truth of the matter that the Layfield inquiry was set up in 1979 as a kind of sideshow to siphon off the protests of those who were against it, so that the Tory Government could wait until a time such as today to produce this report, because they are in favour of American technology instead of British coal?

Mr. Walker: We are in favour of an energy policy that gives us the same energy efficiency as France, Germany, Japan, the United States and, in future, the Soviet Union. The saddest feature about the hon. Gentleman is that he has only one interest—to see that the energy policy of this country is totally dominated by the National Union of Mineworkers.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I have been listening very closely to my right hon. Friend's answer regarding the need for new coal-fired power stations. When he next sees the chairman of the CEGB, will he remind him that he has a site in Nottinghamshire? We have the coal; we have the productivity; and we have the Union of Democratic Mineworkers.

Mr. Walker: I shall certainly draw the chairman's notice to the remarks of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on reaching his decision, but may I ask him to clarify the impact on job creation that his decision will entail? Will he also use his good offices with the CEGB to urge early orders for further power stations, bearing in mind the need for such stations and the impact that they will have on the power station manufacturing industry, particularly in my area of the country? NEI-Parsons is situated in an area where there is already very high unemployment.

Mr. Walker: I am very well aware of my hon. Friend's concern, because he has been to see me on many occasions to argue the necessity for assistance in the development in those important industries. As for any application that is made by the CEGB as a result of its investigations of various sites for coal-fired power stations, I shall examine that application quickly and, I hope, effectively. On the job implications, about 13,000 jobs will be involved at Sizewell, but in the nuclear industry as a whole we are talking about 150,000 to 200,000 jobs.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his decision will be applauded by many people because he has looked to the time when our fossil fuels will begin to run down quite rapidly? People look forward to security of electricity supplies. Does my right hon. Friend not agree that it comes ill from the Opposition parties, who have been whingeing on about the infrastructure and the need to give work to the construction industry, to complain about his decision?

Mr. Walker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I referred to the longer-term implications at the commencement of these exchanges and said that because we shall lose the benefits of our reserves of oil and gas in the North sea it would be incredible to eradicate a form of energy that is providing one quarter of our electricity supplies. Also in the long term, if the world were persuaded to eradicate nuclear energy, the impact on the Third world would be horrific.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his announcement will be greatly welcomed in the north-west, where so many jobs in the nuclear industry are concentrated, and not least in my constituency where the headquarters of the National Nuclear Corporation are to be found? Does he agree that the consequence of a Government accepting the policy of the Labour party, or indeed the policy of the alliance enunciated by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), to phase out nuclear power would cost up to 1,000 jobs in my constituency and many more thousands throughout the north-west?

Mr. Walker: In fairness to the alliance, my hon. Friend should distinguish between Liberal policy, SDP policy and alliance policy. I think that each constituency will get a choice. On the job consequences for the north-west, I agree with my hon. Friend. I am pleased to say that next week I shall be visiting some of the factories concerned with those jobs.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Rate Support Grants Act 1987
2. Local Government Finance Act 1987
3. Grampian Regional Council (Harbours) Order Confirmation Act 1987.

BILLS PRESENTED

Matrimonial Incomes and Remuneration (Notifications)

Mr. Hugh Dykes presented a Bill to empower and require regular notifications by male spouses of their incomes from all sources to their wives, and where applicable reciprocal notifications by wives in receipt of incomes not emanating from their spouses, and notifications of all or any changes therein: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 8 May and to be printed. [Bill 114.]

Wildlife and Countryside Act (Protection of Birds) (Amendment)

Mr. Harry Cohen, supported by Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Roland Boyes, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Eric S. Heffer and Mr. Peter Pike, presented a Bill to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to extend the protection of captive birds to poultry and to make other povisions relating to captive birds: And the same was read the First time; and orderd to be read a Second time on Friday 27 March and to be printed. [Bill 115.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS &C.

Ordered,

That the draft Advice and Assistance (Assistance by Way of Representation) (Scotland) Regulations 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Ordered,

That European Community Document No. 7969/86 relating to the control of emissions from diesel engines be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

The Arts

5.2 pm

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Luce): I beg to move,

That this House congratulates the Government on the success of its arts policy which is resulting in an expansion of arts and crafts throughout the country and greater protection of the national heritage; approves the Government's strategy of increasing the inflow of funds to the arts from a diversity of sources; welcomes the tax changes, including the new payroll giving scheme, which will stimulate giving to the arts by individuals and companies; applauds the Government's continuing commitment to promoting sponsorship of the arts through the Business Sponsorship Incentive Scheme; endorses the new arts marketing scheme, designed to encourage a keener awareness of the benefits to the arts of good marketing; and acknowledges the political commitment shown by the Government in the form of record levels of public support for the arts.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Luce: This debate in Government time is a demonstration of the importance we attach to the arts. I propose to be as short as possible in order to enable as many people as possible to contribute to the debate.

This debate gives the opportunity to reflect upon the remarkable performance of our arts and crafts in this country, and the greater protection now available for our national heritage. It goes against the grain for the gloom-mongers to admit that anything is going right, but there is now overwhelming evidence of expansion and growth in the arts.

The number of arts centres has virtually doubled to over 300 since we came to power in 1979. British record companies and publishers are booming. Export sales of British books are over £340 million annually and royalties to British record companies from abroad are estimated at $500 million. Reportedly, a new museum opens every fortnight and over 54 million a year now attend the 2,000 or so museums and galleries which this country boasts. Cinema attendances are up 72 million, and are growing. The number of youth theatres in England has soared to over 500, and there has been a healthy development in community and rural touring theatre.

With disposable incomes up substantially since 1979, this should come as no surprise. We are a wealthier society, and people are increasingly investing time and money to enjoy and learn from the rich diversity which the arts offer us. People want something deeper than just the material things of life and are turning to the arts to enrich their lives. As our economic growth continues, interest in the arts will grow too.

Central Government expenditure on the arts has also been rising. In both 1979 and 1983 we gave a firm manifesto commitment to the arts to maintain Government support for the arts. We have honoured that pledge. Central Government expenditure on the arts is up by 15 per cent. in real terms since 1979-80. These are record figures.

If the extra central expenditure following the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils is included, the increase in arts expenditure rises to 29 per cent. The successor local authorities rose to the challenge and came up with a total of some £14 million, more than filling the estimated £10 million gap left by abolition. This was on top of the big increase in the local authority contribution to the arts since 1979 — all a bit embarrassing for the authors of the Opposition amendment.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): My right hon. Friend has referred to the Opposition amendment. The amendment in the name of alliance Members calls for various Departments to be brought together under a supremo Arts Minister. Will my right hon. Friend take it from me, representing the Society of West End Theatre, that the work he does as sponsoring Minister for the Arts, particularly on tax reform, is much appreciated? Will he also accept that a very important measure which will come to the House shortly is the Consumer Protection Bill? Will he undertake to keep a sharp eye on regulation and the code of practice on ticket overcharging, which are crucial to the future of theatre?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said. I know of the work which he does for the Society of West End Theatre. He has repeatedly drawn to my attention some of the society's anxieties. Certainly I undertake to take a close interest in the issue that he has raised.

This year's arts budget was ahead of the overall increase in Government spending in the year, and ahead of projected inflation. We unwound three quarters of the taper for abolition areas, and we can now proceed on an efficient basis with the building of the British library at St. Pancras. It is now reaching its peak years for expenditure, taking just over 6 per cent of my total budget.

There are, of course, always competing priorities within the arts budget. However, the increases I announced this year for the British library construction were specifically not at the expense of the rest of my arts budget. When finally complete, the British library will be a major, modern, national institution of which we shall have the right to be proud. All this must be judged against a broader perspective.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I have listened to what my right hon. Friend has said about the British library. Does he accept that it is getting a disproportionate amount of resources this year? As a consequence it is little wonder that some institutes, such as the British Film Institute, of which I am a governor, feel that they have not been as fairly treated as they might have been and, I think, would have been, had not so many resources been taken by the British library. Surely there must be a better way of funding it.

Mr. Luce: I acknowledge the remarks of my hon. Friend, who does a great deal of excellent work for the British Film Institute. Expenditure on the library project has gone up quite fast because we are getting to a key stage of its construction. As I have said, in the coming financial year it eats into the budget to the extent of just over 6 per cent. The point I sought to make was that we always have problems with competing priorities and that the extra money that I have been able to achieve, which is just under £20 million over the next three years, for the British library is extra and does not come out of the arts budget. I wanted to make that point because it is important for people involved with heritage and the performing arts.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East) rose——

Mr. Luce: The more I give way, the more it eats into the debate.

Mr. Freud: Will the Minister agree that if the money does not come out of the arts budget, it could have gone into the arts budget?

Mr. Luce: I always find the hon. Gentleman, who takes a close interest in the arts, slightly convoluted in his arguments. The point I seek to make is that the extra resources I have been able to raise to enable us to forge ahead efficiently with the British library will come separately from the Treasury and not out of the existing arts budget that I have allocated for next year.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne) rose——

Mr. Luce: I should like to proceed; otherwise it is unfair to other hon. Members who want to contribute to the debate. When I reply, I can pick up any points that have been made.

Our strategy is to encourage the fuelling of the expansion of the arts from a combination of the public and the private sectors. To judge any Government's policy purely on the level of taxpayers' support for the arts—important though that is—shows tunnel vision and is too limited in its approach. Rather, we must look at the global picture, and assess how public money and the tax system together can be used to increase the total of resources flowing into the arts.

We want to achieve two objectives: first, to use taxpayers' money to attract as much money as possible for the arts from other sources; and secondly, to get the best possible value for money from the taxpayers' contribution. It is important that as much as possible of the money voted by this House should reach the arts bodies themselves, and as little as possible be absorbed by administration.

I am very glad that the Arts Council and the RAAs, all of which do an excellent job, are to examine their adminstrative costs. I believe that my own Department, the Office of Arts and Libraries, staffed by only 52 civil servants, offers excellent value for money. What a contrast that is to some of the continental arts bureaucracies

One of the best examples of our approach is the operation of the business sponsorship incentive scheme, which has raised over £11 million of new money, including £3 million of Government money, 70 per cent. of which has gone to arts bodies outside London. Four hundred businesses have sponsored the arts for the first time and 250 existing sponsors have increased their budget.

Business sponsorship in general is rising fast; the total arts slice of this expenditure is now estimated at more than £25 million. I have recently undertaken to continue the scheme for 1988-89.

The opposition parties appear to be lukewarm about business sponsorship and to shy away from commercial support for the arts——

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South) rose——

Mr. Luce: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have a chance to speak in the debate, and I shall certainly respond. I hope that he will let me proceed for a while.

Of course, the contribution that business sponsorship makes is relatively small, but it is growing. Sponsors back a much wider range of activities than some critics suggest —from early music to jazz, from puppet theatre to the Tate gallery. That all adds to the resources available to the arts, and it should be encouraged.

Here is the chance for the Opposition parties to do just that, and to endorse wholeheartedly the principle of arts sponsorship.

Mr. Buchan: Does sponsorship really add to the money available to the arts? Has not the right hon. Gentleman said on at least four occasions that all future development and expansion must come from the private sector; and that his only commitment is to maintain the level of public expenditure? If so, more money will not come into the arts from private sponsors; rather, private sponsorship will be used instead of proper and sufficient public funding.

Mr. Luce: I have great respect for the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot understand how his mind works. We are seeking an overall growth in resources, by whatever means possible, from the private and the public sectors.

My views on the matter are clear. The business sponsorship incentive scheme and the tax reliefs that are available for sponsorsip are ways of adding to overall resources. They are not a substitute for other forms of funding. Indeed, my vision is of the commercial sector working ever more closely in harness with the public sector. There are examples of such partnerships in action in the theatre world. For instance, the Beck theatre in Hillingdon is now being run with much lower subsidies from the ratepayer as a result of a partnership with a commercial organisation, and Apollo Leisure Ltd. has shown similar enterprise in taking over the Empire theatre in Liverpool. That is a principle that could be extended to other local authority theatres.

We are also encouraging arts bodies to help themselves by better marketing. This year I have introduced an arts marketing scheme on an experimental basis to complement the BSIS.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose——

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman must allow me to go on, or the cohesion of my speech will be broken. Perhaps that is the hon. Gentleman's objective.

If it is successful, I shall build on and expand the marketing scheme. After all, the greatest income for the arts comes from the consumer and there is still much unexploited potential for attracting and entertaining audiences. As David Garrick, the great actor-manager said:

"The drama's laws the drama's patrons give
And we that live to please must please to live".

Another element in constructing our framework of opportunity for the arts is our gradual remoulding of the taxation system to encourage an atmosphere of giving. We have reduced the minimum covenanting period from seven years to four. We now give relief to companies for one-off donations. We have established a contingency reserve of about £10 million, taking one year with another, for acceptances in lieu of tax. In April, the payroll giving scheme—give-as-you-earn—will begin, and the arts must take that important opportunity to exploit those reliefs. Most arts bodies have charitable status and are eligible for these benefits, so they must go out and exploit the new scheme to the full.

The momentum of this strategy can be sustained only in an atmosphere where the arts world can depend upon central Government core funding. I have no hesitation in repeating once more that Government expenditure on the arts will be maintained. The success of arts bodies in securing additional private or public funding has not been and will not be penalised by the withdrawal of Government grant. That would be self-defeating.

Furthermore, I recognise the need of the arts for continuity and stability.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: As the right hon. Gentleman is approaching the question of Government funding, I want to make it clear that hon. Members on both sides of the House do not doubt the good intentions of the Minister in his attempts to extract from the Treasury the substantial sums that are needed to reinvigorate the arts. However, we are concerned about the strength of the right hon. Gentleman's dealings with the Treasury in trying to obtain essential funds. He has the support of almost the entire House in trying to obtain more funding for the arts than he has been able to extract so far.

Mr. Luce: I am trying to explain the important role that public funding has in the arts. For the next financial year I have received a 7 per cent. increase in my overall public expenditure, including that for the British library project. I accept that the library project takes up a large part of resources, but there is a 7 per cent. increase in my budget. I do not call that bad. It shows the importance that the Government attach to core funding in the arts.

Earlier, I was discussing the need for stability and continuity in the arts. Major arts institutions need to plan ahead. Like the Government, the Arts Council is now moving towards indicative figures for three-year funding for at least some of its clients, who will therefore be able to make long-term plans on a sounder basis.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) has recently become the Opposition arts spokesman, following the sad demise of his predecessor the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan)——

Hon. Members: He is alive.

Mr. Buchan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I say that my demise is greatly exaggerated?

Mr. Luce: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has been touched by my remarks.

I must say that there seems to be some confusion about Labour party policy for the arts. What is Labour party policy, and what will it cost? Has the hon. Gentleman's party made any advance beyond its tired old concept of the public purse as the milch cow for everything? As for the alliance, its spokesmen may be able to enlighten us as to whether its policy is that expressed in the SDP Green Paper, that in the published Liberal party policy, or that to be found in its latest pronouncement, "The Time Has Come".

With three different policies, the alliance arts approach begins to remind me of the Schleswig-Holstein question. Only three people understood it; one has died, one has gone mad, and the other has forgotten.

There is a remarkable polarisation of views in this country concerning the arts. On the one hand, we have those who do not believe in any taxpayers' support for the arts. On the other, there are some prominent people in the arts world—I choose my words carefully—who assume that the world owes them a living and that Parliament and the Government are simply there to sign blank cheques for them. Such people are undermining their cause. There is a case for public support of the arts, and the arts world should make that case clearly, calmly and rationally.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Will the Minister explain, if the arts and especially ballet and opera are so good, why people who want to go there want to be subsidised to the tune of £20 a seat? If it is that good, people should be prepared to pay the full amount.

Mr. Luce: I know that my hon. Friend holds strong views on this subject and is one of those who represent one of the wings that have been mentioned, but I will say why certain areas of the arts should have public support.

The main reasons for central Government support for the arts are to promote excellence, to make that excellence more available to people around the country, to support our great national institutions—the national museums and galleries—and to foster the seedcorn of future talent. Of course, jobs and tourism are also important, and I do not in the least underestimate that, but the enrichment of the human spirit is the main justification.

John F. Kennedy said:

"The life of the arts, far from being an interruption, a distraction in the life of a nation, is very close to the centre of a nation's purpose, and is a test of a nation's civilisation."

As Arts Minister, I visit as many arts bodies, museums, galleries, libraries and functions as I can—over 200 at the latest count.

I can see for myself the flowering of the arts in this country. I visited the Royal Shakespeare Company. It has just announced its most ambitious programme of productions ever. I visited the British Film Institute. It is opening its new museum of the moving image on the south bank within a year or so, thanks to the support principally of Mr. Getty and the private sector.

I visited Nostell priory in Yorkshire which has been saved by the intervention of the National Heritage Memorial Fund set up by this Government in 1980. This great house, along with many others, is now preserved for the benefit of the nation.

I visited the Ruthin craft centre in north Wales, established with the help of the European Community and the Wales tourist board. It is a fine centre where craftsmen can practise their skills and market their productions at the same time. The national museums and galleries all have exciting plans for the future.

Of the many things I have already seen I will pick out only the Toshiba gallery of Japanese art at the Victoria and Albert, under the imaginative leadership of Sir Roy Strong. We all look forward to the opening of the new Clore gallery at the Tate next month by Her Majesty the Queen. The "Tate in the north" is due to open in Liverpool in 1988.

I visited the Leadmills in Sheffield, a tremendous hive of arts activities for young people, largely financed by the private sector. This arts centre is typical of the vibrancy of the performing arts today.

I have visited a large number of lively arts festivals, so well supported by their local communities, ranging from Edinburgh to Billingham to Brighton.

I visited the Burrell collection and the Kelvingrove collection in Glasgow. They will be centrepieces of Glasgow's European City of Culture celebrations in 1990.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): The Minister has listed places which he has visited. A lot of those places relate to the performing arts, painting, and so on. He knows that I have a great interest in photography. I know that the Minister, at my invitation, visited the photographers' gallery, but he has never intimated that photography is part of the arts world. If the Minister would mention his visit to the photographers' gallery it would do good for our newly formed photographic society and for all the people who are working in the industry.

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the importance of photography which is expanding in this country. I was glad to have had the chance to visit the photographers' gallery.

I urge hon. Members on all sides of the House to back the activities of arts bodies in their own constituencies and to encourage them to take full advantage of the sponsorship incentive scheme and tax changes. Of course there are problems and pressures. They are largely the product of success. The rapid expansion of the arts has led to even sharper competition in claims for resources. There will always be more good causes than the Government can afford to satisfy.

I am impressed by the way that arts organisations are grappling with the challenges and are doing all they can to develop a variety of sources of income. They are determined to use both public and private sector money to expand. This Government are determined to do everything possible to enable them to succeed.

5.26 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'deplores the Government's failure to invest adequately in the arts and media; in particular condemns the Government's budget allocation to the Arts Council of Great Britain for 1987-88 which represents a cut in funding in real terms; regrets that the Government does not appreciate the importance and impact of the arts on the economy and employment, or the true value of arts projects to the regions and communities in those regions, who remain at a relative disadvantage by comparison with Central London; and calls on the Government to take positive steps both to increase and widen the audience for the arts and to promote policies which offer a greater diversity of opportunity for artists and producers, and which widen choice for the audience or consumer.'.

I welcome this debate and applaud the Government for providing the House with an opportunity to discuss the arts. I believe, as far as I can establish from research, that this is the first time in more than 35 years that any Government have tabled a substantive motion on the arts, and I congratulate the Minister. I suspect that this afternoon that will be the last time that I congratulate him. Hon. Members on this side of the House—and, I suspect, some of the Minister's supporters—are baffled over why he managed to persuade the Government to table the motion. We are no wiser, having heard the Minister's speech, because he has nothing new to say.

We have heard the old, tired congratulations of himself and his Government, wrapping the success of artists and companies in the country around the Government's lack of policy. We have heard the Minister referring to a strategy and then failing to mention what that strategy was. The Minister really said nothing. The Government have very little—indeed, nothing—to be proud of in their arts policy. The Minister gave only two new elements of his policy, both of which he had previously announced. The first was the give-as-you-earn payroll scheme, which does not come into effect until next month anyway. He gave no estimate of the possible effect of that scheme. The Minister will find, if he speaks to any director of a regional theatre, that there is great scepticism that even substantial arts clients will benefit much from that scheme.

Mr. Cormack: Is the hon. Gentleman against it?

Mr. Fisher: I am not against it, but I do not think it will solve the problems in the regions. The Minister knows that and was unable to give any estimates.

The other interesting scheme that the Minister noted was the business sponsorship incentive scheme involving comparatively sizeable sums, from £9 million to £11 million of Government money. I am sure that the Minister will agree that, although 70 per cent. of it is spent outside London, the main regions that are benefiting are the south, the south-west, Scotland, the eastern region and the Greater London area. The Minister will recall a book recently published by the Policy Studies Institute on the whole problem of regional imbalance in arts funding. Those five areas take up the lion's share of arts funding, and that imbalance is what "The Glory of the Garden" strategy was seeking to address.

Inevitably, and hardly surprisingly, the business incentive scheme is growing and concentrating in those areas all the resources that have been kindly provided by industry. More than 50 per cent. of the cash goes to those five areas. The Minister must understand that this scheme, although revealing and assisting various interesting projects, far from addressing the imbalance in arts funding, will be increasing the imbalance indirectly and through its own relative success. The Minister must address himself to that problem and be candid enough to recognise that it is a problem.

The Minister referred to the wide range of activities that the scheme is encouraging, but he knows, because he has the figures from the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts, that the main interest is in music and theatre, which account for 237 schemes. Literature accounts for five awards and sculpture for three. Two of those literature awards are in Cheltenham, which is not notably deprived of arts projects and resources. The Minister must understand, if he is being straightforward with the House, that this scheme will be unbalanced both geographically and in the sorts of arts projects that are likely to benefit.

I hope that the Minister will understand that and be more sceptical about the success, in the national perspective, of all our arts and media that will be addressed by that scheme. I thought he might have been providing himself in this debate with an opportunity to announce something substantial and attractive like an easement in the Arts Council grant. That was very optimistic of me, although he would have received congratulations on both sides of the House if he had done so, and we would have welcomed it. I suspect he might have done so, if he had had the nerve and been able to respond to my right hon. Friend and to fight his corner with the Treasury. At this time of year, many budgets are often underspent, through no fault of their own, and sometimes through bad administration.

The Secretary of State for Wales shakes his head. It may not be so in the Welsh Office, but I ask the Minister for the Arts to check with the Secretary of State for the Environment whether English Heritage is not substantially underspent this year to the tune of £9 million.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): The Welsh Office is not underspent, because I have launched the largest programme of arts support ever undertaken in Wales, including the £15 million expansion of the national museum of Wales.

Mr. Fisher: Hon. Members representing Welsh constituencies would be more satisfied if the Secretary of State would do something to save the Sherman theatre in Cardiff. If the right hon. Gentleman will address himself to that, he will receive congratulations from both sides of the House.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): May we take it that Labour Members from Wales are reasonably satisfied, as not one of them is present?

Mr. Fisher: They are probably receiving petitions of anger and despair about the Sherman theatre at this very moment.

Will the Minister look into the rumour—I put it no higher than that—that English Heritage is substantially underspent, and will he lay claim to the funds involved as the Arts Council and the regional arts associations could spend £9 million very constructively?

I thought that the Minister might say something about his arts patronage scheme. On 13 January, when he opened the excellent Royal Academy exhibition of 20th century British art, he said:

"I am exploring the possibility of a modest scheme which will enable government departments to brighten up their working environment by exhibiting promising work by young artists."

Reporting that speech, The Guardian said:

"One idea is for prints of an original work to be made and distributed to those buildings most in need—notably local social security and unemployment benefit offices."

The Minister continued:

"Contemporary art in this country deserves more encouragement from all of us."

The Minister seems to have difficulty recollecting that interesting initiative. What has happened to it? Why was there no reference to it in his speech today? Did he perhaps regret those off-the-cuff remarks at the Royal Academy and tell his civil servants quietly to drop the matter? As on so many other points, the Minister had nothing to say about that today.

The Minister attempted to associate himself and the Government with the popularity and success of artists and their work in this country, but nothing could be further from the truth. Last year, the Arts Council base budget rose from £110 million to £113·8 million. The increase was less than the rate of RPI inflation, so it was cut in real terms, to go with the cut in real terms that the Government have imposed on local authorities and their ability to respond to the arts needs of their communities. It is hardly surprising that the chairman of the Arts Council, Sir William Rees-Mogg, described it as "a blow to the arts in Britain."

That is the truth about Government funding of the arts, but it was not among the success stories described by the Minister.

It is scarcely necessary to weary the House with examples of major arts clients who are doing excellent work but who have either received no increase in funding, due to that cut in real terms, or have had their budgets and their valuable work cut back. Like the Prime Minister, the Minister for the Arts will no doubt say that this is to do with the international climate. He suggested it indirectly when he referred to overweening bureaucracies in other countries and praised his own Department for its leanness and smallness. In fact, comparable countries spend far more on the arts. Italy spends the equivalent of £274 million on subsidised arts. West Germany spends £15·77 per person per year. Sweden spent £24·82 per person in 1980-81. The equivalent figures in this country are £7·20 for England, £6·90 for Wales—[Interruption.] Those are the PSI figures. [HON. MEMBERS: "Too much."] I thought that someone said, "Rubbish." Compared with other countries, they are certainly rubbish figures. The figure for Scotland is £9·30 per person per year. In France, arts funding is 0·86 per cent. of total Government expenditure. In the United Kingdom, it is 0·34 per cent. Why do the British Government, almost uniquely in Europe, refuse to fund the arts as other countries recognise that they should be funded?

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that France boasts a music inspectorate which spends more money and employs more people than does our Arts Council? Does he agree that it is better to have a sparse bureaucracy so that the available money can be spent on the arts?

Mr. Fisher: If that were only true, but the money is simply not there. More money is spent on music in Graz, Austria, than in the entire United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman should appreciate that that is nonsense and that funding for the arts in this country lags behind the rest of Europe where its importance is recognised. It is no wonder that morale among audiences, administrators and artists is at its lowest ebb and that the Government have succeeded in uniting the arts world against them as no other Government have ever done. Artists and administrators are angry at the Government's failure to fund the arts properly.

The Minister referred rather courageously to the British library, but the story is less wonderful than he suggested. The Office of Arts and Libraries, in conjunction with the Property Services Agency, is engaged in the largest civic construction project that this country has seen for years. The Opposition do not dispute that the British library should have a new, unified building, but it is strange coming from a Government who set the value of the public library service so low that 200 public libraries have closed since 1979.

Mr. Luce: Rubbish.

Mr. Fisher: Those are the facts.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I know that the hon. Gentleman has a special interest and expertise in relation to libraries, as I believe that he was chairman of the Staffordshire library committee, but does he regard the cuts to which he has referred as the fault of the Government or the fault of the county councils or library authorities concerned? The amount of money made available has increased, to decreased, but it is a matter of the priorities given to these matters by the library services.

Mr. Fisher: Library committees and chief librarians throughout the country would love to respond to the needs of people using the library services, to provide decent book funds, new libraries and a whole range of new information and services, but they cannot do so. Two hundred libraries have closed, 500 fewer people work in libraries than in 1979 and book funds throughout the country have been cut by 34·2 per cent. although public use of libraries has increased. That is an appalling record and the Minister should be ashamed of it. We await his annual report with interest. I hope that it will be more substantial than last year's puny document.

Mr. Luce: It will be several pages longer.

Mr. Fisher: I hope that they will be pages of apology to people who use public libraries and to the public library service.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman seems not to realise that there are more books in public libraries than there were 10 years ago when the Labour Government were in office. What standards should we be seeking?

Mr. Fisher: It is easy to exchange figures, but the Minister has not responded to those that I have given, from the Library Association, that 200 libraries have closed and that book funds are 34·2 per cent. down on 1979. That is a disgraceful record. If the Minister tries to tell the public library service that he has done well, librarians of all political persuasions throughout the country will disabuse him. Any librarian in the country can tell him that they are strapped for money and for book funds.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is it not a fact that unless librarians go around burning books, even with declining budgets, the number of books will increase? Is not the Government's policy just the political equivalent of burning books?

Mr. Fisher: I agree with my hon. Friend.

The point that we were discussing when we were sidetracked was whether the British library is in safe hands. I believe that the public has a right to expect the Minister's Department, which is responsible, to be competent. Instead we find that in its first two stages the building is £112 million of public money over budget. Even when the Minister has gone back and looked at the accounts, started juggling the figures for VAT, increasing the allowance for inflation, indulging in the creative accounting of which he so disapproves when local authorities indulge in it, it is £25 million over budget. At such a rate, some experts estimate that the building may well cost as much as £1,000 million.

The Minister may say that it is structured in modules so that the Government can withdraw at any stage. I doubt whether that is correct. Will he confirm that the first stage, which is about to be completed, will not have adequate reading room facilities and therefore that it is inevitable that it will have to proceed to stages 1B and 1C? If that is the case, the modular system hardly has any credibility. Also, if that is the case, and stages 1B and 1C are inevitable, why have they not been costed and scheduled? Given that the Minister has lost control of the budget of that amazingly large building, does he not owe it to the House to account for it? It is hardly surprising that the Comptroller and Auditor General is currently looking into the matter. The House will await with some curiosity and apprehension his report on the state of the British library building.

There are other areas that we must deal with, apart from the British library. Perhaps the most immediate and serious is the whole question of museum charges. We have a Government who will not adequately fund museums but are happy to let the natural history museum and three other museums impose charges on 1 April. What a pathetic April fool the Minister is making of himself and his Government. On that day—Conservative Members may not realise this—children who do not happen to have £1 will be turned away from those museums as will pensioners and the disabled who do not have £2 or a family with two children which does not have £6. Is that what the Minister wants? What a disgraceful record.

Is the Minister not aware of the fact that the original charter of the British museum proclaims proudly that its collection is intended "for the use and benefit of the public who may have free access to view and peruse the same."

The public may not do that under this Government, even though charges will cause a slump in attendance. When the national maritime museum in Greenwich introduced charges in 1985, attendance slumped by 36 per cent. The Victoria and Albert museum introduced so-called voluntary charges, although there is considerable pressure on visitors to pay, and it saw attendances drop by 40 per cent. Is that what the Government want? Surely any Government with any sanity would want to widen access, particularly among young people, and increase attendance, but not this Government apparently.

We must accept the fact that we are dealing with a Government who really do not care or value the arts. They have completely failed to address the need to widen audiences or participation in the arts. Black and Asian communities account for 4 million people in our society, and I am glad that the Arts Council is developing a policy to address the needs of that substantial number. In spite of that, they feel that under this Government their arts are arts that Britain ignores, and they have every right to feel that.

The Government's physical and financial neglect of the arts stems from their blinkered view of the arts. For the Minister and the Government the arts remain essentially dance, theatre, opera, orchestral music, sculpture and painting. I was glad to hear the Minister utter the word jazz. I have never heard him say that before. It was good that he recognises that the definition of the arts is a little wider. Jazz may be his personal interest and I am delighted to hear him say so, but I believe that the funding priorities of the Government and everything that the Minister said show an essentially 19th century view of the arts. I would have liked to include literature in the list but, unfortunately, the literature budget of the Arts Council has been cut by 43·6 per cent. in real terms in the past two years.

All the areas of the arts I have mentioned are vital and excellent means of expression and communication. They are the bedrock of our arts, but they ignore the realities of the past 50 years. The arts today encompass publishing, broadcasting, radio, television, video, film, fashion, design and the new technologies of satellite and cable. Every one of us in the House probably watches television and video more often and listens to more records and the radio than we go to live concerts or the theatre.

Mr. Boyes: I was pleased to hear my hon. Friend expand the list of arts areas. However, he concluded his list without mentioning photography. When my hon. Friend becomes the Minister for the Arts after the next election, whenever it may be, will he give me an assurance that he will be mentioning photography in his list in future and supporting it as an important art form in Britain?

Mr. Fisher: I willingly and gratefully accept the admonition from my hon. Friend and I add photography to the list.

Those are the realities of all our lives as individuals and the communities that we are fortunate enough to represent in the House. The independent commercial arts in the commercial sector are as much a part and as vital to our culture as all the subsidised traditional arts. In spite of that, we hear little about them from the Government. They are certainly not included in this Ministry. They should be, but they are not. We see before us not the Minister for the Arts, but the Minister for part of the arts. The Government do not seem to understand the full range and scope of the arts. They are out of tune with the reality of all our lives. They are out of date, and I hope that they will soon be out of office.

The Minister may be beginning to catch a glimmer of that in his understanding. He has recently commissioned, as he told the House, a study of arts economics. It indicates —I hope that it is true—that he is beginning to become aware of the fact that the arts are not a drain on the Treasury but are a plus. The arts are a major industry and employer. To see just how major he can look at many of the studies that are being produced. "The Economic Influences of the Arts in Cornwall" is being produced by Cornwall county council and South-West arts. "The Economic Importance of the Arts on Merseyside" was produced last year by Merseyside arts.

The institute of employment research at Warwick university had a recent study which showed that libraries, arts and sports will be the fastest growing area of employment in the next 10 years, increasing by 30 per cent. The Minister's own study will, or should, show him that estimates of arts-based tourism may be as high as £5,000 million a year. The arts employ literally hundreds of thousands of people in our community. The payback from the arts in VAT, national insurance and income tax to the Treasury probably means that the subsidised arts cost the country virtually nothing. Therefore, when the Minister says that he cannot afford to increase the subsidised sector of the arts, he misunderstands the economic impact of the arts and their industrial importance.

I was glad to hear the Minister refer, for the first time that I have known him do so, to the export earnings of the record industry in 1985 being $495 million. The same is true of the publishing industry which this year will top £2,000 million turnover and which last year had a net surplus in exports of £550 million. When our deficit on balance of trade in manufactured goods may well top £8,000 million this year, that is an area of our industrial life and economic activity that has a substantial surplus and is growing. The Minister would do well to remember that and, when responding to my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyme (Mr. Sheldon) in taking his case to the Treasury, I recommend that he presses that point because I doubt whether there is a single Department of State in the Government that is in balance of trade surplus in that way.

The next Labour Government will recognise those realities and bring together not only arts and libraries, museums, galleries and crafts, but bring with them publishing, photography, film, press, video, satellite and radio in one unified ministry for the arts and media. Our policies——

Mr. Buchan: Will my hon. Friend repeat his last sentence, because I was sacked for saying it?

Mr. Fisher: I willingly repeat it, and hope that the thunderbolt does not descend upon me, and that I do not reach a demise, in the Minister's terms.

Our policies will make a priority of widening the audience for such activities. They will make a priority of increasing choice for the audience and the consumer; of widening opportunities for the artist or producer; of ensuring that the freedom of expression and independence of the artists and producers is paramount; of devolving arts activities to the regions and to communities within those regions; of opening up our airwaves to community radio; of re-regulating television to increase the access of independent producers; and of establishing a British screen authority to give a firm foundation to an indigenous British film industry. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnston Smith) is not in his place, because I know that he has expressed an interest in the British film industry and the BFI.

Above all, we shall make the arts and media for the first time a statutory responsibility for local authorities and provide an element in the rate support grant to finance those activities. That step more than any other will transform the arts in the communities that we represent, and in regions throughout the country. Conservative Members have often said in the last few months that they support a devolution of the arts from central London. I hope that when we introduce those policies in the next Parliament they will back them to ensure that communities can respond to the needs that they undoubtedly have.

The Minister asked how much it would cost. No doubt Conservative Members are using their calculators—the technology may even come to them—and are also asking, "Where is the money coming from?" But, unlike this Government, we shall ensure that the money will come——

Mr. Luce: Where from?

Mr. Fisher: If the Minister will restrain himself for a moment, he will hear where the money is coming from.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): The IMF?

Mr. Fisher: That is not one of the Arts Council's clients.

Unlike the alliance, we shall not get the money from tax incentives. The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has talked about the arts a good deal recently outside the House, now that he is beginning to understand that there are votes in the arts. However, interestingly, he has never spoken about arts in the House, certainly not in this Parliament. Sadly, he is not in his place today. He may be in Truro, counting his votes before they are cast.

The right hon. Gentleman said in a speech to the SDP arts session in February 1986:

"What the arts need is a tax incentive structure similar to that in the USA."

Like so much of what the right hon. Gentleman says, it was sadly ill-informed. Perhaps he should stick to subjects which he knows about something. Clearly, he knows absolutely nothing about the arts. I am more generous than my hon. Friends; I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman must know something apart from his own undoubted good looks, on which he is an expert, because he gazes at them every day. Our arts need a United States-type tax system like a hole in the head. It is a system which every year sees major orchestras, opera houses, theatres and festivals go bankrupt. Last year, in California alone, the Oakland symphony orchestra and the San Diego orchestra went into liquidation because of that wonderful tax incentive scheme that alliance Members so praise and laud.

Mr. Freud: Oh, no.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. Member says, "Oh, no." We have another alliance split. The Liberal party says, "Oh, no," and the right hon. Member for Devonport says, "Oh, yes." As the Minister says, it is difficult to know what the alliance stands for on any subject.

Mr. Dicks: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the orchestras had to close down because people did not want to pay an economic price to listen to them play?

Mr. Fisher: Now we have a Tory split. Again, the public will not know whom, to believe—the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) or his right hon. Friend. They will be confused. At least the Labour party has a credible policy. I am sure that my hon. Friends will agree that the party is solidly and proudly united behind that policy.

The Secretary of State for Wales—I am glad that he is still in his place, and I appreciate his attendance—asked where the money was coming from. Our funding will come from a wide variety of sources. Some will come from central Government on the basic arts budget. There will be a new one-off capital fund for housing the arts, because so many of the arts buildings in our constituencies are in a dire state of repair. Money will come from the rate support grant, and from local authorities responding to the needs of their communities. It will also come from audiences and from the public, and an expansion of arts provision will lead to expanded income for arts clients.

The money will also come from private investment. We shall encourage local authorities to support the arts in a wide and plural way, not only through grant and subsidy as at present but through loans, investment and underwriting of activities. Local authorities will act not only as providers through grant and subsidy, but as enablers of activities. If Conservative Members wish to complain about that, I shall be interested to give way to any of them. There will be a substantial increase: they will see how substantial it will be.

While this Government persist in their blinkered approach that the arts are just the subsidised arts—and very badly subsidised at that—their priorities are wrong. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) has been very quiet. No doubt he will soon be talking about military bands. He has done such a superb job for military bands that they are funded by the Government to the tune of £48 million a year. There can be no hon. Member who represents a constituency so superbly as the hon. Gentleman, who has succeeded in getting £48 million for his own peccadillo while the rest of the music world longs for such funding. Under this Government, because of the ingenuity of artists and administrators, the arts will survive. But that is no thanks to the Government, and opportunities will be lost.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): At a conference on the arts last week, the hon. Gentleman spelled out the Labour party's policy in some detail. One of the planks that he gave his audience was that spending on the arts would be doubled. Is it not interesting that he has not repeated that pledge today? Or has he abandoned it already?

Mr. Fisher: The hon. Gentleman was in attendance at that conference for only a few minutes. The conference was organised by the Arts Council but, apart from a speech by the Minister, it was sadly ignored by Conservative Members. The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) gave some figures for our spending plans, but I did not, although I talked about a substantial increase. The hon. Gentleman's memory has played him false.

The arts need from the Government not only funding —even in its present inadequate form—but a lead. It is interesting that yet again — the Minister and I have debated this in the past—there has been no vision from the Government. We heard about strategy, but the only words that I could grasp that had anything to do with strategy were that the Minister would ensure continuity and stability. What a sterile and depressed lead that is to give to the arts. All that he is offering is continuity and stability — the continuity of more cuts, I suspect, and more reduced funding.

The arts and the media are our means of expressing and defining our culture and ourselves as individuals. They are a means of criticising and challenging our values, our beliefs and the way in which we see each other. They are the most concentrated way that we as a nation can express what we believe in, what inspires us and provokes us, what reminds us of our past and gives us hope for the future. That is a word that the Minister could not offer. He could not offer any hope to the arts. We live in a society with very little hope because of the new realism that has been forced on it by the Prime Minister.

We are faced with a depressing and bleak future. However, there is an alternative. People's opinions are important. They can be expressed and the arts give a chance for communities and individuals to express themselves, to define their culture and their relationship to each other and to give them some hope, dignity and possibility for the future. The arts cannot do that while the Government are here and refuse to fund audiences or artists in expressing those hopes for the future. Under a Labour Government, the arts will be able to begin to do that, and will do that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. This is a short debate and short speeches might be appropriate.

6 pm

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I will try to obey your injunction, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, first on behalf of all hon. Members, I should congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on a maiden speech from the Opposition Front Bench. Rarely has there been such a maiden speech containing a string of perorations interspersed with a mass of contradictions. Conservative Members have a fond affection for the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central because we still hold his father in the highest regard. When the hon. Gentleman speaks, he still betrays that he is a little bit of a chip off the old block. His courtesy and the real demonstration that he was not educated at Grange Hill endear him to us.

The strength of arts policy over the years has been the fact that it is largely bipartisan. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central went a long way towards destroying that this afternoon. However, on one point I can go along with him. There is a measure of agreement on both sides of the House with the recommendations on museum charges made by the Select Committee on Education, Science and the Arts in 1981-82. That all-party Select Committee report expressed the view that charging was acceptable, but that there should be certain categories of exemption. It should be up to individual institutions and their trustees to decide whether charges should be made, but it believed that the categories to which the hon. Gentleman referred should be exempt.

I want to thank and congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister not just for ensuring that we have the first debate, as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central said, for some 35 years on a substantive Government motion on the arts, but also for what he has done in battling valiantly in difficult times. He has not achieved all that I should have liked him to achieve, but, by Jove, he has achieved a great deal.

All Conservative Members can be modestly proud of the Government's record. At the risk of wearying the House — I shall not cite more than two or three examples—we should remind ourselves of some of the milestones that have, with all-party support, been erected during the past eight years: for example, the creation of the National Heritage Memorial Fund, which was a very significant achievement, and the transformation of the Historic Buildings Council and the Ancient Monuments Commission into the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission, again with all-party enthusiastic support and a very much bigger budget. We must also remember the Government's response to the recommendations in the Select Committee report on the in lieu provisions. We now have a much more satisfactory and workable solution to that problem.

I can point to a specific example in my constituency. The Government have saved Weston Park, one of the most gracious and elegant English country houses which, because extra money was made available a year ago, has now been saved, with its contents, for the nation. A private trust has been set up so that Weston Park can continue to be enjoyed and seen by many people.

All these are significant achievements and my right hon. Friend the Minister has been particularly successful in generating extra enthusiasm for the whole concept of business sponsorship.

However, it would be churlish if, in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Minister, we did not remember that he is the fourth Minister for the Arts in the past eight years. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas), my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), the present Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and the noble Lord, Lord Gowrie made significant contributions. Their work has been widely recognised and welcomed. They succeeded Ministers from previous Labour Governments who also made notable contributions. The right hon. Baroness Lee, whom I had the good fortune to defeat in 1970 to become a Member of this House, was the first Minister for the Arts. I always like to think that we have a strong bond between us in our common love of the arts. Baroness Lee, Lord Donaldson and others, have, in an all-party sense, made their contributions.

When we consider the subject, we are bound to agree that there has been an advance since the Select Committee took evidence in 1981 from Sir Kenneth Cork, the then chairman of the Royal Shakespeare theatre. He said:

"The very small call we can make on the National purse in terms of the economy as a whole is justified because of the dividends we bring to the country's economy through the expenditure of people coming to the theatre, and outside the theatre, but Her Majesty's Government does not recognise this, and appears to look upon us as a lunatic charity."

We have come some way since then. There has been real progress and Sir Kenneth would be unlikely to make that statement if he came before a Select Committee of the House now.

Not that that means that all is well or that everything is right. My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to the British library and the money that he has been able to extract from the Treasury—would it were more. The fact is that money spent on the arts is about the most cost-effective of Government spending. People who talk about subsidies in disparaging terms make me very angry. In the German states the prince provided money to enable the opera to flourish in his state, and in the 19th century donations were made by rich people in this country to the arts and a similar thing happened in the United States. Indeed, there has never been a time when the box office has paid for everything and there has never been a time when great collections have been amassed without donations from individuals or Governments.

There is a real need for sizeable contributions from central and local government. That need will remain. My right hon. Friend the Minister has recognised that. I am particularly glad that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is present. All Conservative Members are very sorry that he is not standing at the next general election because he has done more for the arts in the Principality than any other Secretary of State for Wales. The Principality will, for generations to come, have cause to be thankful for what he has been able to spend in the Principality from public funds. He is rightly proud of that, as we all are.

Having said that, I want to be mildly critical, because many things still remain to be done. As I have said, arts spending is the most cost-effective way of spending public money and the returns are enormous. The budget in national terms is minuscule and we could do with more money. I hope, for instance, that very shortly the Minister will be able to ensure that the Royal opera house can go ahead with one of the most imaginative plans that it has been my good fortune to see for a very long time. It will rely very largely on private funding, but it also needs ministerial support, blessing and encouragement. I hope that my right hon. Friend will refer to it, if only briefly, when he replies.

The all-party arts and heritage group visited the Royal opera house just before Christmas and we were all very excited by its plans. That underlines the aspect of consensus. However, I was slightly surprised at the rebuke delivered by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central to the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) in absentia.

When we produced the Select Committee report in 1982, we had all-party support, ranging from the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Brinton). That spans a wide political spectrum. The Committee included Mr. Christopher Price as Chairman. We all called for some American-style concessions. I hope that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central has got it wrong, just as I hope that he got it right when he talked about policy for which the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), whom we all miss, was sacked from the Labour Front Bench.

I should like now to consider some of the things that need to be done. I shall single out a few of the Select Committee's recommendations which were made several years ago but which have not been properly recognised. We called for the creation of a "Ministry for the Arts, Heritage and Tourism . . . to absorb the work of the Office of Arts and Libraries and to concentrate in the hands of one minister of Cabinet rank all central government responsibility for the arts, libraries, film, broadcasting, heritage and tourism."

That was an all-party recommendation. Of course, it does not lie with my right hon. Friend to implement that recommendation. It would be discourteous and ridiculous in the extreme to rebuke him for the fact that it has not been implemented. I hope that he will convey to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister the fact that many hon. Members still believe that that is the right way forward.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman remind the House how many recommendations were in the Select Committee report and how many of them have been implemented by the Government?

Mr. Cormack: The hon. Gentleman has anticipated my next remark. I was going to make the point that there were 77 recommendations. How many have been implemented is an impossible question to answer with total precision because bits of recommendations have been adopted.

Mr. Buchan indicated assent.

Mr. Cormack: The hon. Gentleman is nodding vigorously. Some of the recommendations have been adopted more or less in their entirety—such as the in lieu recommendations — but many others could be implemented to the benefit of the arts in general.

Although my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts has started to report to the House, the reports are not quite of the length and detail which we had in mind in annual arts White Paper for which we called.

The Select Committee said that six months' formal notice should be given to an arts organisation if there was to be a significant alteration to its level of public grant. If that recommendation were implemented, it would relieve the anxiety of many people. My right hon. Friend the Minister has made statements from which I infer that he is sympathetic to that approach. I hope that we shall move quickly in that direction.

I do not wish to prevent other hon. Members from taking part in the debate by making too long a speech; I do not want to follow the example of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. In recommendation 29 the Select Committee said:

"The skill and expertise of the Crafts Council should be called upon by the Manpower Services Commission when devising schemes for the training of the unemployed and of young apprentices."

It is time that the crafts were given a proper recognition. There is nothing demeaning about following a craft—indeed, quite the opposite; there is everything noble and proper about doing so. The way in which we almost look down upon those who work with their hands, as distinct from those who apparently work with their brains, does none of us any credit. To be a craftsman, one must have an intuitive sense and a keen brain. I have been involved in helping to persuade one or two organisations with which I have a connection to sponsor a new craft fellowship scheme called the William Morris craft fellowship. This year, we have selected four young people —three men and one woman—who will follow a course for six months and learn a range of new crafts. We hope that they will become leaders in their companies and not merely supervisors but high-grade supervisors who, by their infectious enthusiam, make others want to follow the crafts.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman join me in hoping that those people also become Socialists, like William Morris?

Mr. Cormack: If William Morris were alive today, he would not recognise on the Opposition Benches the ideals for which he strove. The hon. Gentleman left himself open to that comment.

I hope that the Government will realise that, in supporting the crafts, they will be doing many things. After all, all the grants through the heritage memorial funds and elsewhere are of little benefit unless there are the craftsmen to do the restoration and people who have skills to pass on to future generations. A great deal of public money could be used profitably—I mean "profitably" in every sense—in encouraging young people to go into the crafts, working in environments that could only help to uplift them.

I trust that my right hon. Friend the Minister will have early discussions with my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and others to ascertain what can be done to encourage more people to go into the crafts —not just young people but those who find themselves unemployed later in life. They often can learn a craft or skill and so bring back a new meaning, purpose and hope to their lives. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central talked about hope. This is a good example of where one can bring hope to individuals.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I have listened with interest to my hon. Friend. I share his view on the importance of encouraging good craft training. Does my hon. Friend feel that the new city technology colleges might offer the opportunity to establish centres of excellence in craft training? That might be among their strengths.

Mr. Cormack: I certainly would not rule that out, but I must admit that that idea had not occurred to me. This is not to decry the concept, but I would much rather that money were put into cathedral workshops and such places to build true craft centres in an environment in which young people have the very best of the past all around them, and the challenge and vision that that presents.

I wish to obey the injunction to make short speeches, so I shall not continue much longer. We have much to be pleased about, although nothing to be complacent about. I am glad that, at the end of the debate, it is unlikely that there will be a major Division. That is good because certain issues transcend petty party differences. Since the war, there has been reasonable consensus which was only challenged—jokingly, I hope—by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central.

Mr. Buchan: The hon. Gentleman is almost right. It is true that there has been bipartisanship between the hon. Gentleman and two or three others, but there is a big division when it comes to that bunch of moronic philistines on the Conservative Benches with whom he has associated.

Mr. Dicks: Quite right.

Mr. Cormack: I gather from noises off that my hon. Friend accepts that rebuke as a compliment, but I think that the majority of my hon. Friends do not. The Government do not deserve that stricture. No Government are perfect in all respects of their policy. Although I have not been backward in criticising the Government from time to time, I believe that we have made significant achievements in the heritage and the arts, and my right hon. Friends the Minister for the Arts and the Secretary of State for Wales and all their colleagues have every reason to be proud of them. I congratulate them on what they have done.

6.18 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I too, congratulate the Government and thank them for this debate—the first in 35 years, which is longer than some of us have been Members. I should like to take up one point made by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack). He said that he hoped that there would not be a major Division. I do not know what a "major" or "minor" Division is, but a motion

> "That this House congratulates the Government on the success of its arts policy" must be resisted by all those who feel that the Government deserve scant congratulations on their arts policy.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is it not a major division when the Liberal party wants to abolish the Arts Council and the SDP wants to retain it?

Mr. Freud: I am sorry that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, but it was right for him to ask the question. I shall deal with it later in my speech. On something as fundamental as self-congratulation on an arts policy, those who feel that congratulations are not due have a duty to vote against the motion, which bemuses me.

I had lunch today with the great and good Lord Goodman and he asked me, "What is happening in your House this afternoon?" I explained this motion to him and told him that the Prime Minister headed the cast list of those who supported it. He said, "I hope that the Prime Minister has taken out thunderbolt insurance." One cannot blame Lord Goodman's sentiments, for it would be hard to find any director of films, theatre or museums who felt that the Government deserved congratulations on the success of their arts policy — not Sir Peter Hall, David Puttnam, or Sir Roy Strong. Not infrequently I meet the Minister at arts venues and he knows that there is little admiration for his Government's policies. I am saying not that the arts are unable to look after themselves, but that they deserve more support than they are currently getting.

I do not wish to personalise, but when one looks at the names on this motion—the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—one realises that it is not exactly a list of supporters of the arts. The Minister is lucky to have got into the list in sixth place. It would have been depressing had he been left out altogether.

[Mr. Freud]

We are probably the only country in which the office of Minister for the Arts is combined with the office of Minister of State, Privy Council Office. That is as unrealistic as having one person in charge of the police and broadcasting—which, of course, we also have.

I should like to talk about the policy of the alliance. We have frequently said that we should create a broadly based Ministry of the Arts and give parliamentary responsibility not only for photography, but for films, theatre, broadcasting and recreation to one Cabinet Minister instead of making those things the less favoured responsibility of the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of the Environment, the Home Office and the Department of Education and Science.

The Minister had his little weekly rent-a-joke at the expense of Liberal policy, SDP policy and alliance policy. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) wanted to know why one of the parties in the alliance was originally in favour of an Arts Council while the other one was not. The difference in opinion was quite simply on the constitution of the Arts Council. Both parties in the alliance were totally in favour of the arm's-length principle.

Both parties wanted an Arts Council that was better funded and more reactive and that spent more money outside London than in it. Whether this was to be a boosted regional authority or a stronger London base was a matter upon which, until we became an alliance, we had our own separate arts policies. We did not publish our alliance policy until "The Time Has Come" came out in January. The Minister spoke about that publication and has possibly read it.

The problem with the Government's arts policy is its short-termism. We have suggested that there should be endowments to provide long-term stability rather than have our arts staggering from crisis to crisis, which is what is the current scene. That would avoid theatres and centres of art having to spend money at the end of the financial year so that the cupboard is bare when the following year's application is made. I know that similar spending occurs in many constituencies where at the end of the financial year all the council houses suddenly have their front doors painted in a new colour because there is no other way to incur instant expenditure and to exhaust the budget before applying for more money.

If arts funding were properly planned, the rewards would be given to saving money and not to spending it. That is crucial. Our policy, which is enshrined in print, would be to double in real terms the funding of the arts over the lifetime of our first Parliament. We are greatly in favour of sponsorship when it comes along, but one must accept, as the Select Committees accepted over the years, that sponsorship can only ever provide a small percentage of the money that is needed by the arts. Sponsorship is the sizzle, but it can never be the steak.

A system of public domain royalties as practised in Italy and France is attractive. Under that system a playwright or an author, when he comes out of copyright, does not immediately allow his work to be used or published without payment. We hope to introduce a system whereby for a play that is out of copyright the royalties, at a lower percentage if the artist is dead, could go into the public domain and be used for the training and support of young people seeking to pursue a career in music, the theatre, or whatever it was that the out-of-copyright artist created.

I should like to speak about centres of excellence in which the authors and directors currently seem to make much more money than the centres, which take all the risks. I do not for one moment accuse Trevor Nunn or Sir Peter Hall of making more money out of "Les Liaisons Dangereuses" or "Amadeus" than was earned by the theatre, but we are persuaded to emulate the terms of contract currently given to the directors of museums.

If the director of a museum, who is a well-paid civil servant, writes a book or makes a speech while he is a director, the moneys go to the theatre or museum that he represents.

Mr. Buchan: I am not at all sure that the hon. Gentleman has got that right. It is possible if it is like the recent cases in connection with the Ashmolean museum or in relation to the Burrell collection that was sought by the curator, but those cases are different. If someone like Sir Michael Levey writes a book, as Sir Michael has done recently, on an arts subject, he will receive the copyright royalty payments in the same way as anyone else. Surely the crucial thing about the dramatic producer is that he helps part of the creative process and, to the extent that his production is part of the creative process, I am perfectly happy to allow an element of copyright to remain with him in addition to the payment for his work as a professional director.

Mr. Freud: I do not contradict what the hon. Gentleman says. Even in the best of all worlds one cannot introduce retrospective legislation. It is right that if somebody is well paid and has the interest of his centre of excellence at heart, what he does during the time that he is under contract should substantially benefit his place of work.

The Minister has talked about the British library's extra grant of £20 million. I am concerned about that. The library has harmed the other museums and libraries in that they too could have done with that support. The Minister will have some trouble justifying the emergency payment, for I have yet to meet anyone who knows enough about it. What will be the running costs? What will be the number of staff and on what sort of contracts will they be? I am enthusiastic about the British library, but I am concerned that an awful lot of money is being used that would otherwise be available to the arts at large.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has made an important policy statement and I want to make sure that I understand it. Is he saying that it is alliance policy that the director of an institution, such as a museum or the National theatre, would not be able to have any earnings through his writings or his other creative talents? That is a revolutionary step if the hon. Gentleman is really suggesting it.

Mr. Freud: I can tell the unrevolutionary right hon. Gentleman that there are many contracts in which museum directors are not paid for such work, and the royalties that they receive while directors of the museum go to their museum. I was simply stating that this is something of which I would approve.

When I was education spokesman, I used to argue that the microcosm of Liberal education policy was the Open university, in which there is something for everyone; one can be young or old, well or handicapped, a city dweller or living in the country. The Open university gives people a chance and then a second chance and is a marvellous instance of what our education policy is about.

Now that I speak for the arts, I feel that the Edinburgh festival is something that should be looked at with care and consideration, because in Edinburgh during the festival good things happen that should be happening in the arts around the land. The local authorities are helpful, the landladies are co-operative and there are fewer housing problems because people support the Edinburgh festival. There may be specific problems, but what we see in Edinburgh, is good. The city embraces the arts—music, orchestra, ballet, opera, concerts, theatre, people dancing in the streets—and lets them perform in waiting rooms that are not needed.

Not only should we give such encouragement to the arts. We must create a climate in which the arts can flourish and we have to accept the people who take part in the arts as respected members of the community. Perhaps that is where we are most wrong. In France, Germany or Italy, a competent itinerant musician is a respected member of the community. He can get a mortgage, borrow money and have a bank account. Such things are extraordinary difficult in this country for artists because we treat artists of quality as if they were itinerants first, artists second. That is the wrong attitude.

There are items to be welcomed in the motion. One should not spend one's entire speech knocking it. I welcome the sponsorship scheme, although there is something ugly about congratulating oneself on having found other people to discharge one's responsibility. I quite welcome the marketing scheme, although I am sorry that the limit is £10,000, so that it is confined to people who can produce half of that—£5,000. On the whole, those who most need marketing are probably those who least have £5,000.

An alliance Government would look at the basements of national galleries and museums and consider raising money for the living arts from the dead wood that is often so expensively preserved from death watch beetle. We would make it a duty on developers to spend 1 per cent. of their development costs on arts-related projects, be it sculptures, painting or proscenium stages. We would look at the millions of pounds that should go to the arts but find their way into Christie's and Sotheby's. The latter employs the former Arts Minister, who could not cope on his Government salary, at a salary of £150,000 a year, mostly from money made by commission on selling bits of our national heritage.

While we are cleaning up the City, it might be time to clean up the arts market, because nowhere will one find more laundering of money than takes place in the big arts auction houses. It is absurd that, while the City is trying to identify holders of small percentages of company equities, the identity of people who buy a £7 million painting can remain anonymous.

There is no lack of energy in the arts. The apathy and lack of understanding come from the Government and from local government, which is often unco-operative and unsympathetic. The Treasury insists on taxing the performing arts and slowly killing the goose that lays such golden eggs. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), with whom I debated theatre subsidy some weeks ago, is plain that he is against subsidy and has never found any good reason for it. Let me try to give him one good reason.

The town of Leicester has a brilliant theatre. Last year, it produced the musical "Me and My Girl", which was an outstanding success. The theatre is a client of the Arts Council and is well subsidised by the local authority. "Me and My Girl" could have run commercially for nine months, if not a year. However, is it right for a local theatre to receive money and present to the local people the same successful musical month after month? It is right that after a month or two a successful show should be taken off and replaced by other plays so that the same people can go to the same local theatre and witness other interesting productions.

Mr. Dicks: Would the hon. Gentleman take the same line if Leicester city football club, whose games are watched by many thousands of people, were in poor financial straits? Would he be advocating that the local authority or the Arts Council be subsidising that? My guess is that he would be saying no, because he would expect the club to survive on getting people to come into the ground and pay the economic cost. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Freud: By combining the arts and recreation, which an alliance Government would hope to do, all the responsibilities for civil entertainment would be under the same Minister. He would look with as much compassion at an ailing football club as he would at an ailing theatre. The criterion would be quality and the wishes of the participating community.

Mr. Tony Banks: I suppose that there is something appropriate about "Me and My Girl" running for nine months, but does not the hon. Gentleman feel that a good performance of "Me and My Girl", like "Guys and Dolls" at the National theatre, has a great deal to commend it?

Mr. Freud: That is absolutely so, but it is wrong in one location in which there is a dearth of theatres and a substantial number of people who want to go to see a variety of theatrical productions.

An alliance Government would look with great care at the creation not just of enterprise zones for industry, but of enterprise zones for the arts. There is no reason why, for instance, key housing should not be given to an important artist — or photographer — rather than to someone who has a key job in industry. In our amendment we talk of the Government tinkering, and we use that word deliberately because there is not one decent, cohesive, long-term policy that will do more for the arts than save the Government short-term embarrassment.

There is no promise to legislate against philistine local authorities, which seem to be legislated against in respect of all other shortcomings. We are now on our fifth local government Bill. I would welcome a Bill which forced local authorities to contribute to the well-being, via the arts, of their people. I would welcome a Bill that realistically protected authors' and composers' copyright. I am convinced that in the Government's eyes the arts has a low position on the totem pole; it is our intention to raise that and put this in its proper place.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): I was intrigued to hear about the lunch conversation that the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) had with my friend Lord Goodman. I was further intrigued by the advice that he gave to be passed on to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister about thunderbolts and insurance. Today, I lunched with no fewer than seven bishops, including the Bishop of Durham—I have not taken out any insurance—and here I stand about to make quite a gentle speech.

Being a gentle man and not having been at Oxford this afternoon—that is why the House is so empty—I might have put down an amendment, although I am quite sure that it would not have been called. It would not have been all that critical, but I would have said in that amendment that the House regretted that the Government had not felt able to find more money for the arts, but would promise to do better next time. That is not to say that I do not congratulate my right hon. Friend on what he has achieved. I shall not go over the catalogue of what has been achieved because it has been said well enough, even by the Opposition spokesman, and certainly by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack).

We must guard against the danger of neglecting the arts. We would be neglecting one of our greatest assets if we did that. We have achieved a lot in painting, sculpture, literature, drama, opera, ballet——

Mr. Boyes: What about photographers?

Mr. Crouch: —in television and in the art of photography. We have helped ourselves a lot in the process. We have earned respect, we entertain our visitors, we entertain ourselves, we earn currency and we pay the Government a lot in taxes. We put too much tax on those who attend theatrical performances. We pay a good return to the Government by attracting visitors to Britain, and pay a good return in reviving ourselves. The arts are entertainment, and life without entertainment is very dull. It is necessary to revive ourselves by a flourishing business of art in our lives.

We have given ourselves a pride in our achievements, our great works of art and great performers in the arts over many years. Even in recent years this is so. I mention just a few names—Henry Moore, Michael Tippett, Graham Sutherland, John Piper, David Hockney, Benjamin Britten, Andrew Lloyd-Webber, Laurence Oliver, Peggy Ashcroft, the Redgraves. I mention all the Redgraves, even the latest grand-daughter of Michael Redgrave, who is now performing in a star role in London. It is wonderful how our theatrical families continue the great tradition and heritage of acting which we, perhaps alone in the world, possess above any other nation.

Other great names have been mentioned this afternoon —Peter Hall and Trevor Nunn. We owe a great deal to them. We may criticise them because they criticise us, but it is a free country. It is reasonable for artists and people in the theatre to have a view, even on the financing of the arts.

Another great name was Margot Fonteyn. I remember seeing her dancing Swan Lake and afterwards being taken to see her with a friend, who was a great friend of hers, in her dressing room—a minute dressing room—which still exists today for the great stars at Covent Garden. Members of Parliament complain about the space that is given to them when they come to this place for the first time. They should see where Placido Domingo sits or where Margot Fonteyn sat—a tiny little room for some of the greatest entertainers in the world. I hope that that will be put right when the rebuilding and redevelopment programme of the Garden takes place.

I should mention too, because there are Welshmen somewhere in the House I hope—of course there are, the Secretary of State for Wales is present—the great Sir Geraint Evans, who is one of our greatest opera stars. I shall mention, last but not least, a great opera singer who celebrated her 95th birthday this week, Dame Eva Turner. [Interruption.] I do want to get on. Does the hon. Gentleman want to mention another name?

Mr. Boyes: The hon. Gentleman has read out a list of names of great performers in their chosen field of art. I am sure that it was an oversight on the part of the hon. Gentleman that he did not mention any of the great photographers. Britain has made a great contribution to photography, not only through the artists, but also through the industry. I hope that he will include Bill Brandt, Julia Margaret Cameron and others in his list.

Mr. Crouch: I shall treat the House to a little anecdote. After my lunch with the bishops I joined the chairman of a great publishing house, Collins, together with the chairman of another great publishing house, Navostiof Moscow. They were celebrating an initiative for 100 photographers to go to the Soviet Union. On 15 May those 100 photographers, in the 15 states of the Soviet Union, will be taking photographs for 24 hours to record what will be called, "A day in the life of the Soviet Union". Having said that, I hope that I have put to rest this question of discussing photography for the rest of the debate.

I want to confine myself to the theatre and the state of it. I shall use a quotation and state where it comes from in a moment.

"Theatre is one of Britain's greatest cultural assets. It brings economic benefit to the country. It is a key element in the international prestige of a nation. It enlightens, informs and refreshes, every year, at least one in every three people in the country in its live form and many more in its televised and film forms . . . It supports the work of industrialists and businessmen by enhancing the reputation of our country."

That is the quotation of a business man, Sir Kenneth Cork, in the Cork report, "Theatre is for All", which came out in September 1986. It is a business man's and accountant's report about the significance of the theatre in our society today. It is all about safeguarding our theatrical heritage.

I speak as the deputy chairman of the Theatres Trust, established by me by private Member's Bill in 1976 and extended by another private Member's Bill by me in 1978 to Scotland. The Cork report refers to the need to maintain the fabric of our theatres. The Theatres Trust exists to protect theatres from destruction and demolition to make way for offices, factories, shops or road programmes or to be converted into other uses.

The Theatres Trust has to be consulted by the local authorities and neither they or developers, can proceed without doing so. We have built a barrier of protection for British theatres. It is a matter of great pride to me that I was able to play a part in establishing a trust so strong and valuable to safeguard Britain's theatre today.

The Theatres Trust seeks to prevent theatres being converted to other uses, except for temporary uses such as dance halls, restaurants, discos and bingo. Such temporary uses do not rob the theatre of its real function—the performance of live theatre. If an owner or a developer wants to level the auditorium or to remove the stage, the fly tower or any other essential theatre feature, we protest. We are consulted by theatres from the smallest to the biggest; from the tiny provincial theatre with 200 or 300 seats to the National theatre and Covent Garden. They have to consult us about every proposed alteration.

Over the past 10 years we have been remarkably successful, acting with little money but much authority and with a lot of knowledge about the theatre. The members of the Theatres Trust council come from a wide range of knowledgeable people in the theatre — performers, impresarios, managers and lawyers. The chairman, dare I say—he has been mentioned already—is the noble Lord Goodman. One could not have a more remarkably staunch advocate and sustainer of the arts and the theatre than that distinguished person. Moreover, he understands the law at the drop of a legal document. I have never known a man so quickly to comprehend the difficulties that might lie ahead.

The Cork report wants the Theatres Trust to do more than we are doing already. The report suggests that we should take on the responsibility for a new capital reinvestment fund to provide for the maintenance and conservation of our older theatres. The report referred to a sum of just under £500,000 for that work. It goes further and says that we should "be encouraged and assisted to become a National Trust for Theatre".

One of the trustees is the director of the National Trust and it would be a wonderful thing if we did become the National Trust for Theatre. I would welcome that. We are a little way off it yet, but it would be marvellous news for everyone in the theatre, and for playgoers too, if a National Trust for Theatre was created.

Let me say a word about the London scene today. The Theatres Trust today owns the freeholds of two West End theatres—the Garrick and the Lyric. I hope that it will not be long before we can obtain the freehold of one of London's greatest theatres — Henry Irving's Lyceum. That theatre has been dark for over 40 years yet it is one of the most magnificent in London, if not in Europe, with 2,300 seats. If it were restored it could once again be a home for great drama, Shakespeare, ballet, modern dance and opera. It is tragic that such a great theatre is standing empty — a bleak house if ever there was one — when London needs another theatre of this size.

There are only three other theatres of such size for the performance of large productions in London today — Drury Lane, the Coliseum and Covent Garden. London needs the Lyceum to meet the growing demand for big theatres. If we could bring it to life again London, the theatrical profession, theatregoers and the English tourist board would benefit, and so would the Westminster city council.

The Lyceum is now the responsibility of the London residuary body which took over the freehold and properties that were once owned by the GLC. I know that the LRB is anxious that the Lyceum should be returned to theatrical use again. The most responsible body for ensuring that future for the Lyceum is the Theatres Trust. If we had £5 million or perhaps a little more we could start tomorrow. If we cannot have a grant, perhaps we could negotiate a loan. That theatre would pay. It would be packed because it would be one of the great theatres of London again.

I remember seeing the Lyceum in its last days just before it closed when I saw John Gielgud perform in his great production of "Hamlet" for four days only.

Mr. Tony Banks: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that had the GLC been allowed to continue in its democratic existence, what he is now talking about is far more likely to have come true?

Mr. Crouch: The hon. Gentleman has always shown an interest in the theatre and in the Lyceum, but he was not successful in bringing that about and it was a dance hall until it closed. Admittedly, having dances there did at least keep the rain out because the building was kept in reasonable condition, but it was not used as a theatre, except for one brief moment when "The Mysteries" was transferred by a friend of mine, Ian Mackintosh, from the National theatre, and there it performed to great audiences.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Globe theatre project at Southwark is highly commendable and Mr. Sam Wanamaker, who has battled for over 10 years to have that project approved, deserve the greatest praise?

Mr. Crouch: I agree and I am glad that my hon. Friend mentioned that. It is a wonderful project and it shows just how lively interest in the theatre still is. We have not forgotten our heritage and the need to sustain it.

I take my hat off to the great Canadian, Ed Mirvish, who saved the Old Vic. He did a great job there. I used to spend days there. I can remember paying 1s 6d for the gallery to see Gielgud, Olivier and Ralph Richardson perform there. It is great that it has come back into its own. I am glad too about the Globe theatre project.

It is not just the Theatres Trust but the Government who should now make it a major objective in our policy and programme for the arts to recover the Lyceum and add it to our London theatres. I venture to say that we shall need this theatre in a few years' time in the 1990s when the Royal Covent Garden theatre, the opera house, has to be closed, as it will, for redevelopment and rebuilding, which is so necessary. It will be out of action for some years during that process. The Lyceum would be down the road, as big and capable of carrying on our great tradition of opera and ballet.

6.59 pm

Mr. Jim Callaghan (Heywood and Middleton): Last Saturday night I had the privilege of attending an absolutely marvellous show that was produced by the Heywood amateur dramatic society. It was the musical "South Pacific." I received the invitation because I had helped the society to obtain the use of the civic hall and to get round some of the fire regulations. I enjoyed the show so much that, subsequently, I began to think about the cultural gap that is supposed to exist between the north and the south. I asked myself whether it existed. I do not believe that it does. Unfortunately, the north of England has been given a dreadful image mainly because of the cloth cap, "Coronation Street", Rovers Return, beer-swilling image.

Two weeks ago I mentioned my views to the regional newspaper, the Manchester Evening News. I was extremely surprised last night when I opened that newspaper and discovered a double page article exactly on that theme entitled, "Coronation St. The soap that has slipped on reality". I should like to draw attention to the author's conclusion:

"As an ambassador for the North West, Coronation Street tells a savage lie. Are we happy to be lampooned in such a way? I hope not."

I hope that we are not being lampooned because of the image derived from "Coronation Street". I believe that the reverse is true.

Only a month ago I went along to the Manchester city art gallery and saw a fantastic exhibition on Sir Alfred Munnings. The gallery was full of visitors. I was delighted to see many children being given art lessons by their teachers based on Munnings's paintings.

A week later I went along to the Whitworth art gallery, which is owned and supported by Manchester university. I could not get a parking space within a mile of the gallery. When I eventually got in to see the Degas exhibition, I realised that it was a hopeless task because there were so many people all wishing to view it. I came out and said to myself that I would go again. About three weeks later I went back but the result was exactly the same.

Manchester, which for me is the centre of the north-west, has always been proud of its heritage. We possess the Hallé orchestra. In recent years a magnificent effort was made by the people of Greater Manchester to renovate the Palace theatre and bring it up to international standards. More than £1 million was collected by the people to renovate the building in the hope that it could entice the prestigious companies from London. I am glad to say that the Palace theatre managed it once, but then — I considered it an absolute insult—the company involved said it would not come again. Perhaps it was because of the cloth cap image. The company claimed that it could not return because of the finance involved in travelling to the north.

I welcomed the strategy contained in "The Glory of the Garden". Although London is obviously the centre of the arts, I do not believe that the north is getting its fair share of Government grants to help develop the arts. However, I did not want London to be robbed of cash to finance the north. Unfortunately, I believe that was what the Government were doing: they were robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Is the north getting its fair share? To answer that question I should like to quote the Arts Council chairman, Sir William Rees-Mogg, who expressed disappointment that the Arts Council's grant-in-aid for 1986-87 is more than £25 million below the figure it had sought from the Government. Sir William said:

"I am naturally disappointed. We had asked for £161 million which would have allowed for some expansion. The outcome is £135·6 million . . . However, quite apart from the loss of expansion the grant for the next year will cause us and our clients"— those in the north of England—

"considerable difficulties."

As the Arts Council has a shortfall of £25 million and as no money appears to be earmarked for regional development this year under "The Glory of the Garden", I want the Minister to tell us whether the strategy contained in that document is to be abandoned. If so, when will that happen? It would be disastrous for the regions, in particular the north-west, as the inequalities in the provision of the arts across the country remain massive.

I have often rasied on the Floor of the House the question of the funding of our art galleries and museums. Only a month ago I raised this subject with the Minister in Committee. I wish to raise it again. I was interested to discover that a national survey of more than 2,000 museums and galleries, undertaken by the museums-database project funded by the Office of Arts and Libraries, reveals that every year over 68 million people —I stress that number—visit the country's national and local museums and galleries. A quarter of that number are tourists and obviously they are bringing much extra finance into the arts of Britain. More people visit museums and galleries than go to football matches or cinemas. I was astonished by that fact. I consider myself a sportsman and I enjoy watching Manchester United and Liverpool. Huge crowds watch football matches, but I was staggered by the fact that far more people—68 million—visit art galleries and museums.

However, our museums and arts galleries must cope with decades of neglect. I raised on the Floor of the House the experience I had when I visited one of our prestigious museums. While I was there, there was a sudden shower and I was astonished to see gallery employees putting out buckets and bowls to collect the rainwater pouring into the building. Some of the exhibits had to be moved.

That was not a one-off experience. Sir Roy Strong, director of the Victoria and Albert museum, came before the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts to explain his problems to us. He said of his building:

"The entire electricity system is rotten and catches fire".

Just imagine if the system caught fire in a big way and consider the priceless exhibits that we would be likely to lose. He said:

"The whole radiator system is rotten and has to be replaced. The whole security system is also completely rotten."

I do not know whether I should have said that, because it might give some burglars an idea to visit the place. He said:

"I inherited 13 acres of rotten roof. It is difficult to maintain facilities for scholars, students, polytechnics and tourists when there is this appalling building problem, let alone meet what the community needs now, when we are coping with decades of neglect".

There is no doubt that the buildings under Sir Roy's control are in an appalling state and, because of inadequate Government funding, half the galleries in the museum are frequently closed.

At the Imperial war museum, fewer visitors negotiate the guns and the voluntary payment turnstiles. There has been a drop in visitors of 22 per cent. since December 1984. The 1984-85 report of the Museums and Galleries Commission cements what was said by Sir Roy and what I have seen. It states:

"Public expenditure cuts have affected the national museums directly, and university and local authority museums indirectly. In recent months few museums, either national or non-national, have been able to avoid reducing their staff, curtailing their services, restricting access to parts of their collections or closing altogether on one week day."

I have some direct questions for the Minister. Have the museums and art galleries been advised to undertake surveys of their repair and refurbishment needs? Have the museums and art galleries expressed any concern about the state of their buildings? Will the Government provide the resources for any necessary major programmes of repair, or will they be expected to find resources from the private sector or elsewhere? Will there be a separate Vote for museum building repairs? Why does not capital spending by central Government on museums and art galleries appear separately in the Government's public expenditure White Paper? Are there any other major plans in the pipeline?

When Sir William Rees-Mogg produced the garden strategy, he quoted Kipling. He used the garden as an analogy and said that gardens are not made merely by singing, "Oh, how beautiful!" and then sitting in the shade. That was an implied criticism of armchair critics. It is necessary to find more money to support the garden strategy, and against that background I, too, shall quote Kipling, but a different passage:

"Ere yet we lose the legions,
Ere yet we draw the blade,
Jehovah of the Thunders, Lord God of Battle, give us aid!"

It is aid for the north-west for which I am asking.

7.12 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): It is always a pleasure to hear Kipling quoted, especially by Labour Members, as it is something that seldom happens. I congratulate the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan) on quoting Kipling at the close of an interesting speech. I hope that he will forgive me if I do not take up his remarks in any more detail.

At the end of his speech the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) asked for more policies. I can never understand the point of view of people who say that there must be more policies. It seems to me that we have far too many policies. When it comes to the arts, we need a Mrs. Beeton and not Joan of Arc. What matters are results, not policies. We need results, and my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts is producing them. He has told us of some of the results and he should be most warmly congratulated on what he has achieved.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) seems not to understand that what is meaningful in the arts is people's perceptions and not money figures. Anyone listening to the hon. Gentleman might have received the impression that what matters most is the amount of Government money that is provided, as if subsidy is an end in itself. He seemed to suggest that subsidy is a policy for its own sake, which, of course, it is not. Subsidy is not an end but a means to an end. What matters most is that the arts are buoyant, that they enrich and enlarge people's lives and provide enjoyment and stimulation on a growing scale. Provided that the arts are flourishing, it does not much matter whether that is the result of public demand, sponsorship or subsidy, or something else.

The arts are flourishing partly because Britain has a healthy economy. The economy is booming and people are spending more on the arts. It is partly the consequence of a flourishing economy that the arts are going well in Britain almost as never before. There is a great flowering of talent. The London theatre, which we have heard about from my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch), is well patronised and going like a bomb. It is quite difficult to get into most of the best theatres. More people go to the theatre each year. Indeed, more people go to theatres than attend football matches. Opera is flourishing and so is ballet. Concerts are going well. There is a vast range of orchestral concerts, chamber music concerts and solo concerts. Attendances at symphony concerts over the past five years have increased by about 20 per cent. from 900,000 to 1,112,000.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, spoke of the need to widen audiences. If that increase in the number of people attending concerts is not widening audiences, I do not know what is. The hon. Gentleman said that more subsidy is made available on the continent. That is probably right. More Government subsidy is made available in France than in the United Kingdom, but London has three times as many concerts every year as Paris. What is the use of providing more subsidy if there are fewer concerts to attend?

Without doubt London is one of the arts capitals of the world. It is none the worse for the abolition of the Greater London council. The south bank — the royal festival hall, the Queen Elizabeth hall, the Purcell room and the Hayward gallery — seems to be rather better run now than they were under the GLC.

Mr. Tony Banks: What about the rest of London? I do not want to deny the hon. Gentleman's predictably cheap point.

Mr. Jessel: There is nothing cheap about it.

Mr. Banks: Would the hon. Gentleman not accept in his wiser and quieter moments that the GLC did a great deal for the arts in London, including the south bank?

Mr. Jessel: It did a great deal for the arts, but the overhead administration of county hall was hugely expensive. The present south bank board is doing at least as well without that vast administrative superstructure in county hall.

The museums are doing well too. As the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton has said, about 68 million people visit museums every year. As my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts has told us, a new museum opens every two weeks. Our heritage and the arts generally bring many tourists into the country and their spending, not only on the arts but on hotels, restaurants and shopping, generates income and employment. I believe that the entire House is united in its acceptance of that. This provides a tremendous strength to Britain; and the arts world plays a tremendous part in bringing this about. The Government play their part and both they and the arts world should be congratulated.

Sponsorship has multiplied fortyfold from about £500,000 10 years ago to about £20 million now. It was astonishing that a Liberal party document of a few years ago described sponsorship's importance as merely peripheral.

Sponsorship can be local as well as national and in my constituency Thames Television, which has studios at Teddington, sponsored, two years ago, a local concert whch raised £12,000 for the Save the Children Fund's "Famine in Africa" appeal. Thames Television is sponsoring another concert in a couple of months' time in which I happen to be taking part.

Mr. Buchan: What sort of part?

Mr. Jessel: I am playing a Mozart piano concerto. I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not regard that as what he described about an hour ago as philistine. This time the concert is in aid of the Teddington memorial hospital's new X-ray scheme. Thames Television has a particular link with that hospital.

Other local companies, such as Squires Garden Centre, have generously sponsored other charity concerts. I am asking all arts bodies in my constituency that are registered charities, such as the Hampton choral society, the Twickenham choral society and the Teddington choral society, to notify all their members of the payroll giving scheme, which starts in April 1987, following the Finance Act 1986. This will help provide more money for the arts through individual support because those who become involved in the scheme will obtain tax relief on their contributions. The Government should be warmly congratulated on introducing such an excellent scheme.

I shall just make four short requests of my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts. The first concerns BBC Radio 3, which is unique in fostering a love of music in Britain. No other country has anything like it. Radio 3 and the BBC promenade concerts which are linked with it are greatly valued national assets. The BBC has a new chairman and a new director-general, both of whom are unknown quantities as to their view of the musical side of the work of the BBC. Will my right hon. Friend the Minister approach the BBC and ask it for an assurance that its splendid musical tradition, primarily through Radio 3, will be upheld, and that music will be provided with a fair share of the BBC's resources?

Secondly, have the Government dropped the idea of a levy on blank tapes? In fairness to the music world, I hope that they have not dropped the idea and that they intend, when parliamentary time allows, to proceed with something of that kind.

Thirdly, I refer to value added tax on antiques at auction. London is pre-eminent in auctions of works of art. Sotheby's, Christie's, Phillips' and Bonham's bring prestige and trade to Britain. The Common Market is considering imposing value added tax not just on auctioneers' commissions, but on the whole value of each article. That would be crazy. It would drive trade not just out of Britain but out of the European Community and to other auction centres such as New York and Geneva. I hope that the Government will take a firm line and stop any such thing happening.

Fourthly, military bands are a characteristic part of British heritage. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central spoke generously of my support of this most worthwhile cause. I could not understand the hon. Gentleman, who is articulate, erudite and learned in the use of the English language, calling it a peccadillo. If military bands are peccadillos, let us have more peccadillos. The high standards of excellence of British military bands are inextricably linked with the Royal Military school of music at Kneller hall, Twickenham, which has trained Army bands for 129 years. Last year, 164 of my right hon. and hon. Friends signed the early-day motion stating that the status quo should long continue. This is the 17th time on which I have raised the matter in the House. I have had 12 meetings with different Ministers —one with the Prime Minister and 11 with different Defence Ministers.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Will my hon. Friend confirm that military bands not only provide pleasure in his constituency but morale-raising spirit throughout all constituencies?

Mr. Jessel: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support. Military bands are a great asset to the nation.

Although military bands are a matter primarily for Defence Ministers, who are expected to reach a decision soon — they have been saying "soon" for months. — I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts will not mind if I mention that I hope he will support it because military music must be a form of martial art.

Mr. Fisher: Will the hon. Gentleman, who knows much about the subject, confirm that £48 million is spent on military bands each year?

Mr. Jessel: That is the cost of all bands of the Army, the Royal Air Force, and the Royal Marines. It is not only the cost of training them, it is the total cost of running them. That is excellent value for money. Not only do they help to promote recruitment to the Army but they are trained to serve as medical orderlies in wartime. As part of the British arts, heritage and tradition, they help to attract to our shores visitors whose spending generates income and employment. They help to increase the number of people who stay in hotels and spend their money here. There is thus a valuable tax yield for the Government. They should be fully supported.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Over the past hour or two, I have been wondering whether I should speak in this debate. I changed my mind several times. I found it extremely difficult. I feel a little like St. Sebastian in innumerable renaissance paintings. With the exception of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan), I had the impression that we were listening to a type of lying-in-state series of speeches. There has been little sign that the arts fundamentally matter. They have tended to be a little cream on the top of the cake. I cannot think of any other country in which the arts are so fundamental.

The expression of news, popular opinions and ideas is undertaken by the press, which is owned by three people. It is a frightening monopoly. If that happened in any other part of our industry or economy, it would immediately face the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Five people control the dissemination of popular news in this country — Stevens, Maxwell, Murdoch — [Interruption.] Is that the question that hon. Members put? Is that the contribution that I get? Five people control the dissemination of news and information throughout Western Europe. There is Berlusconi, who is in France. That is a terrifying control of expression.

We have heard about the arts tonight and we have, in effect, wandered along the south bank. People express themselves through the arts. That is what the arts are fundamentally about. They say something, as Sam Wanamaker of the Globe theatre said. I remember Sam Wanamaker not only because of his work in the Globe theatre and the extra grace that it will bring to London but, because of McCarthyism, he was expelled from America because he wanted his art to say something. That has been missing here.

I have heard comments about the structure and funding of the arts. The level of funding is ludicrous when we consider the importance of our major form of expression. When we look at the press monopoly, the matter becomes even more serious. Were it not for the fact that we have a community-regulated broadcasting system, there would be a virtual monopoly of one shade of political opinion. When regulated broadcasting attempts to express other views, the chairman of the Conservative party, in his other role as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, intervenes to attack.

Over the past two years increasing timidity has affected our most important cultural jewel, British broadcasting. I shall provide a comparison which is not separate from the arts. Two years ago, an attempt was made to ban "Real Lives", a programme about Northern Ireland. It required the intervention of the Home Secretary before the governors acted to prevent the programme from being shown. Two years after that, the "Secret Society" programmes about Zircon were banned by the BBC. In other words, within two years, the Home Secretary's intervention was not required. Timidity and anxiety had been pre-empted in the BBC and it acted to apply self-censorship. That has been the effect on broadcasting.

When there is a monopoly on opinion and expression in this country and the regulated broadcasting structures suffer from it, we have only the arts to express ideas and views. We shall not get such expression in Murdoch's newspapers. Alan Bleasdale wrote "The Boys from the Black Stuff". People such as he say a great deal more about social and political life than our legislation does. If people were asked where they last saw a play about unemployment, they would not say that they had seen it on the south bank or in the Royal Shakespeare theatre. They would refer to the set of three plays that they saw on television called, "The Boys from the Black Stuff."

I remember what happened to those boys. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and I have referred to the monstrosity of unemployment, but those three plays said more about unemployment and fixed it more firmly in the consciousness of the British people than any other play. It drew their attention to the outrage of a Government and a society that can cause this to happen to human beings. The words that were used in that play have passed into the folklore of this country. The arts matter because they say something.

I have listened tonight to comments about subsidies, and as I listened I wondered whether those hon. Members understand what people need. My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) referred to authority over broadcasting. I wish that he would spell it out. Ten years ago my party accepted that broadcasting matters so much to the cultural life and expression of this country that it had to be taken away from the Home Office and given to an arts Ministry. We alone in the world have put broadcasting, the jewel of our culture, into the hands of a Ministry of the Interior. The Minister who orders the police to attack the Wapping pickets, who orders the special branch to go into the offices of the New Statesman and who bangs open the door of Duncan Campbell's house and takes out the tapes, documents and scripts relating to a set of six programmes is also in charge of broadcasting. The Minister who is supposed to safeguard freedom of expression, is also responsible for T1 division in the Home Office.

I am holding in my hand a document that refers to BBC finance and to the TV licensing system. Under the heading "T1 Division", paragraph 7 refers to "Press freedom (including Press Council matters and proposals for a statutory right of reply."

Therefore, a Minister of the Interior is controlling a central element of our civilisation and culture. That is why the Labour party and the trade union movement said 10 years ago that we had to bring it under a Minister and a Ministry whose main concern was freedom of expression, not censorship and the distortion and compression of expression.

I inherited that policy three years ago. I did not invent it; I was fortunate enough to inherit it. However, that policy has been rejected.

Mr. Fisher: No.

Mr. Buchan: If it has not been rejected, my hon. Friend had better spell it out for me, because there has been a change of policy since I was sacked for saying it. I regret the fact that no new powers will be given to our Labour party shadow or real Minister under the amended proposals of the national executive committee. However, he will have a say. He will be allowed to discuss policies with the Home Office and the Department of Trade and Industry.

The policy amendments have also wiped out films and the press. My hon. Friend ought to look at the amendments on pages 39 to 44. I hope that he wins the battle. Unless my hon. Friend tells his colleagues and comrades in the Labour movement that this battle has to be won, he will not win it. I did not win that battle. Therefore, he has not inherited a victory from me. I shall back him up in his fight.

I gave a pledge to double expenditure on the arts. It was a modest increase. I sought to double the £140 million that is given to the arts. Arts expenditure is only 1/1300th of the entire public expenditure. The Labour party will honour that pledge to double the funding for the arts. At the last meeting—the meeting at which I was sacked—the battle for the £140 million was won; and an additional £40 million for museums.

We do not need formal structures for the arts. We need structures that will involve the people as deeply as possible. It is not sufficient for a Minister with responsibility for the arts to have only one role. It is wrong that he should be presented with a cocked hat and a sword and that he should only be asked ceremonially to open various projects. He has very little else to do. He cannot use his initiative. If something is not doing too well, he cannot intervene and inject a little cash. There is a case for adopting an arm's-length attitude, but this Tory Government do not accept it. They accepted the Priestley report—quite rightly in terms of money—but they drove a coach and horses through the arm's-length principle. The Arts Council says that it cannot take money away from the four national institutions because that would not be in accordance with Government policy. That is to be found on page 13 of "The Glory of the Garden".

Furthermore, the arts should not be under the direct control of the Government. When names are submitted to the Prime Minister for appointment to the board of governors of the BBC—and no doubt for appointment to the Arts Council—she asks, "Is he one our ours?" That seems to be the appointment criterion. The arm's-length principle does not apply. The Arts Council should have an independent voice and should speak for the arts and for the regions. We have allowed the arts to be dominated for far too long by establishment London. I am referring not to the whole of London — to Islington, Hackney, Brixton, or Newham — but to establishment London. That policy has to be changed. People who live elsewhere than in establishment London also want to be able to see good plays and operas.

Conservative Members criticise the subsidies to the arts. However, arts subsidies mainly subsidise those who support the Conservative party — the middle class and the wealthy. Even if the price of seats at Covent Garden were to be reduced, they would still be beyond the reach of most working people. Access to them can be brought about only if we allow the Arts Council to speak for the arts and the regions. We must also create strong regional bodies to develop the arts in the regions. We need regional arts development boards instead of the client responsive regional arts associations. Expertise is also needed in the regions. For far too long the regions have looked to No. 105 Piccadilly for expertise. If those objectives can be achieved, the Arts Council will be able to speak for the arts in Britain.

There should also be arm's-length discussion of funding for the arts. The Labour party would give the Arts Council, or a national arts body, the statutory right to publish its analysis of the economic state of the country, and the Minister would be under a duty to publish his response in the form of a White Paper that could be debated in the House. On that basis the arm's-length principle would be a reality. The Labour party would provide direct funding for the regional arts development boards. They would then be responsible for the direct funding of their clients. The Arts Council would be directly funded, and again the arm's-length principle would be achieved because the Arts Council would fund directly the national institutions.

It is most important, however, that sufficient money should be made available to the arts so that they are not put at the mercy of sponsorship. It has been argued by the Minister that sponsorship means additional money coming to the arts. It is only over the last two or three years that the money for the arts has been cut in real terms. That has taken place at the same time as there has been an increase in sponsorship. Sponsorship is seen not as an additional source of funding for the arts but as a substitute for proper public funding. [Interruption.] The Minister for Trade has plenty of money; local arts theatres have not got such money or even pictures like the one that he and his family were able to sell. That sale could have funded several theatres. The hon. Gentleman made more out of one picture than most theatres get for an entire year in subsidies. Yet he sneers. What a party the Conservative party is.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): That is an historical inaccuracy.

Mr. Buchan: It is not even historical; it is almost contemporary in the hon. Gentleman's case.

As Mr. Joll of Pearson Incorporated said, his company prefers to sponsor exhibitions with which it feels comfortable. In other words, the safe, prestigious and glamorous will be supported but 7:84, M6 and Red Ladder will not be supported. But the arts that matter, not just the development for which Wanamaker was praised in the Globe theatre but the productions for which he was expelled from America, will not attract sponsorship. Sponsorship is being used as a substitute for genuine public funding.

Sponsorship of itself distorts the direction of the arts. That is the danger of too much love of sponsorship. It is not a case even of adopting the American method where public funding endowments undertake to give x amount of money to a theatre or orchestra if there is private funding. In that way, public funding is attracted to the productions that the community wants. But through their scheme the Government are forced to give money to whichever body the sponsor nominates. The sponsor decides where the public funding goes. Also, the body funded by the sponsor, be it a cigarette company or whatever, has to ensure that sufficient publicity is given to the sponsor to make it worth his while in advertising terms. So public funding is powerfully underwriting the advertising abilities of the private sponsor.

All that is against a background in which the Minister says that his policy is to maintain public funding but that all further development and expansion must come from the private sector. In effect, that means a cut because the inflationary element within the arts is much higher than the RPI or the general denominator. Therefore, there is a continual drain on public funding and a distortion of production to try to attract private money. The directors of theatres and arts organisations are being changed into fund raisers instead of acting as administrators and forward thinkers. That is the problem faced by the arts.

I come back to where I began. We are faced with an intense monopoly of ideas and of the creative arts illustrated by the lack of funding for British films and for British broadcasting which is now to be frozen while the private and commercial sectors will be allowed to drive ahead. Last week's Green Paper proposed that with the development of commercial radio the obligation to inform, educate and entertain would be removed. That duty was laid properly on the BBC and upon independent television, but it is to be removed from commercial radio. Therefore, it will also be removed from commercial television. In other words, the BBC will be forced into competition in which it is regulted and will have to obey its instruction to inform, entertain and educate, but the commercial sector will not be subject to such regulation.

What sort of free competition is that from the party of free enterprise? It is an attempt to follow through the principles of Peacock, who said that there should be a free-for-all and that cash should decide. I must point out to the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) that when that happens there will not be freedom. The hon. Gentleman said that the BBC could choose on what to spend its money, but it can choose only between the things that are provided. If they are not provided on a full scale, it will have very little choice. There has been talk of hundreds of commercial community radio stations. If there is a free-for-all and if they are opened up without regulation and control, we will end up with a monopoly such as there is in the press.

In his report, Professor Peacock said precisely that. He gave the example of the free press which has developed in Britain since 1694. He proposed that that should happen also to television and broadcasting. But the free press that existed for almost 300 years has degenerated into a monopoly of three people. If that is to be the model, the same will happen to television. [Interruption.] Hon. Members should not tell me to hurry. There is much to be said on the Opposition side of the House; we have had too much of nothing being said on the Government side, so I shall take another few seconds.

If Professor Peacock's proposal comes into force, there will be no choice. The only choice will be between different soap operas, because the duty to inform, educate and broadcast in commercial serious programmes will go. This is not an elitist concept. It is as important for the guy who is interested in coarse fishing or rugby as for the person who wants opera. Diversity of programmes is not an elitist concept. We must understand that. It is nonsense to say that opera is only for the few, much as that view has been promulgated. As the broadcasting channels have opened up to opera, so the audiences for opera have expanded.

Because of the monopoly problem in broadcasting and the press, we decided on the policy for the arts and culture that my hon. Friend will implement after the next election. We must open up access to television by ensuring that there is a large number of programmes from which to choose. There must also be participation. Hence we developed the concept of the open cultural university. Just as the Open university was brought into being in the 1960s, so we have in local communities a conglomeration of resources such as arts schools, colleges, and schools with music and art studios, which could be used as a campus to develop a participating open cultural university analogous to the educational Open university.

All that is possible and necessary. Three weeks ago I went into the Coats factory in Paisley, one of the major cotton spinning factories in Britain since the industrial revolution. Fifteen years ago, 15,000 people worked in the cotton mill; today, 350 people work there. I went into workshops larger than this House with no one in them. The bobbin spinning was controlled and completely automated. The 350 people in the factory were firemen, doorkeepers, sweepers, packers and drivers. We are moving into an age where, if we can have control and ownership of the new technologies, we can open up a richness of life in which the arts will be an active and necessary part of developed thought and thinking.

The poet McDiarmid, in his poem "Returning to Glasgow from a Long Exile", describes a man returning to Glasgow and seeing a crowd coming back from Ibrox park, and he asked a newsboy, "What's on, has there been a big game?" The newspaper seller said, "No. Where have you been? There is a debate going on between Professor McFadzean of the philosophy department and a Spanish philosopher, and the whole of Ibrox stadium is full." McDiarmid says, "I looked down the road and there was a newsboy selling newspapers, and he was shouting, 'Read all about it, Turkish poet's abstruse new poem.' Holy makes, the papers were selling like hot cakes."

If we have control over our own lives instead of leaving control of technology to a few, in a world in which broadcasting can be fully opened up to the people of this country and not be left to Maxwell and Murdoch—who have already brought in the satellites—if we understand that people want to do as well as to watch, to say things as well as to listen, we can use the arts to enlarge and enrich our lives. If not, we will allow our people to atrophy, not through choice but because we have limited that choice to a few entrepreneurs of ideas. That is why we spend so much time on this subject. That is why the Leader of the Opposition and I can quarrel, because we know that the arts matter. I wish I had some impression that the Government understood that. That is why we may yet touch the imagination of the people of this country and win, as we should win the coming election.

7.45 pm

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I feel like the Labour worker after the Greenwich by-election result who awoke by accident in the alliance—he could not have felt more unwelcome. Having listened to this very warm and cosy debate this evening, I feel much the same.

I join my right hon. Friend the Minister in congratulating Charles Vance and his organisation on removing a white elephant from Hillingdon and turning what was a tremendous burden on the ratepayers of that authority into a theatre that is now beginning to charge the right sort of prices for the right sort of shows. I have a message for the Liberal-alliance spokesman, who is not in the House. If he is so keen on keeping open subsidised theatre, why did the Liberal-controlled council in Eastbourne close the local Devonshire Park theatre?

We have heard much about the phrase "the arts". What is or is not art is a matter for personal choice. If some people want to listen to an overweight Italian singing in his own language, so be it. If people want to waste time watching a man prancing about in a pair of ladies' tights on stage, that is their choice. But do not expect me and the rest of the people in this country to subsidise that choice. —[Interruption.] I beg hon. Members not to tell me that it is part of my heritage. There are other forms of art that are understood by the ordinary working-class people of this country. Professional football in many ways is an art form, so is watching Michael Crawford in "Phantom of the Opera". But there is one subtle difference. If I want to see professional football or watch Michael Crawford performing, I have to pay the full economic cost. I do not have to dress up in a dinner suit and bow tie or take a lady in a long dress and to say that I am desperately keen to go to the ballet or opera on condition that the taxpayer subsidises my ticket by £21.

It is a strange phenomenon in this country that last year an unemployed couple was paid £47·85 benefit a week to live on. The Government say that is all they can afford to pay them, but they will give that unemployed couple another £42 of the taxpayers' money to go to the ballet and opera.

My two daughters and my son enjoy pop concerts. As the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) rightly knows, they enjoy watching pop groups such as Spandau Ballet. They are young people and they resent being told by their elders and so-called betters that that is not art, that it is just a pop concert, that if they want to go there, they have to pay the full economic cost, but that if they want to dress up and look smart and take a taxi to Covent Garden, they can go in and the taxpayer will subsidise them to the extent of £21 each. Young people say to those who tell them what arts are, "Mind your own business, we shall find out and decide for ourselves." I say hear, hear to that.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am grateful to the hon. Member. His muscular approach to the arts is well known in this House. Does he recall the fact that Spandau Ballet performed at the Royal Festival hall when it was being run by the Greater London council? Unfortunately, he probably also knows that those people put up Spandau Ballet because they thought it was a ballet from Spandau.

Mr. Dicks: The hon. Gentleman has not told the House that he was chairman of the arts committee at the time, which makes it even worse.

We have heard about this wonderful place called Covent Garden. The Sunday Times printed an article about that fantastic place where six performances of a show cost £529,000. Total subsidised sales were £199,900. Private sponsorship contributed £150,000. The net loss was £179,000.

If ballet, opera and music are so good, why, even when it is subsidised to that tune, do people still not want to go? I cannot understand. Any other organisation in any industry, working on that basis where it could not attract people to attend would be bankrupt. Football clubs have said that they cannot keep going and that they need aid. The Government Front Bench says, "Sorry, you must live in the real world. You paid high transfer fees and you have to suffer the consequences."

A Mexican opera singer, whose name escapes me, received £10,000 per performance, but we do not tell Covent Garden that it is paying him too high a fee and that we shall not subsidise it. Indeed, the Prime Minister went on stage after listening to an opera and said that the Government will continue subsidising because "the arts are essential". Who said that her definition of the arts or that of my right hon. Friend the Minister is correct and that the definition of arts by myself and my daughter with regard to pop concerts and soccer is wrong? How dare people say that by one definition the arts are part of our culture but that by another definition they are not?

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): If the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington was referring Covent Garden, it could be that its costs are so high that it is impossible to charge an economic price for a ticket. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that part of the reason that Covent Garden has new proposals for redevelopment of the whole of that site, involving commercial activities which otherwise it would not really wish to embark upon, is to reduce the cost of running the operas and ballet, and to reduce the subsidy it will need?

Mr. Dicks: I do not doubt that the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) is right, but why is it getting any subsidy at all? If it cannot create the show, as it must in the commercial theatre, and secure sponsorship for it, we should say, "Hard lines; obviously people do not want to see it because they do not want to pay the price." Nobody says that. We have an Arts Minister. Why, with great respect, I do not know. It is a matter of supply and demand. It is almost as bad as having a Minister for Sport.

Mr. Jessel: Could not my hon. Friend apply most of his argument to the whole of education?

Mr. Dicks: With great respect to my hon. Friend, one could ask what sort of comprehensive schools the Labour authorities is running. Education is essential. I say that the arts are not essential but are a leisure pursuit depending on personal choice. Education is quite different from that and I do not think that it is a true analogy. The budget for the arts is £343 million. I appreciate that that includes National Heritage and museums, but I am most concerned with opera, music and the ballet. We give £151 million a year for these fat cats to enjoy ballet, music and the opera, yet we say to old-age pensioners during the bad weather that we cannot afford to pay the additional severe weather heating payment unless the cold weather starts on a Monday and ends on a Sunday. If it starts on a Wednesday and ends on a Tuesday, we cannot help them. We could say, on the other hand, "You can freeze or we can give you a good way of getting warm. We will take you to the opera and give you £42 for you and your husband to go in there and stay warm." That would be an excellent way for the Government to ensure that the opera was full and the old people were kept warm.

I think that I have made my point. To me, subsidy for the arts is upper-crust nonsense. The old argument is that we have always done it, everyone thinks that it is a good idea, it is bipartisan, so of course we should continue with it. Today's debate has not been about whether it is right to waste public money in this way. The debate has been about whether the money was spent wisely and whether there was enough of it. The whole thing is nonsense. It is time someone pointed out that the king is not wearing a new suit—he is completely naked. That is what I have sought to do as a Back-Bench Member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his brevity.

8 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is always interesting to hear the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) discoursing on the arts. In many ways, the hon. Gentleman is to the arts what James "Bonecrusher" Smith is to lepidoptery. His speeches are made additionally entertaining for the Opposition by the looks of horror on the faces of so many of his colleagues on the Conservative Benches. A few support the hon. Gentleman's view—I noticed one or two hon. Members from the Shed end of the arts come in to hear his speech—but it is very much a minority view even on his own side. That is a good thing because his views are philistine in the extreme, anachronistic and wholly unacceptable to any civilised body of thought.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman on just one point—the definition of art. I shall not explore that today, but the hon. Gentleman is right that the definition tends to be what white, male, middle-class people say that it is. I have never accepted that ice dancing, which uses movement and music with great grace, should be described as a sport while ballet is an art form. Rather than narrowing the definition, however, the hon. Gentleman should consider expanding it to take in some of the activities that he and his family take themselves off to enjoy.

By some strange coincidence, arts debates always seem to take place on election days. I believe that the last Government-inspired arts debate was at the time of the Euro-elections. Perhaps application for an arts debate should stand alongside application for the stewardship for the Chiltern Hundreds or the Manor of Northstead as a way of signifying that the smell of an election is in the air. In this context, I should put it on record that today's by-election arts debate was caused by the death of one of the few genuinely popular Members of Parliament.

The Minister laid great emphasis on private funding for the arts. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) made clear, the Opposition in no way reject private sponsorship, although we see it very much as just a little bit of stuff on top. One has the impression, however, that the Minister was emphasising it to cover up the low level of central Government support for the arts. He made a number of worrying statements in this regard which suggested that as private funding increases there will be great pressure on him—to which I do not think that he will be especially resistant—to reduce the amount of central Government funding.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), without notes, made one of the most eloquent speeches that I have heard since I came to the House, and one which I could not begin to emulate. He made the point that business sponsorship tends to go into the safe art forms, so that community arts and black art cannot look to business sponsorship for the funding that they so desperately need. Instead they must look to the dispassionate forms of art funding which can only come from local authorities, public bodies and the Government.

Much has been said in the debate about the revenue gained from tourism, which in 1986 amounted to no less than £5·5 billion. There are many reasons why people in their millions visit this country, but I do not think that even the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington would contest the claim that most of them come to enjoy our theatres, museums, art galleries, concert halls, and historic buildings while few, if any, come to gaze at our office blocks, development sites and motorways, or at the tower blocks in which so many of my constituents live. People come to this country because of its rich diversity of culture, but we still tend to talk of subsidies to arts. Both sides have done so in this debate because one tends to lapse into that kind of description, suggesting that the arts are somehow a liability.

The very word "subsidy" puts the arts in a defensive position, which is wholly inappropriate in view of their great contribution to the nation's cultural and economic welfare. Using the word in that sense, it could be said that we subsidise defence and unemployment. Indeed, it could be argued that we have the best defended dole queues in the western world. In fact, we invest in education, in the arts and in other areas of creative social activity.

I do not believe that the Government really take the arts seriously, regarding them as the soft underbelly of public expenditure and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South said, as something of a luxury. The Government motion is complacent and, in some parts, downright untruthful, revealing an appalling depth of ignorance about the social and economic significance of the arts. The Government may twist and turn the figures, but, as I explained in detail in an Adjournment debate on the Arts Council budget for 1987-88, if that budget is measured against the retail prices index, there has been a real decrease of 3 per cent. in central Government spending on the arts since 1979-80. Moreover, as my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South pointed out, if we take the more accurate average earnings index we see that there has been a real cut of 22 per cent. in the arts budget since 1979. The Office of Arts and Libraries is responsible for a total of £339 million in 1987-88—less than one quarter per cent. of total Government expenditure amounting to £148,000 million. That is the pathetically small amount that we invest in the arts in this country.

I wish to refer briefly to the part played by the arts in the cultural industries of this country—something that the Government and the Office of Arts and Libraries seem incapable of understanding and that the Arts Council is only slowly beginning to appreciate. We live in a industrialised nation that is fast becoming de-industrialised. That may be inevitable, given our position as the world's oldest and now decrepit capitalist economy, but there is little doubt that the Government's current economic policies are exacerbating the decline. We are living off North sea oil, squandering the family silver and heading rapidly towards the status of a banana monarchy without the benefit of bananas.

There is one area of economic activity which I believe holds enormous hope for the future; the cultural industries. By that I mean not only performing and visual arts but radio, televison, film, video, printing, publishing and other leisure activities mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). It is a large and important sector of the economy with proven and future growth potential. Nationally, leisure spending amounted in 1985 to some £20 billion, or around 10 per cent. of all consumer spending. In London alone, the Greater London council estimated that about 250,000 people are employed in the cultural industries. The GLC also concluded that it was essential to develop an economic strategy for such an important sector of the economy.

Many Conservative Members would no doubt insist that we should let the market get on with it. Opposition Members do not agree. It is true, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central said, that most people have turned to commercial forms of culture for satisfaction such as records, commercial television, radio, films and theatre. However, there is a vital interplay between the private sector and the publicly supported art forms. At first glance the private sector might appear to be self-reliant and self-regenerative, but it depends in great measure on the publicly supported artistic base and both the private and public sectors rely heavily on the original ideas, talents and new art forms that make cultural changes in this country so dynamic. Those are provided by the so-called fringe theatre groups, the small literary presses, magazines, record labels and independent film and video makers. It is at that level that real cultural regeneration takes place, continually adding to the rich cultural diversity of our country which is so attractive to overseas visitors and which we all praise, but which so many of us do so little to nurture.

The growth of our cultural heritage will not stop whatever central Government do or, in this case, do not do. At a time when our wider economic prospects were more optimistically based, the case for Government involvement and intervention in the cultural industries was not so self-evident. Now, with alarming de-industrialisation of what was once the premier manufacturing nation on earth, the case for central Government involvement in the strategic planning of the cultural industries becomes overwhelming.

The Government spend tens of millions of pounds of taxpayers' money on supporting industry and regard that as being a fit and proper use of public expenditure. Why not spend similar money on the cultural industries in terms of developing a proper strategy? The GLC drew up a strategy for the cultural industries as part of a wider industrial strategy for London. It proposed public investment and loan finance in addition to the more traditional forms of public support. The strategy was aimed at supporting the base of the cultural industries; those small independent concerns that have lost out in terms of exploiting their own success through problems in distribution, marketing and the tendency towards monopoly. It is important in economic terms to encourage diversification and plan developments in the cultural industries, but it is also important in terms of national culture, because otherwise the prodigious growth in communication technology will result in an unacceptable internationalisation of popular culture which will truly represent chewing gum for the eyes.

When future generations come to judge the quality of life in today's Britain, one of the first things they will look at will be the artistic legacy that we have left them, just as we have judged past generations by their music, sculpture, paintings and buildings. Investing in people's creative talents is one of the finest investments any country can make but it calls for a breadth of vision and imagination that the present Government, with their rather seedy street corner shop mentality, simply do not possess. The Labour party has that vision, and the future of the arts will look so much more vital and exciting when we have that Labour Government and when my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central is our Minister for the Arts.

8.15 pm

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I feel like Scrooge in "A Christmas Carol", watching a whole succession of Opposition spokesmen. We have heard the Opposition spokesman Present in the form of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), we have heard the Opposition spokesman Past, in the form of the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) and we may have heard the Opposition spokesman Future in the form of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). I will not follow the line of argument taken by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West except to agree, probably with all three Opposition spokesmen, that the arts are important. Having got beyond that first sentence, I fear that there is little further on which we can agree.

It is right to start any speech on this subject by reminding the House that the arts are important. Civilisation as we know it depends on flourishing arts. Whatever one's definition of artistic activity, there is no doubt that without it there is no civilisation. Therefore, it is important that we should debate this subject and consider the state of the arts in this country.

We seem to be discussing the way in which artists should be supported. After all, it is well known that artists cannot flourish in the commercial sense. There needs to be support of one form or another, whether it be patronage, subsidy or sponsorship. The debate is about which of those forms is to be pre-eminent. I do not want to spend long going down that path, but one has to face up to the fact that sometimes there is too much emphasis on subsidy, sometimes there is too much emphasis on sponsorship and sometimes there is too much emphasis on patronage. The balance between those three is a debate which could be taken up when there is more time available.

There is definitely a tension between those who feel that there should be more state intervention in the arts and those who, like myself, feel that there should perhaps be less. On the whole, I think that the Government have got the balance just about right. There is no question about the fact that either extreme would not be healthy for the arts or for the country at large. The Labour party, in the way that I understood its arguments, wants to take over the running of the arts in a way that would be damaging to our culture and traditions and would introduce a bureaucracy which could damage the arts in the same way as too much bureaucracy has done a great deal of damage to our education. I will not debate whether education is more important than the arts or vice versa, a subject introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks).

The Government's record is good on the whole question of the arts. The strategy of "The Glory of the Garden," which was introduced as a result of discussions between the Government and the Arts Council, quite rightly stimulated a flow of more resources away from London towards the regions. In my area of East Anglia, I can see evidence that that is working. I can see orchestras flourishing and I have attended concerts recently by the Peterborough string orchestra and there are many other examples which show that there is more activity in the regions. That is partly a successful result of the "Glory of the Garden" strategy.

I wholeheartedly support the Government's enthusiasm for private fund-raising and business sponsorship. I do not think that we have taken that too far; we can take it further. For example, in Norwich within the past few weeks local business men Roger Gawn and Francis Cheetham from the Castle museum received an award from my right hon. Friend the Minister at a reception because of their sponsorship of Norfolk museum's service, which has been highly successful. This was a well-deserved award.

To show the difficult choices that have to be made in the arts, particularly in East Anglia, I would like to mention the Theatre Royal in Norwich. That illustrates many of the problems we are addressing this evening. As many of my hon. Friends and, indeed, Opposition Members are fully aware, the Theatre Royal in Norwich has a good record of success, particularly in recent years, under the leadership of Dick Condon. That remark will gain support from all quarters of the House and throughout Norfolk and the wider area.

The Theatre Royal in Norwich is now at a crossroads in deciding how its future will develop. Recently, the independent trust under its chairman Mr. Geoffrey Marshall, to whom I spoke yesterday in the House, has taken the initiative to launch an appeal for £2·5 million for extra funds for the theatre. That appeal deserves support throughout the House, from local authorities and people in East Anglia. I hope that local people and businesses will not take this excellent theatre for granted and will respond enthusiastically and generously to the appeal.

The reason why the appeal is necessary at the moment is that there is an urgent need in the theatre for an upgrading of facilities and a general improvement of the building. There is a need for a larger orchestra pit, extra seating and other improvements. The improvements have become necessary because of the need to attract more support from the Arts Council. As an example, the Glyndebourne touring opera company used to come—as far as I can recall—to the Theatre Royal twice a year. It was always very successful, financially profitable and it sold out concerts. I have attended many of those concerts. However, this year for the first time, it will not be coming in the autumn.

Touring companies are less and less willing to come to theatres unless those theatres bring their facilities and amenities right up to standard — at least that is my understanding of the present position. That is why it is right that the appeal has been launched to meet that challenge. In the meantime, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will show good faith towards the initiative and think again about ways in which we can encourage an increase in the support for touring companies to avoid serious short-term damage. I know that my right hon. Friend is aware of the problem, as there has been considerable discussion about it. I will be interested to hear my right hon. Friend's comments when he replies.

I want to refer to the role of local authorities in connection with the Theatre Royal in Norwich and particularly the role of the Labour-controlled Norwich city council. To return to the good news, in 1969 Norwich city council effectively rescued the Theatre Royal from becoming a bingo hall. I do not want to be on record as making derogatory remarks about bingo. Nevertheless, the theatre's present role is the right one, and there are plenty of other venues for bingo. In 1970, the independent trust to which I have referred was formed and it received an annual grant of £20,000 from Norwich city council. In 1980, 10 years later, that grant stopped. Since then, although the lease on the theatre is free, there has been no cash support from the city council and there has been no support for building maintenance. That is a serious problem.

If we compare the Theatre Royal in Norwich with other provincial theatres, the problem becomes clear. The theatre royal in Nottingham, to which reference has already been made this evening, receives £397,000 in annual running costs from the city and £48,000 from the county. The Grand theatre in Swansea receives a £500,000 annual contribution from the city council. I am not necessarily arguing for vast tranches of local authority money for theatres; that may not be the right path to take. Nevertheless, in Norwich the city council has gradually withdrawn its commitment. Although the councillors sit as members of the independent trust and therefore take an interest—or meddle, depending on one's point of view—in the affairs of the Theatre Royal, their commitment in the form of cash up front has been decreasing. That is a problem which must be addressed and another reason why the appeal is of such importance.

Norwich city council must sort out its priorities. While withdrawing funds from the Theatre Royal—whatever the arguments about that may be—it is finding £375,000 to pour into a pop venue in the centre of Norwich. Many hon. Members have expressed support for pop music, but I confess that I am not one of them. Nevertheless, there is obviously a role and a need for pop music. However, many people in Norwich doubt whether that is the right way for the city council to spend as much as £375,000. Although the venue is not in my constituency—actually it is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley)—I know that my hon. Friend shares my view that that venue is a mistake. I know that the proposal is opposed by many local residents, who are rightly concerned about the effects on the locality. The proposal is also opposed by, or causes concern to, the local police. With a pop venue in the centre of Norwich, there is a risk of noise, disturbance and even—on a more serious point—of an increase in drug trafficking. Many of us are concerned about that.

Norwich city council must clearly decide its order of priorities. It is taking funds away from the Theatre Royal, which enjoys a high prestige in Norfolk and the surrounding area, yet is putting money into a project which, at the very least, is dubious and has only limited support in the area.

Norwich city council must decide upon its attitude to the Theatre Royal. Either it will support the theatre generously or it will decide that it wants nothing more to do with it. The council may decide to give the building to the independent trust and so launch the theatre upon a new future. Whatever happens, there is no doubt that the Theatre Royal has been, and is, very popular with people throughout East Anglia. It has been well run—and is still very well run—and it provides a good variety of entertainment. For that reason, I am confident that people will make the necessary commitment to ensure the theatre's future, whatever decisions are taken in the next months or years.

I hope that the Government will take seriously my plea in the short term about the problem with touring companies and ensure that touring companies get to good, successful theatres such as the Theatre Royal, which is providing entertainment for all types of people in Norwich and the surrounding area. That is a serious point and I look forward to the Minister's response.

Bearing in mind the time factor, I will finish shortly, after I have made my main local point. I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington that we should have a complete free-for-all in the arts. Nor do I go along with Opposition spokesmen when they ask for endless tranches of money from local and central Government. We all know what nonsense that leads to if it is taken to extremes. On the whole, I support the balance which the Government are expressing and I support the Government's motion. I do not agree with the usual carping amendment from the alliance parties or the inevitable critical amendment from the Labour party. I am therefore very pleased to support the Government motion and I hope that my right hon. Friend will reply to my local points which concern my constituency and the surrounding area.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The importance of the arts has been shown by the length of the debate. As hon. Members have said, this is the first time that the arts have been discussed on a Government motion. The debate has gone on longer than the Government's business managers assumed. It is right that that has happened, because the arts are an important subject.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) referred to the cotton mill in Paisley which, some years ago, employed about 15,000 workers but now employs only 350. That picture of industry is repeated throughout the country as new technology has caused fewer people to be employed. It is realistic to accept that fewer people will be employed in industry, even if there is an economic revival and if we correct the problems associated with the Government's policies towards manufacturing industries, and with the fact that we import £7·5 billion more manufactured goods than we export. If we are to compete in the world market place, new technology must be introduced. We cannot bury our heads in the sand.

In future, the work load will have to be distributed differently. Obviously, industries must create the wealth. It is for the Government and Parliament to decide how that wealth should be used. We must ensure that the public have available to them activities in which to participate, whether it is sport or the arts and whether they are viewers or participants. In either case, it is right that public money should be spent in that way. I make no apology for supporting this type of policy. It shows one of the main differences between the Labour party and the Conservative party. The Labour party is prepared to spend public money on providing the essential services required by the electorate.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) referred to the military bands, which have a role to play. I like military bands. They give enjoyment to people in many parts of the country. But I disagree with the hon. Gentleman in one respect. I believe that the Royal Marines school of music in Deal does a far better job than Kneller hall. That is a somewhat biased view because I did my national service in the Royal Marines some years ago.

The Opposition have said that the Government's business incentives scheme tends to have the greatest effect in the best-provided areas and tends to support safe activities. That is true. The scheme does not have the effect on the regions that we would like.

I supported the Government's Budget proposals last year to change taxation arrangements and provide for covenants and support for the arts. That was a welcome move, but I hope that the Government will go further in publicising those changes and ensuring that people are aware of what is available.

The regions do not fare as well as the south, because industry head offices are increasingly based in London, so that there are satellite industries in the regions. There is not, therefore, the same involvement by head office as there was when industry was growing up in Lancashire, the midlands and so on.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) referred to the Royal opera house. He should meet the people there and see exactly what is involved. The scale of operations is much bigger than I had imagined. Opera should not be just for an elite. As my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South said, television has given opera wider appeal than was envisaged.

Mr. Dicks: Sir Peter Hall, in a debate that I had with him, made the same point about the hard work of the opera house and the problems that it faces. He is one of the highest-paid part-time civil servants it has been my misfortune to come across. He has made a fortune out of public subsidies.

Mr. Pike: I do not wish to pursue that line. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman goes to the opera house one morning and sees exactly what is involved. He will find that its problems are much more difficult than those faced by ordinary theatres, which have one long-running production and therefore need only one set at a time. At the opera house, because of rehearsals and different performances, it is common to have three complete sets and a variety of costumes used in one day. I believe that the Royal opera house has a case.

There is controversy about the proposed redevelopment of the opera house site, especially in respect of the demolition of the floral hall. I believe that the scheme is bold and imaginative and will tackle some of the financial problems of Covent Garden. There are many good features in the proposals and we must look to developments of that type.

One Conservative Member suggested that, during the development, the Lyceum would provide a good alternative venue. I do not object to the Lyceum being brought back into use as a theatre, but it would be marvellous if, while Covent Garden cannot be used, the royal opera were sited elsewhere in the United Kingdom. I stress "United Kingdom" because we must remember that there are other areas apart from England. I must point out, however, that I represent an English constituency. My constituents remember when Sadlers Wells and the Old Vic were hosted in Burnley during the war because those companies had to move from London. Nevertheless, we reached a time when there was not a single live theatre left in the town.

The Minister gave an impressive long list of places that he had visited. If he wants to visit Burnley and see what is happening in that constituency, I am sure that my constituents will be pleased to welcome him and to show him what the council is trying to do. The National Trust property, Gawthorpe hall, is in Burnley. It is run partly by Lancashire county council. The Select Committee on the Environment produced an excellent report on historic buildings. It referred to collections being kept in the house where they belong. It is important to do that. Gawthorpe hall contains one art form which has not been mentioned today—needlework and embroidery. The hall contains the Rachel Kay Shuttleworth collection, one of the finest collections in Britain. We are proud of that collection. People come from all over Britain to see it.

Burnley council runs the Towneley hall art gallery and museum. During the summer season, coach trips are made from Blackpool to the museum. This home belonged to the Towneley family and was acquired by the council in the early part of this century. The council does an excellent job. Admission is free. The average number of visitors is between 90,000 and 100,000 a year.

Burnley council's grant-related expenditure assessment figure is the same as that of a council that does not provide a museum and art gallery. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) will reassure me that the Labour party's proposals will seek to correct that. The factor for museums and art galleries is based on the square footage within a borough council area of shops and restaurants. That is a crazy situation. It means that a council that is doing a good job gets exactly the same grant provision as a next-door council that may be doing nothing at all.

When I was leader of the council I and other council members met Ministers from the Department of the Environment, and we met them again after I was elected to this House. We have not yet been able to persuade them to change that system. The system is nonsense and needs to be replaced by one that bears some relationship to the provision of facilities by the local authority.

On 14 August last year Burnley council reopened the building formerly known as the mechanics institute, which was established some 100 years ago. It will now provide educational and other opportunities to people in Burnley. We re-opened it as a multi-purpose arts centre and it is now known as the Burnley Mechanics. When I was leader of the council we spent £229,000 renovating that building. It is adjacent to the town hall and had been allowed to become derelict. It was a listed building and we made it wind and watertight. I was very much involved in the initial stages of the project to ensure that the building was brought back into use to provide an essential amenity for the people of Burnley.

The final cost of the scheme was £2·343 million, but the only grants that we received were £30,000 from the north-west arts council and about £68,000 from the north-west tourist board, which has a tourist office within the building. During the first six months the centre attracted about 26,000 people to pay-for functions, and 75 functions have been held in the main theatre hall. Of course there are other rooms in the building for other events, and rehearsals are held in other parts of the premises. It has bar facilities and a café and those, together with other facilities, have ensured that the centre has become a live part of Burnley town centre.

No one could criticise the council for a single penny of the money that was spent on that centre, but because the council spent that money and was already receiving maximum grant it got no more money from the Government and the cost of running the building has to be completely borne by the ratepayers. The council estimates that the income for the forthcoming year will be £289,000. The cost of running the centre for the same period will be £748,000, giving a net cost of £459,000 which in the case of Burnley means 6p on the rates. That shows how crucial it is to change the assessment factor to assist councils to provide this type of amenity.

My constituency is fortunate in having a large number of amateur groups, all of which are alive and flourishing and provide shows to a first-class standard. In many cases they are as good as the shows in the west end of London and there have been many standing ovations.

It is important that, as well as having spectators, we have participants, and we must encourage participation because at the end of the day that is what it is all about. Before I was elected to this House I worked in industry making television tubes. I still have an interest in television, but live theatre has more to offer and we appreciate seeing the enthusiam and the effort that goes into productions.

There is an extremely good youth theatre in Burnely and that bodes well for the future of our Gilbert and Sullivan society and for all the other societies that we have in Burnley. The youth theatre is exteremely good. It has its own premises in the Quarry theatre in Burnley, thanks to a Manpower Services Commission scheme and the council. The youth theatre has tremendous financial difficulties. It gets some support from the Stocks Massey bequest, a fund established by the brewing family in Burnley. The family is no longer there but the fund still exists and the income from it can be used for this sort of purpose.

The young people in that theatre are important. I have a vested interest in them because, eventually, my daughter wants to go into the theatre and is an active participant in the youth theatre. Not only does that theatre encourage young people to participate in musical shows and plays and other types of entertainment, but it also encourages them to learn other work in front of or behind the stage —work which is an important part of the arts world. The theatre would not survive if people did not do that type of work.

This is the type of venture that we should encourage. The youth theatre staged "West Side Story" at the Burnley Mechanics, had standing ovations every night and the show was booked solid several weeks before it opened. Just over a week ago it staged a performance of a play by Paul Abbott, a scriptwriter for "Coronation Street" who lives in Burnley. The play was based on an idea by the young people and was a great success. We have to encourage that type of creativity, whether in photography that was spoken about earlier or in any other field. We must have arts facilities that people can see and enjoy and in which they can participate. Money spent in that way whether by local authorities, Government, or through sponsorship by industry, is money well spent.

The Government should give greater priority to such activities and I hope that we can persuade them to move in that direction. If we cannot I am sure that the Labour Government when elected will certainly move in that direction.

8.47 pm

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) has spoken with knowledge and enthusiastic loyalty about the arts in his constituency, and his words were expressed in the very best spirit of the debate. Having listened to his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), however, I was left with the clear impression that the one art form that would assuredly flourish under a Labour Government would be the printing of bank notes.

I can offer some comfort to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) who, in all the circumstances, gave us a virtuoso performance by expounding simultaneously the arts policies of the Liberal party and the SDP. There is a predecent for the difficulties in which those two parties find themselves. Maeterlinck shot his cat while he was practising for a duel with Debussy.

The genuineness and effectiveness of the Government's commitment to the arts is manifest. The establishment of the National Heritage Memorial Fund and of authors' public lending right, the launch of the business sponsorship incentive scheme, the 1986 Budget with its incentives for giving to the arts, the achievement of a 15 per cent. increase above the general rise in the cost of living in central Government spending on the arts, in the context of expanding plural funding for the arts, are all landmarks in the success of the Government's policies. In a curmudgeonly style, Opposition Members have had to acknowledge that in recent years the arts in Britain have been a great success.

Mr. Buchan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on this interesting point?

Mr. Howarth: Not at this moment. The hon. Gentleman spoke for 25 minutes. It is now late, and I hope that he will permit me to get a little into my speech.

My right hon. Friend's latest personal achievement is to establish the principle of three-year indicative funding, and that will be enormously valuable. He emphasised the importance of continuity and stability, and the ability of arts organisations to plan ahead. I should like to return to that point.

I am proud to represent Stratford-on-Avon in this House. I am never more proud than on occasions when the subject of our proceedings is the arts. I am proud that the home of the Royal Shakespeare Company is in my constituency, and I am proud to be a governor.

[Mr. Howarth]

The RSC epitomises the excellence of British theatre. Its current repertoire includes highly acclaimed productions of "Richard II", "Macbeth" and "Romeo and Juliet". That is the classic Shakespearean canon, but the company has also been packing them in with its recent revival of "Kiss Me Kate".

The repertoire of its company is worldwide. In 1984-85, the company played in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Basle, Barcelona, Munich, Hamburg, Warsaw, Los Angeles, New York and Washington. In its annual report, the British Council observed that the performances given by the RSC in Warsaw achieved more than any diplomatic initiative to Poland in years.

The RSC makes an important contribution to our economy in the fields of tourism and exports. In 1984-85, the company won the Queen's award for exports. This year, the RSC productions scheduled on Broadway are "Les Miserables" and "Les Liaisons Dangereuses".

I mention these successes because I think that the House should honour such a record, but also because the RSC has fulfilled every behest and maxim of the Government. The Government exort arts organisations to practise self-help and embrace plural funding. The proportion of its costs which the RSC achieves from box office receipts is 60 per cent.—significantly higher as a proportion than in other major subsidised theatres.

The company is now establishing itself in two new theatres at no cost to the taxpayer. The Swan theatre was given, in a most generous benefaction, to the company. Its running costs are separately accounted for, and it is at least breaking even on them. At the end of this month, the company will start to play at the Mermaid theatre, where the RSC management has been able to negotiate an agreement with producers whereby they guarantee costs and carry the risks of any losses that the productions might incur.

The RSC is efficient—the Priestley report testified to that—and it is entrepreneurial. Yet in this year, 1986-87, it is heading towards a deficit of probably £1·1 million. Notwithstanding all the excellence and efforts of the company, this is the prospect. Why should that be so? It is certainly not the case that costs have overrun. They are under budget.

There are two particular causes which have come together in an ill-starred conjunction. In 1985, the decision was taken that the Barbican repertoire for 1986 should be somewhat more experimental than had previously been the case. Plays of excellent dramatic quality, including "Mephisto" and "The Danton Affair", were not box office hits. However, the company, in staging these productions, was responding positively to criticisms that it felt were constructive and it felt that it should take risks. Furthermore, in 1986 there was a significant fall in the number of visitors from overseas, principally because of the alarm about threats of terrorism. The consequence of these two factors was that box office receipts at the Barbican came out 50 per cent. below what they had been budgeted to be.

Theatre is inevitably a high risk business. It is inevitable that there will be ups and downs. But with our system of financing it is impossible for an organisation such as the RSC to ride the occasional bad year. The problems that the company has experienced financially in 1986-87 are one-off problems — there is no reason why they will recur. None the less, it will be left with the consequences of these problems for a long time unless action is taken, and it is necessary for us to look carefully again at the long-term funding of the company. With great respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), there is no way in which a business such as the RSC can build up reserves to create a contingency fund so that it can be tided over the occasional bad year in the way that another fully commercial business could be.

The Government commissioned the Priestley report to ascertain whether the organisations at which it looked were efficient, and to seek advice on what would be the appropriate pattern of funding for the future. As the House knows, Priestly gave the RSC a clean bill of health in terms of the efficiency of its management. However, the report went on to say that the company was "palpably underfunded". It urged on the Government the pressing need to establish conditions of financial stability. It said that the Government should write off the accumulated deficit and raise the base grant to a realistic £4·9 million in the money of that time and thereafter maintain it in real terms.

The response of the Government was given by my right hon. Friend's predecessor, Lord Gowrie, in the other place. He said that the Government broadly accepted the findings and conclusons of the Priestley report, and he acted on that. The deficit was written off, and the base grant was indeed established at £4·9 million to enable the company

"to operate on a satisfactory financial basis in the future."

Lord Gowrie made it clear that his purpose was to establish a satisfatory base line. In saying that he broadly accepted the Priestely recommendations that must indeed have been his intention, because the central Priestely recommendation was that that baseline should be established and maintained.

The arts world and a much wider public welcomed and applauded that decision. However, as is inevitable — Opposition Members delude themselves if they suppose it would ever not be the case—there were constraints on public spending and there were competing claims on the Arts Council budget. As a consequence, in practice the base line funding, although established at the new level, was progressively eroded in successive years. In a period in which the RPI has risen by 15 per cent., the Arts Council grant to the RSC has risen by only 6 per cent. In the same period, the RSC's earnings rose by 33 per cent. In 1984-85 and 1985-86, in those difficult years when the baseline funding was being eroded the RSC broke even because of its good management and efforts. It could hardly have done more than it did. As a consequence of circumstances for which it cannot reasonably be blamed, it is however, heading towards deficit and the prospects for the company are grave.

What are its choices? It could carry forward the deficit, but that would mean that in future its budget would be increasingly burdened by compounding interest costs. Plainly, that would not be sensible. If it does not receive additional aid, it will be obliged to close one of its major centres. It can either close the Barbican or the Shakespeare Memorial theatre. I must tell the House that the council of management of the RSC is seriously contemplating those possibilities. But even as it contemplates them it knows that it is absurd to do so. If it had to act on either of those possibilities, it would destroy the raison d'être of the theatre. There is no alternative but for the Government to help.

Mr. Buchan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: This is an important subject, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue. I am in the middle of trying to explain my case.

The Government must once agan accept the logic of Priestley, which is inescapable. The Government will have to write off the deficit and once more give a realistic grant, or else we shall lose this great national artistic institution.

I appreciate the difficulty of my right hon. Friend as to indexation. I do not ask him specifically to commit himself to indexing the base grant for the RSC. The principle of indexation is a dangerous one in the wider context of public finances, and I can readily imagine that if my right hon. Friend were to commit himself to indexing the grant for any institution he would find himself beset by hordes of jealous claimants at the Office of Arts and Libraries. That situation would clearly be difficult and unsatisfactory.

What I do ask my hon. Friend is that he should look carefully at the circumstances of this case, at the qualities and value of the RSC, at the details of the predicament in which it has found itself, that he should assess what may be the balance of responsibility as between the company, the Arts Council and the Government for the problems that have arisen, that he should recollect the analysis that was made by his predecessor, and that he should accept that the Government and the Arts Council between them have a duty to ensure that the RSC does not, through no fault of its own, encounter catastrophe.

My right hon. Friend's serious and practical championship of the arts is widely recognised. I do not ask him to give here and now his detailed response to the problems that I have described, but I hope that we shall receive a considered, constructive response from him shortly.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I am sure that the Minister will have listened sympathetically to the speech that has just been made, although to some extent it contradicts some of the hon. Gentleman's economic and political philosophies, but we all have that problem from time to time.

I do not know who wrote the Minister's speech at the opening of the debate, but whoever did, he or she is in line to become a scriptwriter for a Ken Russell fantasy. The film opens with the Minister's weak and anaemic voice intoning that there has been an economic miracle in Britain in the late 1980s and that all the people are prosperous and joyous. Meanwhile, the camera focuses on a screaming baby whose mother is homeless, cuts to a youth who is unemployed and has slashed his wrists and then to a woman who is flooded with tears in a DHSS office. The Minister lives in a different world to the one in which I live, but I shall not develop that theme.

One of the disturbing developments that has emerged in the locust years of this Conservative Government is the notion that art is an industry like any other in the modern world. Therefore, its output should be determined by market forces, its practitioners should make a close study of consumerism, the problems of marketing and distribution and the artist should no longer regard himself as a creative individual but as an entrepreneur who, if he wishes to maximise his profits, must learn to deal in oligopoly, duopoly, loss leaders and a variety of other economic concepts.

In this system, where art is an industry, we are supposed to give thanks when 1,000 craft shops open up this year. I am not sure what we are supposed to do when the same 1,000 craft shops go bankrupt next year.

In this system some people will succeed. I have no doubt that the new superstars of the art world—the designers—will succeed, particularly if, in addition to their skills in design, they are prepared to study the complex subjects of advertising and marketing and they can cope with psychology, sexual relations, fantasy, identity, escapism and decoration.

But if we live in this world in which art is an industry, as we see the growth of mass production and consumerism it is inevitable that art will become more universal. It is certain that art will lose much of its sense of place, history and identity in terms of locality, community, race, class and nation.

If art is entirely to be regarded as an industry, much of it will be ephemeral in the modern world, much of it will be junk that degrades the artist and the consumer, and it will all be described as value free. Possibly the best and only thing that will come out of it will be that all over the world we can put on our Benetton tee shirts and designer jeans and watch "Dallas" without shame. That is not a notion of art that we should encourage people to stick to, although it is one in which the Conservative party would like the public to believe.

However, there are other notions of art. There is the notion that art is some kind of idealised activity that is good for us. I suppose that in that group I would put the Minister with his what I would describe as Benthamite utilitarianism. I would also put in that group the Fabian idealism of many Opposition Members.

Often when people say that art is good for us they are saying that it is part of the process of self discovery. But in that notion of art—it is not one that I particularly like or hold to—the artist often sees himself as some kind of superior person; some kind of philosopher king. That is a notion which artists in the western world have basically ascribed to themselves since the period of the romantics.

There is a third view of art—someone was asking for some definition of art and artists earlier; he is not here to hear it but never mind—and that is that art is an activity which mediates between the world as it is and the world as we would like it to be. If it does that, it performs roughly the same function that we as politicians perform. I cannot think what else we do if it is not that.

If art performs that function of mediation it is likely to be creative, imaginative, intellectual and emotional, and, because the world is critical and disturbing and full of conflict, art will be critical, disturbing and full of conflict. I have some sympathy with that notion of art.

But there is another notion of art which is that art is an instrument of social change, perhaps best expressed by Stuart Hall when he says that the idea that we can get radical change while the dominant cultural attitudes remain unchanged in society is patently ridiculous.

According to that concept of art, culture becomes a battleground for change. It does so because it affects all aspects of our life—what we wear, how and under what conditions goods are produced, the very language that we use and the images by and through which we express ourselves.

In that sense, art is not just about painting, theatre and dance; it is about education, architecture, town planning and ecology. I want to come back to that concept of art in a moment because it is the one with which I have most sympathy and it is one to which my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) referred.

But there is a last definition of art that we have seen recently and that is the definition of art that we saw in a six-part series on television called "State of the Art" written by Sandy Nairne, who, I gather is one of our supporters, or so he told me at a recent conference. I hope that that is right since I have now made it public.

In "State of the Art" Sandy Nairne seemed to be saying that art is a condition which exists in a vacuum; that it is fragmented, without construction, and that somehow it defies any form of analysis. Therefore, he is capable of making six programmes in which he can discuss art without saying a single word about the way in which the Arts Council mediates state patronage. I find that bizarre. I also find it bizarre that he can present to the British public the idea that one can see post-modernism as a form of self-alienation which is pushed to such a degree that we could even be made to view our own destruction as an aesthetic experience of the highest order. I simply cannot view art in that way.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): Rather laboured.

Mr. Sedgemore: I notice that the "son of civilisation" is twittering away as usual, but if the "son of civilisation" could pause for a moment he may learn something to his advantage, even about his father's paintings.

If we can accept the notion that art can be an instrument of change, we should consider what has taken place in other countries. This morning I was reading a paper by Franco Bianchini. He saids that in 1976, when the Socialists and Communists took over from the Christian Democrats in Rome, they decided that they wished to bring together art and culture together. They wanted to show that there were no great divisions and schisms between the working class and middle class view of art. They achieved that with the Estate Romana. There are three reasons why we could not achieve a similar success in this country.

First, Rome has a citywide governing body, but we have abolished the GLC. Secondly, one cannot have this type of big artistic concept without heavily subsidised public transport systems because such a concept does not operate from the periphery but from the centre. However, public transport subsidies have been reduced and removed in London. Thirdly, this type of notion depends on the insistence of people that art is important and that theatre, ballet and dance are at least as important as spaghetti westerns or horror movies. Unlike the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) I believe that we must break away from the latter notion. We could learn a lesson from Italy about the ability to use art as an instrument of social change.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South that possibly the most powerful cultural influence on the lives of most people in Britain is broadcasting and inside broadcasting — television. If we want to change the world and change attitudes towards the world, access to broadcasting and access to television is one of the most important influences that we can discuss. It should not be discussed in the abstract but in specific terms.

By and large, we tend to discuss television purely in terms of how much television time we are prepared — either through the IBA or by statute — to give to independent producers. I accept that that is important. I am in favour of giving 25 per cent. of the franchise holders programme time to independent producers, but let us also give 25 per cent. of all the time of those franchise holders to the community. Let us allow the community and the people reflect themselves rather than see themselves reflected by other people. We should give them editorial control over some news and current affairs programmes. Let us give them control over drama, entertainment and other things that are shown on television. It is important that the end result is not bad television so let us also give the community the directors, producers and professional crews to produce good television.

If we truly believe in plurality in our society—it is a word that people throw around with astonishing ease—above all else we must break up the monopolies held by those who hold television franchises so that control is not given solely to persons of wealth and power. If we are serious about breaking up those monopolies and achieving that type of plurality, my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South is right — one cannot do that if broadcasting is kept under the control of a Ministry that is concerned with suppression, repression, vetting, spying and censorship.

Broadcasting belongs to a Ministry for the arts. Perhaps for other reasons, the Select Committee has come up with what surely is an eminently sensible all-party proposal. I hope that my hon. Friend and I can persuade our Front Bench to go further along the road than they have already done and I hope that the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) can also persuade his Front Bench to go further along that road.

Although this has been an interesting debate, I am sure that hon. Members have heard too many speeches already. I wish, however, to make one more point. Throughout Britain there are thousands of schools, but when I worked in television I came across only one, the Tower Hamlets school for girls, where art is part of a core curriculum. This issue reflects a simple proposal contained in a Gulbenkian report many years ago. Why is it that no education authority in Britain has had the determination and imagination to make art part of the core curriculum? If we were prepared to do that, we would show individuals from an early age that we are serious about the importance of the subject.

9.15 pm

Mr. Fisher: This has been a debate of sharply distinct views, and in being so it has addressed the central question posed by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), which was whether there is still a bipartisan arts policy in the House. The answer is that there is not. That is clear from the speeches made from both sides of the House. Any cosy agreement that might have existed before exists no longer because there has been a recognition on both sides that there are important, sharp and distinct differences in our political views.

That is not to say that there is no common ground. There is some important common ground on which we can build. There is a common interest and sincerity of view and the House well knows the sincerity, concern and expertise of the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South, for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) and for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). They have brought their important knowledge and concern to previous arts debates and they have done so again today. The same can be said of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud), the alliance's spokesman on the arts.

I am sure that the House will have been impressed also by the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan), whose work and knowledge has been acknowledged by hon. Members on both sides of the House, it having been demonstrated in the sittings of the Select Committee on Education, Science and the Arts. The House will have been interested in the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), in what might have been his first speech in an arts debate. He made many telling and interesting comments from a local authority perspective following his experience as a leader of a local authority. I can assure him that I have taken on board his remarks about rate support grant.

There might be some agreement on specifics. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House appreciate the excellent report in 1982 of the Select Committee, which was chaired by Mr. Christopher Price. It is sad that the Government have not implemented more of its recommendations. There are many constructive recommendations to be implemented in future on the basis of a mutuality of interest.

There may even be common ground on the result of the cuts that have been imposed. The Minister might not agree, but I think that there is a general understanding on both sides of the House. The clear and well described comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton brought the result home to us. Hon. Members will remember him talking about buckets in museums and the comments of Sir Roy Strong that he quoted. I could assure my hon. Friend, if he were in his place, that one of the first and most urgent tasks for an incoming Labour Government will be to carry out a national audit to ascertain the state of our arts buildings. The Minister could begin that work if he were seriously interested in ascertaining the state of the arts in Britain. It would not be a costly exercise, and in taking that course he would demonstrate his good intent. The result of the exercise might be extremely embarrassing for the Government following their stewardship over the past seven years. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would find, as the Select Committee has found and as hon. Members on both sides know, that the fabric of many of our finest arts buildings is in an appalling condition.

There might even be some common ground on the need for more money to be spent on the arts. With the exception of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), I think that that is a common concern, whether it be the Royal Shakespeare company or other forms and media within the arts.

Mr. Cormack: It is refreshing to hear the hon. Gentleman's more considered comments in replying to the debate when compared with some of his introductory comments.

Mr. Fisher: I am grateful for that compliment. I fear, however, that this is where we may start to part company. I have sketched out the areas in which there has been agreement, and now I must turn to the important and real differences. They are not about the level or even the source of funding, whether it is from local authorities, the private sector or central Government. They are about perspective. They are political and economic differences.

It is quite clear to anybody listening to the debate that the perspective from which the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) about cultural industries should be seen — the importance of the new technologies, about satellite, publishing and broadcasting — is not fully understood by Conservative Members. I urge them to look carefully at my hon. Friend's remarks. We must look into our own lives and see that the arts are not just a narrow definition of the subsidised arts that Conservative Members are talking about. They are a far wider and more powerful force in our lives. That is the big difference between the two sides of the House.

There is also a difference in ideology. The hon. Member for Canterbury talked about our great tradition. He mentioned the great heritage of acting. His knowledge of and sincerity about the theatre is undoubted. Of course he is right. We have a great tradition, but it is only part of the culture of this country. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West said, it reflects the brilliant ideas of people who have lived and are living here. But, as he said, they are essentially male, white and educated, mainly living in the south of the country, and fairly well off. It is perfectly fair and quite correct that their ideas should be expressed as well as possible, but they are not the expressions of all people in society.

We fool ourselves when we think that the great expressions of our culture, as characterised in our great acting tradition, carry the aspirations and experience of all our people. As my hon. Friend said, they do not carry the experience of people who are unemployed, who live in housing estates or who come from a totally different ethnic, religious and cultural background. It is important that we are a multicultural society, with cultures expressed in different art forms in different ways. That concept has not yet been fully taken on board by Conservative Members. It is not only a matter of that sort of experience; it is a matter, through art forms, of expressing how one sees oneself in relation to other people, the power that one may or may not have over determining one's life, the economics in which one lives, the ability to express oneself through work, one's relationship to one's housing and to one's potential.

The great heritage that has been referred to, though it exists and we are proud of it because it will carry our culture into the future, is not a complete picture. We have a wider culture than that.

It begs the question of whose culture we are talking about. Who owns the culture? In a magnificent and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newham North-West recognised, off-the-cuff, impromptu speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) put his finger on many crucial areas which represent a distinct difference between hon. Members on both sides of the House. He mentioned the concentration of ownership in this culture and the national press. Three corporations, which are controlled by proprietors, apparently own 74 per cent. of circulation. That cannot be in the interests of a wide variety of views in our society. My hon. Friend might also have mentioned the media and the way in which the same three companies and other companies are buying not only into newspapers but into radio and television and now satellite and film. Surely Conservative Members can see the importance of that and the power that it gives over the means of expression and, therefore, what can be expressed. My hon. Friend might also have mentioned books. Conservative Members must realise that they have only to go to the high streets in their constituencies to see the narrow range of books that are available for sale. There are 300,000 books in stock in this country, and 50,000 are printed every year. They contain some of the greatest, most provocative, challenging, interesting, compelling ideas in any language, yet only a narrow range of books is available in the high street stores.

Mr. Cormack: The hon. Gentleman's points are forceful and important, and nobody would dismiss them, but is it not far better that three private people should be fighting for control of circulation rather than that there should be state control? I do not suggest that the hon. Gentleman is advocating state control, but is there not some common ground between us?

Mr. Fisher: I shall deal with that point later.

Mr. Buchan: The dissemination of journals and books is controlled by two distributors—W. H. Smith and Son and John Menzies. I know that that is so, because I have been trying to get Tribune disseminated through them and there have been difficulties.

Mr. Fisher: The crucial point is that both in the case of the national press and the distribution of books and records we see the free market, so called, narrowing and constricting choice. The Conservative party tells us that the free market widens opportunity and that it also widens choice, but we see that exactly the reverse is true and that the free market and the interplay of ownership narrow free choice, whether in retailing or in the ownership of newspapers.

The next Labour Government will seek to widen the range of press ownership. They will seek diversity of ownership, not ownership by the state. Britain is the only country that imposes virtually no regulations over press ownership. That cannot be in the long-term interests of our culture or of our democracy. These are substantial differences between the two sides of the House.

Furthermore, that control is not just a question of ownership. It takes other forms. In a part of his speech, with which I did not fully agree, my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) referred to the Reithian concept of broadcasting, which is to inform, educate and entertain. They have been valuable linchpins of our public sector broadcasting philosophy, but they need to be augmented and extended. The audience is thought to have a passive role, either listening to radio or watching television and being the recipient of somebody else's views and somebody else's culture. The opportunities that the technical capability of community radio offer provide us with the hope of a different and a much more intereactive relationship between audiences that will extend those valuable Reithian concepts to a participating and a plural system of broadcasting.

There are huge differences of view among hon. Members about censorship and contol. Although the Conservative party does not understand this, people all over the country, of all political persuasions, were shocked when they saw on their television screens the arm of the state, in the form of the police, breaking into offices in the middle of the night and taking away rolls of film. It was a slur and a stain on the culture of this country. I hope that Conservative Members will understand the importance of that point in this arts debate, because it goes to the heart of the question about who controls our culture and whose culture it is, anyway.

There are substantial political, economic and industrial differences between the two sides of the House. The Government's view is narrow and wholly out of date. It is also wholly out of tune with people's experience. Furthermore, it is a very controlled view, whether of ownership or censorship. The next Labour Government will offer a far wider and more plural and enabling view. It will provide much greater choice for the consumer and also a much greater opportunity of choice for the producer and the artist.

The points that were made by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South will be taken on board. Planning, transport, jobs and housing must interrelate so that people are able to reach arts locations. The next Labour Government will set in train a building expansion programme that will respond to the needs of the people. We must ensure that we build a physically acceptable society. Houses are physical pieces of sculpture. We must create an environment that is worth living in.

There are huge differences between the two sides of the House. We reject the Government's restricted view of the arts and many of the points that have been made tonight. We shall therefore vote against the Government's motion.

9.29 pm

Mr. Luce: At least there is one piece of common ground between both sides of the House: this has been a good-humoured debate in which there has been widespread participation by hon. Members on both sides. That in itself justifies the decision of the Government to have a debate on the arts on a substantive motion. My records go back only 30 years but I am told that for at least 30 years there has been no debate on the arts on a substantive motion in Government time. The fact that the debate has gone on for a considerable period demonstrates that the arts is a singularly important subject and that not only hon. Members but many people throughout the country care about it.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on his maiden speech as spokesman on the arts for the Labour party. I disagree, however, with much of what he said, particularly in his opening and closing remarks. I listened, too, with respect to the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan). For 18 months he and I were opposite numbers. He cares passionately about the arts. Again, he has a different attitude and approach to the arts; nevertheless, I respect his views. I also noted the different approach between him and the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. I remain baffled about Labour party policy. It is confusing on defence, to say the least, and it is even more confusing on the arts.

I deplore the habit of Opposition Members, including the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, of feeling constantly that they have to spread gloom and doom about what is happening in the arts world when they know perfectly well, if they consider the scene on the ground throughout the country, that expansion is taking place. I think they feel that if they accept that something good is happening, the Government will immediately step in and claim all the credit. The credit goes in two ways—first, to the people, the consumers, who want to enjoy the arts, and secondly, to the great talent in artistry of all kinds. That is proved by the great and growing interest shown by the public.

I criticise the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, too for his tunnel vision. He talked about the need for a broad strategy yet the Opposition litmus test of success in the arts always seems to be whether there is Government funding. The Opposition adopt a churlish attitude to the private sector. The hon. Gentleman brought in the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), with whom I disagree on many issues. Again the hon. Gentleman poured cold water on the concept of encouraging the private sector to play its part.

There is also a tendency for some Opposition Members —I do not think this applies to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central—to pour considerable scorn on the attitude of the consumer who, after all, is the person who spends more money on the arts than anyone else, and who decides what he wants to see and what is good and bad. Yet Her Majesty's Opposition and sections of the arts world seem to think that creativity and consumerism do not go together. That is an astonishing attitude.

There have been many stimulating and interesting speeches. I do not think the House would wish me to answer every single point. Indeed, I could imagine the reaction if I were to try to do that. However, I pick on my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) because he made a colourful speech. He reflected the feeling of many people, to which I referred earlier, that there should not be taxpayer support for the arts. I made it plain that I disagreed with that view.

I hope that my hon. Friend will be pleased that the Bech theatre at Hillingdon, which I think is in his constituency, is being run effectively by commercial management and as a result is saving the taxpayer and the ratepayer a considerable amount of money.

I listened with great interest and care to the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), who represents that constituency marvellously and is a governor of the Royal Shakespeare Company, which brings the highest credit to this country and the greatest enjoyment to many people of all backgrounds. What the hon. Gentleman had to say must be taken into account very carefully, especially by the Arts Council, which has to take the direct decision on the level of funding, but it is important that I know what he feels about it.

My hon. Friend realises that the Royal Shakespeare Company, like the royal opera house, has implemented many of the recommendations of the Priestley report in consultation with the Arts Council and that the Government agreed to provide additional funds to eliminate deficits and to increase basic funding for both these companies. I am glad to note that my hon. Friend accepted the argument that if we start on a policy of insulating one or two arts bodies from the world of inflation by inflation-proofing, we will be in an extremely difficult area. I am glad that my hon. Friend acknowledges that would not be the right way to proceed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) made a very important speech in which he rightly drew attention to the range of arts activities in Norwich and in particular the Norwich Theatre Royal and the importance of touring companies. I accept that entirely. If our policy is, as it must be, to bring about excellence in the arts and to make it available to the maximum number of people, touring, especially by the best companies, is of great importance. I heard his views with great care. My hon. Friend spoke of the importance and the value to his area of the Arts Council's "Glory of the Garden" policy of shifting more resources and support to other parts of the country. I, too, welcome that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) has devoted years in this House to supporting and working for the heritage and all forms of art. He made an important speech. He asked my opinion about the royal opera house and long-term development plans. No decisions have yet been taken and planning approval still has to be given by the city of Westminster. Nevertheless, I regard its longer term development proposals, which are based upon private enterprise loans, as highly imaginative and deserving of much interest. I still have to take the decisions but I place my view on record in response to my hon. Friend's question.

I am glad that my hon. Friend drew attention to the importance of crafts. At least 20,000 people in this country enjoy crafts in one way or another. I hope that number is expanding rapidly. I welcome most warmly the fact that my hon. Friend has played a leading part in launching a new scheme to allow fellowships for young people in crafts. I give my strongest support to that. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the initiative he has taken.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) made a splendid speech. If he will forgive me, I will not dwell on the importance of military bands because he has drawn that to the attention of the House and of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on many occasions. On the question of the danger, as he puts it, of VAT being imposed on imports of works of art, I agree with him that it is a matter of the greatest importance. We have a highly successful art trade in this country. Both the sixth and seventh directives could threaten this trade. Let me make my position absolutely clear. I will oppose anything that I believe would damage the successful art trade of this country. I am convinced that is the view of the Government.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) made an interesting speech raising many issues. I am glad that, as I understood it, he endorsed the arm's-length principle as I had been anxious in recent months about what seemed to be a weakening of the all-party support for that principle. If we break away from that principle there will be a great danger of direct central Government intervention in artistic decisions. I believe that the freedom of expression of artists is of fundamental importance.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Luce: I hope that the House will bear with me; it is right that I should answer the questions raised in the debate. The hon. Gentleman has already made his speech.

[Mr. Luce]

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East also drew attention to the marketing scheme. I should correct one point. The hon. Gentleman felt that the scheme did not help those who did not have much money to spend because the range within which people can apply for an award is between £5,000 and £10,000, to be matched by the Government. It is, however, perfectly possible for a group of subsidised companies to get together and put in a joint claim. I hope that that will help smaller companies.

The hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan), who is no longer present, referred to the importance of supporting the arts in all parts of the country, including his own area. I should point out that there has been an enormous shift of resources from the Arts Council to the regional arts associations, which now receive some £20 million of taxpayers' money to support their work in all parts of the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) made an important speech. I commend the marvellous work that he has done as a founder member of the Theatres Trust and the role that he plays today. I am grateful to him for his speech and for drawing attention to the Cork report, which is still being considered by the Arts Council, on the importance of the work of the theatre in this country. I believe that I gave my hon. Friend some wrong information from a sedentary position. I thought that he was referring to the Swan theatre at Stratford, to which Mr. Koch, an American, gave magnificent support. I understand that my hon. Friend was referring to the Old Vic. In that instance, the support was given by a Canadian, Mr. Ed Mirvish. Again, I am grateful indeed to my hon. Friend for his speech on the theatre.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central referred to public libraries, and it should be made clear that my duties cover libraries as well as the arts. I believe that this country has almost the finest set of public libraries in the world. They are outstanding. The hon. Gentleman sought to suggest that the system was collapsing, but that is nonsense. He highlighted certain selective figures, saying that 200 libraries had closed, but libraries have also been opened. Just recently, I opened one in Princes Risborough. It is not in the least surprising that there is such mobility, with some libraries closing and others opening. For the next financial year, there will be an increase of 14 per cent. in the amount of money allocated to libraries and local museums. I stress, too, that there has been an increase in the number of books stocked by libraries. In 1979 there were 106 million. Today there are 113 million. If the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central says that there has been a decline, he is entirely wrong. I must make it clear that his comments about a decline in the public library service were absolute nonsense.

Mr. Fisher: If the Minister is telling the library world that the public library service will receive an increase of 14 per cent. in the money available to it next year, I am sure that the whole House will welcome that. But my figures about the book fund cut are true and accurate, and reflected in every local authority public library service.

The number of books on the shelves depends on how fast they are depreciated and moved off, but one has only to go into a public library to see the very poor state of the books. Moreover, because prices have risen astronomically only a tiny proportion of the needs of local communities can be met by any library authority. I hope that the Minister will take that on board.

Mr. Luce: I take seriously what the hon. Gentleman says, because it is important that we maintain the high standard of our public libraries. The book fund, allocation of money, as chosen by English local authorities—it is their choice—has gone down, not by 34 per cent., as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central suggested, but by 9 per cent. The fact is that the number of books has gone up. It is up to the libraries to decide how to allocate their money. There are information services in our libraries and an increase in leisure services and there is also the need to maintain our book services. It is for them to choose how they spend the increase in the money that they will be allocated in the coming year.

We have had a full and constructive debate on the arts. There is a serious divide in some respects between the two sides of the House but, where there can be common ground, I welcome it. My position and that of the Government is that we want to create the best possible climate and framework for the arts to flourish. We want there to be the greatest degree of freedom of expression and the greatest scope for all the talents of British artists and for the arts to flourish.

Mr. Freud rose——

Mr. Luce: I believe that that is best achieved by encouraging the greatest possible diversity of funding of the arts. That in itself enables one to spread the risks and to guarantee the greatest freedom of expression. I wish only that the Opposition would encourage a little more the flowering of funding and encourage greater support from the private sector and not depend just on the state sector.

Surely the key test is what is happening in the arts on the ground today. The story is a good one. The arts are flowering and that is due largely to the achievements of the British people and British artists. We are creating a healthy framework for that to succeed. The reputation of British arts is high in Britain and the world today. Therefore, I call upon the House to support this motion and reject the amendment.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the Government on the success of its arts policy which is resulting in an expansion of arts and crafts throughout the country and greater protection of the national heritage; approves the Government's strategy of increasing the inflow of funds to the arts from a diversity of sources; welcomes the tax changes, including the new payroll giving scheme, which will stimulate giving to the arts by individuals and companies; applauds the Government's continuing commitment to promoting sponsorship of the arts through the Business Sponsorship Incentive Scheme; endorses the new arts marketing scheme, designed to encourage a keener awareness of the benefits to the arts of good marketing; and acknowledges the political commitment shown by the Government in the form of record levels of public support for the arts.

EC—United States Trade

10.12 pm

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the unnumbered explanatory memorandum dated 31st January 1987, submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry, describing a draft Decision concerning the Agreement between the European Community and the United States of America for the conclusion of negotiations under General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) Article XXIV.6, and European Community Document No. 5062/87 and the Department's unnumbered explanatory memorandum, dated 23rd Feburary 1987, on the implementation of the Agreement; and welcomes the Agreement as the means of averting an exchange of retaliatory and counter-retaliatory trade measures between the United States and the Community which would have very serious consequences for EC-US trade, for the multilateral trading systems and for progress in the new round of multilateral trade negotiations now beginning in GATT.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained to the House on 3 February, in view of the urgency of settling the dispute by 30 January, we considered it better not to delay adoption of the Council Decision regarding the agreement until the Select Committee had had an opportunity to consider it. I should like to assure the House that no disrespect was intended in not following the normal scrutiny procedures on that occasion.

I should also inform the House that, in addition to the two implementing regulations described in the explanatory memorandum dated 23 February, the Commission has now submitted two further proposals to deal with the technical administration of the tariff quota and the technical administration of the tariff quotas for dried onions and plywood. These proposals were produced only yesterday in Brussels as informal working group documents, and they will be subject to the normal scrutiny procedures as soon as possible.

The motion that we are debating recognises the terms of settlement of a trade dispute between the European Community and the United States which, had it been allowed to escalate, could have caused severe damage to the trading prospects of certain industries on both sides of the Atlantic. The Community held firm under duress and in the face of threats to its trade from the United States which were not justified. The trade of several member states, including the United Kingdom, was directly threatened with prohibitive duty levels in the United States. We continued to work—in the end successfully—for a negotiated settlement, while making it clear that if the United States raised tariffs illegally and unilaterally we would respond.

There is, from time to time, talk in the press and other media about "trade wars" between the Community and the United States. Trade wars start like other wars—that is to say, in a mutual or perhaps unilateral view that the customary diplomatic processes of negotiation are no longer valid.

One side takes the view that the other side is applying unfair discrimination against its exports and takes retaliatory action against imports from the other side, which then leads to a series of further counter-retaliatory measures. The United States and the Community have not fallen into that trap. There has been no trade war. But the risks remain, with United States' protectionists continuing to make much of the estimated $170 billion United States trade deficit last year.

Hon. Members will have read reports of a series of disputes over trade matters between the Community and the United States. The background is as follows. The United States Congress passed a number of measures last autumn which have had an adverse effect on imports, including imports from the United Kingdom. Consultations on, and objections to, these measures are being pursued by the Community—as they should be—in the general agreements on tariffs and trade under established procedures. The same is true of certain discriminatory measures taken by the United States Administration.

The United States has made an agreement with the Government of Japan to monitor the price of semi-conductors exported not only to the United States but also to third markets including the Community. It has also made approaches to some other countries about limited exports of machine tools to the United States in a way which is contrary to the undertaking made at the GATT meeting last September not to introduce new trade restrictions outside the framework of GATT. It is true that the United States Administration has resisted many calls for protectionism in Washington and deserves some credit for that. The proposal once more that the Community should impose a tax on oils and fats to improve revenue under the common agricultural policy and narrow the price differential between dairy products and other oils and fats is plainly undesirable. The United States has threatened retaliation against Community trade if this proposal is adopted. My right hon. Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary has made clear the British Government's opposition to that.

Although there are a number of disputes with the United States, there is as yet no trade war. That is important because British, like United States, industry has a great deal to lose in transatlantic trade. Last year, our exports to the United States were worth £10·3 billion, and we took in return imports of £8·5 billion, making a surplus in our favour of £1·8 billion. For the Community as a whole, two-way trade with the United States in 1985 was over $110 billion, with an advantage to the Community of $13 billion.

Before I turn to the details of the motion itself I should like to emphasise one important point. It is said that nobody wins from a trade war, but at the same time the United Kingdom and its Community partners have to defend to the full their legitimate trade interests. The House would be disturbed if I argued otherwise. The Government are therefore extremely concerned by the introduction in the United States Congress of the Textile and Apparel Bill. That is claimed to accord with GATT, but since the agreement in Punta del Este on a standstill on protectionist measures, to which the United States was a party, it clearly does not.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already told the United States Administration in plain terms that that Bill would, if enacted, have extremely damaging consequences for our textile and clothing industries. If the Bill is enacted, despite the stated opposition of the Administration, the United Kingdom would be bound to consider with its partners in the Community what retaliatory action against United States exports would be appropriate in accordance with our international obligations.

I shall now deal with the detail of the motion we are discussing tonight. When Spain and Portugal joined the Community last year, that fact was reflected in changes to the common customs tariff of the Community. Under the terms of GATT, articles XXIV and XXVIII, in such circumstances the partners in a new customs union are required not to apply levels of protection which would be higher overall than those previously applied by the constituent parties; and if the level of protection is increased, appropriate compensation must be offered to the other GATT members affected by the increases, in the form of concessions elsewhere. The United States stood to lose markets in Spain for corn and sorghum as a result of the imposition in 1986 of the Community system of variable import levies on cereals which created a large preference for supplies of those and similar cereals from other Community countries. The United States estimated the value of that trade at some $400 million.

The Community recognised that the terms of GATT entitled the United States to some compensation in these circumstances. But the Community argued that United States exporters stood to gain—though the benefit could not of course be quantified — from the progressive reduction of tariffs and quantitative restrictions on imports of manufactured goods into Spain and Portugal during the transitional period.

The United States did not accept that interpretation of the GATT provisions. It announced in May 1986 that unless the Community was prepared to negotiate appropriate compensation with it, essentially at levels which were clearly excessive, it would impose restrictions on imports from the Community. Some suggestions were made as to the classes of goods which might be subject to retaliatory measures. In practice, and despite an interim agreement during our Presidency that a negotiated settlement should be sought by 31 December, it was impossible within that deadline to narrow the gap between the two sides. Accordingly, the United States announced on 30 December 1986 that, unless agreement was reached between the two sides by the end of January, the import duties applied by the United States to certain imports from the Community would be increased to 200 per cent. The products specified included bottled gin and cognac, several types of cheese and other agricultural products.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Does my hon. Friend accept that the position adopted by the American Government in January regarding for example, the export of Beefeater gin to the American market was unacceptable and intellectually irrational in view of American support for Spanish and Portuguese accession to the Community? Does my hon. Friend agree that if the Americans try such protectionism again the Government will strongly oppose it?

Mr. Clark: Yes, it would certainly be extremely damaging. The American action was highly discriminatory as it was directly targeted on the United Kingdom. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry emphasised to the Commission the Government's extreme concern about this. Certainly that was reflected in the resolute and ultimately successful negotiating position taken by the Commission.

All the products concerned would have effectively been shut out of the American market by such high duties. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East said, that would have had especially penal results on the United Kingdom's gin exports. British exports of bottled gin to the United States are alone worth $75 million a year. In return, the Community announced on 15 January that, if the proposed United States measures were implemented, it would retaliate with an additional levy on United States exports of corn gluten feed and rice.

The Commission's objective was to negotiate with the United States Administration an agreement that, consistent with the Community view on what was due, satisfied at least in part United States domestic pressures. On 30 January the Council agreed to a package under which for a period of four years from 1987 to 1990 Spain will import not less than 2·3 million tonnes of feed grains at reduced levy rates, albeit reduced by the volume of imports of certain cereal substitutes into Spain. Most of these feed grains can be expected to be provided by the United States. Further, the Community agreed to reduced tariffs on certain agricultural and industrial products for the same period. These included certain fruit juices, avocados, roasted nuts and bourbon. Industrial items include various bromides, anti-knock preparations, epoxy resins and aluminium.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Not necessarily in that order.

Mr. Clark: I do not know if it is the absurdity of the list or some innate desire on the part of the House to lighten the atmosphere, but I believe that it is faintly ridiculous.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): What about the bromide?

Mr. Clark: The bromide is being administered, but it is the stimulant that perhaps is lacking.

The tariff reduction is autonomous; in other words it has not been made permanent in GATT. These arrangements will be reviewed in July 1990, and in the event of Council approval on 16 March the tariff changes will be implemented, three days after their publication in the Official Journal of the European Communities, on the basis of the proposal from the Commission, described in the explanatory memoranda noted in the motion.

In addition, the Community has agreed to re-bind in GATT the duties previously bound for the Community of 10, subject to the duty rates specified for Spain and Portugal during the transitional period. Both sides have agreed to raise the ceilings under indicative and non-restrictive quotas on certain classes of goods which were imposed last summer because of a similar but lesser, dispute about access to Portugal of United States oil seeds. Consequences of this settlement are positive in that the newly-enlarged Community has won formal and political recognition as a negotiating entity. There will be formal recognition by the United States ratification in the GATT of the trade consequences of enlargement and political recognition by the success with which a united Community has conducted a difficult negotiation.

In financial terms, the Commission estimates that the tariff concessions will result in a loss of about £35 million ECU of customs revenue. To the extent that United States corn displaces home-grown feed grains from the Spanish market, there could need to be higher Community expenditure on export refunds or on purchases into intervention. Against that can be set additional income from levies on United States corn. These should amount to between 200 million to 300 million ECU per year.

These sums are small beside the possible damage that might have resulted from escalation.

Mr. Cook: The Minister has said that to the extent that American grain displaced European grain there could be an additional effect on the budget for intervention. Surely that is inevitable if there is an American sale to the Spanish market. As it is apparently possible for civil servants to put a figure on the income from American grain, surely it is possible for them to put a figure on the cost of buying into intervention the equivalent amount of European grain.

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman has raised a point that occurred to me. I made inquiry, but I understand that it is not possible to give an answer to the question that would have any high level of precision attached to it. For that reason, the information was omitted.

Mr. Cook: I accept that it is not possible to achieve an arithmetically precise figure down to the last ECU. I assure the Minister, however, that I would accept a low level of precision and a broad order of magnitude. There must be a figure available similar to 230 million ECU that is accurate at least to the nearest 10 million.

Mr. Clark: That seems a reasonable request and I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman is informed. Perhaps a written question could be arranged so that the House is aware of the approximate answer. That can appear in the Official Report.

The essential achievement of the negotiations is that we have preserved United Kingdom export markets in the United States worth at least $75 million. There may be some increases in United States deliveries of products on which duties have been reduced, but I do not believe that such increased imports will put any part of the United Kingdom industry at risk, especially when we view the settlement in the light of the larger risks to our trade with which we were faced. More broadly, the successful settlement of a politically troublesome dispute within the terms of the general agreement should enhance the GATT's standing. This is important at the outset of the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations, of which the start of the substantive phase coincided with this deal.

This settlement marks a successful end to a serious dispute. The outcome is in many ways encouraging, not least because it arose in the framework of existing GATT rights and obligations on both sides, and was ultimately settled within that framework. It differed from the other separate disputes which I have mentioned previously. But these disputes relate to American actions which are to a greater or lesser degree contrary to the terms of the GATT. The lesson which both sides have, I hope, learnt is that restriction and retaliation in international trade can be profoundly damaging. The enlargement dispute has shown that the United States and the Community, however loud the rhetoric on both sides, can manage their trade relations with one another sensibly, and must continue to do so in the series of rather different disputes that we still face. I hope that this message will not be lost on those in Washington who would prefer a different approach.

10.29 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): As the Minister has said, the document marks the descent of the House from the high field of arts policy to trade in dried onions and plywood. It is no doubt an important matter for debate, but it appears to have rather more limited appeal than the arts. It may help to put the Minister's mind at rest if I assure him now that it is not the Opposition's intention to divide the House at the end of the debate. After all, we are considering the terms of settlement of what might be described as the cheese and cocktails war. As the party of peace, we are happy to accept a peace settlement on whatever terms.

For the record, it is important that we make our position clear on the negotiations and on the demand that sparked them off. It is our position that the United States action was wholly unjustified. As the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) reminded the House in an intervention in the Minister's speech, the United States warmly and strongly supported the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Common Market. Indeed, it is possible to find American congressmen who spoke more warmly and strongly in support of the accession of Spain and Portugal than some hon. Members. The Americans saw political and strategic advantages in the accession of Spain and Portugal. They also, although they might not have talked about it in quite the same terms, saw economic advantages from that accession — that is, indirect economic advantages from the faster growth of the economies of Spain and, to a lesser extent, Portugal, which were anticipated by their Government, and direct economic advantages from the reduced manufacturing tariffs that that accession necessarily produced.

The Americans could not expect such advantages to come with no price. A clear price that they might well have anticipated at the time — it was wrapped up in protracted negotiations—was that the Spaniards and the Portuguese would meet their future cereal needs from the large cereal surplus of the Community that they were about to join. Nobody suggested that the United Kingdom would be compensated for the additional budgetary burden that we now bear as a result of the increased cost of CAP caused by the accession of Spain and Portugal. It is a bit much for a third party to suggest that we should play a part in compensating them for the cost of such accession.

Not only was the United States action unjustified but it was wholly disproportionate. As the Minister said, we have narrowly avoided an escalatory spiral of retaliatory action. Over what? Over a modest amount of maize exports amounting to between £350 million and £400 million, which, I understand from a calculation that has been relayed to me, amounts to 20 minutes' worth of the United States federal budget.

We have come to the brink of a trade war over what is, both literally and in budgetary terms, chickenfeed. It is certainly the case that a major problem underlies the negotiations. That problem stems as much from the nature of the CAP as from anything else. The problem is that the major Western blocs of Europe and North America have substantial agricultural surpluses and are having increasing difficulty in finding a market in the rest of the world in which to dispose of them. That is an ironic position to be in at a time when much of the Third world faces greater hunger. It would appear that a rational solution to the problem would be either to find non-market ways of meeting the needs of the Third world or, alternatively, reducing the CAP as an engine for further increasing the advanced world's surplus of agricultural products. Oddly, this settlement would appear, far from diminishing the CAP, to give it additional impetus by increasing the stocks to be held in intervention that ultimately will probably work their way through to the world markets.

The American action was not only unjustified and disproportionate but illogical. A major consequence of the United States proposals would be that the price of gin in New York would rise from £7 a bottle to £13 a bottle, with predictable effects on United Kingdom exports to America. It is difficult to see why it is either fair or logical for British distillers to be hit because Spain is now buying maize from French farmers. There is no logic or fairness to that proposition. It is based solely, one suspects, on the wish of the United States to maximise political pressure from their measures by ensuring that there is pressure on different Governments within the Economic Community.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): A good tactic, too.

Mr. Cook: I am inclined to say that it would be one additional reason why Britain might have been better to have stayed out of the Common Market in the first place and thereby not put its head in the noose. It is ironic that political pressure should be applied in this way to a United Kingdom Administration who have done so much to further American interests. They have bought AWACS from the Americans and sold Westland to the Americans. It might be a bit much to expect the Americans, in return, to buy more of our weapons, but one might have expected them, in gratitude, to drink more of our gin.

We have to conclude that the American action was unjustified, disproportionate and illogical. Therefore it is disappointing that the Americans appear to have got so much of what they wanted out of the negotiations and that the counter-bluff—because that is what it now appears to be—of the Common Market was called. After the agreement, the president of the National Farmers Union was quoted as saying that the concessions had gone too far and that the agreement would "aggravate the EEC surplus problem, drive more grain into intervention and add to the cost of the Common Agricultural Policy. Producers cannot be expected to bear the costs of what is essentially a political decision."

The succint nature of that statement conveys two familiar themes of the farming lobby—first, that there ought to be more money to spend and, secondly, that it must not come out of their pockets.

It is regrettable that the final settlement should have been so advantageous to the United States and, other than avoiding retaliatory measures against the United Kingdom, that it should have contained nothing for the British. Nevertheless, one views the settlement with relief and we do not wish to stand in its way, for fear that it should trigger retaliatory measures that would have an impact on British distillers. Therefore we shall not oppose this motion. However, it would be appropriate to take this opportunity to put down markers for future EEC-US negotiations that may touch more centrally on United Kingdom interests. I shall refer to two of these. The Minister has already referred to one of them, but the first one, to which he did not refer, is Airbus.

Airbus is a resoundingly successful project. As a passenger plane it has evoked more advance interest than any previous passenger aircraft model. Among the interests it has attracted is that of the United States Administration. At present, United States producers hold 80 per cent. of the passenger aircraft market, and they will resist any serious threat to their dominance of that market. To break into that market will therefore, be tough. There will undoubtedly be pressure—perhaps not directed this time at London Gin — to persuade the European countries to back off that threat to the United States' monopoly of the market. If we are to succeed in breaking that monopoly and if we are to obtain a fairer share of the market for European producers, we shall have to be tougher in the negotiations than we were in the recent confrontation.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are being tough.

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentlemen assures me that the Government are being tough. I welcome their toughness, but that toughness will have to go right through the negotiations. What has caused us concern about the recent negotiations is that although the EEC was tough, the agreement suggests that the Americans got very much what they wanted.

My second marker was referred to by the Minister—the attempt to increase textile protection by the United States Congress. I refer in particular to the Bill that was introduced by Congressman Derrick to impose quotas on textile exports from any part of the world, including the EEC — therefore including Britain. That causes acute concern to British producers, as witnessed by the presence in the Chamber of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), who takes a close interest in the subject.

Such a quota would not merely affect British exports of £300 million worth of textile goods to the United States; it would have a greater impact on the United Kingdom textile market. Other exporters to the United States would find that their exports were diverted to the United Kingdom domestic market, thus possibly posing an even greater loss of trade than the loss of exports to America. The Bill appears to pose a real threat.

The Jenkins Bill on similar lines a year ago went through Congress. It was halted by the President's veto. When considering the President's veto, Congress voted for the Bill by 60 per cent., only narrowly failing to achieve the necessary 66 per cent. vote to overturn the veto. It must be of concern that in the comparatively weaker state of the President's political authority, his veto is more vulnerable to being overturned by Congress. Therefore, I strongly support what the Minister said tonight, reflecting the words of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that the Government regard this as a serious matter. I assure the Minister that the Opposition regard it with equal seriousness and very much hope that the House will not be obliged to debate future terms of settlement which represent a climbdown in negotiations that parallel the climbdown we are now considering.

The background to the settlement and to Congressman Derrick's Bill is a chronic, gathering, structural deficit in the American balance of trade. All the signs are that as that deficit becomes graver, the Americans will become a much more aggressive trading partner. Congressman Derrick's Bill is, I understand, only one of 400 protectionist Bills currently before Congress. The settlement in front of us reflects only one conflict in the past year, which has also seen conflict between the EEC and the United States over steel, pasta and citrus fruit, a dispute which has been rumbling for 16 years.

There will be other and heavier conflicts in the next year. The document and the motion we are considering reflect the solution to one conflict, but they do not remove the roots of conflict. The House may have to return to the underlying tension between the United States and Britain and the European countries in the trade war. When we return to the matter, the Minister may well find that we shall demand a tougher approach in negotiation and a more advantageous solution than we have before us tonight.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): As a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation I think I speak for other members of the Committee when I say that we understand the circumstances in which this matter has come to the House. Of course, I accept entirely the Minister's remarks on the subject.

However, I feel strongly that we have to improve the way in which we deal with European legislation. I do not intend going into all the matters arising out of the Single European Act but merely point out that at 10.42 pm on a Thursday, in a virtually empty House, we are discussing a matter of the gravest importance to British trade. Just to take one example, those who produce gin were in severe danger of losing the significant market to which the Minister referred. From the correspondence that I have had with the Minister and from the way in which he has conducted the negotiations I know—I do not say this lightly, because I have followed the negotiations with great interest — that there are few members of this Administration or of the House in whom one could have more confidence to defend British interests in these matters.

I took the comments of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) badly, because he damned with faint praise a good result in the negotiations. Here we are at this time of night discussing this important question. I make a strong protest at the way we treat these matters.

On the substantive question, the hon. Member for Livingston made a point about the EEC and how it functions. I am not anti-Europe, but I am distinctly sceptical about how the mechanisms work. Unless we get that in order there will be big trouble in this country over the next few years. The hon. Gentleman said that a whole range of other measures are still to come.

We are poised in a dangerous situation on the United States-Europe front for the next 18 months. We have to ask why we are in that position and what we are to do about it. In a nutshell, significant internal domestic and agricultural problems are facing the farmers and manufacturers in the United States. Whatever the reasons, those pressures have built up and will come through in votes and pressures upon Congressmen in the United States. We cannot and must not kid ourselves that that is the case.

Therefore, if we, as a member of the EEC, find ourselves targeted in specific trade or agricultural sectors, we must consider how to respond within the mechanism of the EEC legitimately to defend ourselves. Firstly, there is the GATT round. I am confident that the Minister who has responsibility in that field, with his credentials, will conduct himself in a manner which will ensure that we defend ourselves effectively from the worst effects of the kind of trade war which is in prospect.

I have put my protest on the record. I hope that the Minister, and anybody else who has the opportunity, will refer this question to the Foreign Office and to the Leader of the House under the terms of reference of the Select Committee on European Legislation. Our terms of reference are very poor. We do not have the opportunity to consider things as we should. It is essential that we are brought early into the picture, by one mechanism or another, when matters of this kind arise.

That does not mean that we would exercise our powers in any irresponsible or unnecessarily restrictive way, but it would ensure that the power which is reflected in the person of the Minister, who is sitting on the Front Bench, is backed where necessary by the authority of a Committee of this House. Here we are representing the United Kingdom on a matter of great importance after the event and we have not had an opportunity to debate it. I cannot believe that is a sensible way to legislate or to defend the interests of our constituents.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I share with my hon. Friends on the Front Bench and the Minister the feeling that trade wars are bad and that fortunately we have managed to avert one. There I part company with the Minister, whose speech was very good when it concentrated on trade, but sections of it — no doubt inserted at the insistence of the Foreign Office — betrayed the Foreign Office's style. The bombast about the Common Market and the way we had stuck together was rather nauseating. I cannot believe that the Minister, if he thinks about it, would have allowed that sort of passage in his speech, which was otherwise a very good factual account.

As both Front-Bench spokesmen have pointed out, the dangers of a trade war are still with us not merely in themselves but in the context of the Uruguay round of GATT negotiations which for the first time will cover agriculture. The present dispute is scarcely a good forecaster of success in those negotiations.

Both Front-Bench spokesmen took the view that when the dispute began the Common Market was in the right and the United States in the wrong, but in my opinion it was the other way round. In April last year the French Minister of Agriculture said:

"It seems that a more complete study of the consequences of enlargement"

—with the admission of Spain and Portugal—

"shows that it will not harm the US but bring it not inconsiderable advantages, particularly in the industrial sector."

It may be said that that was just the French Minister speaking, but in November 1986, following a Community Foreign Affairs Council at which the subject had figured prominently, Agra Europe said:

"At the basis of the disagreement is the US refusal to accept the Community thesis that losses in agricultural exports in Spain and Portugal will be balanced by easier access to the Iberian market for their industrial goods."

That may be all right in economic theory, but it is not acceptable under the rules of GATT. Indeed, it is illegal. If there was illegality, therefore, it was on the Community side and not on the United States side. Under article 24 of GATT, when a customs union is created—or expanded, as in this case—any country whose trade is adversely affected specifically by changes in customs duties, tariffs, quotas, and so on, is entitled to appropriate and quantifiable compensation, not vague compensation of the type implied by the suggestion that if industrial tariffs come down it may be possible to sell more motor cars, for example, in the new market. The Community was wrong in its initial approach to the issue and infortunately stuck to that approach even as far as November last year.

The United States reaction was not surprising, although it clearly went over the top. It was certainly ridiculous to claim, as the United States claimed at one stage last year, compensation equivalent to some 12 million tonnes of grain exports to Spain and Portugal when the trade involved had clearly been less than that. Nevertheless, it is important to understand the aims of the United States. They were set out by President Reagan in April last year. Agra Europe stated on 4 April:

"The President announced that the US would retaliate if the EEC failed to withdraw its quota on Portuguese oilseed and products imports, to remove the Accession Treaty clause which states that Portugal must take 15·5 per cent. of its cereal imports from the rest of the EEC, and to compensate the US for the imposition of variable levies on Spanish maize and sorghum imports."

Of those three major objectives, two were unquestionably achieved in the final settlement, so when the Foreign Office part of the Minister's brief suggests that the Community had come out of the matter with honour and glory I prefer to take the view of Agra Europe which, although European, is fairly sceptical about claims that come out of Brussels and Berlaymont. On 30 January it stated:

"Although both sides avoided claiming victory over the settlement of the long dispute, the US seems to have won the verdict on points."

I would go a little further, but there is no doubt that the United States obtained a fair amount of compensation which it would probably have achieved had negotiations under article 24.6 of GATT proceeded as they should have proceeded last year. Neither side comes out of the matter with much credit, and it is not a good prognosticator for what is likely to happen in the agriculture round of GATT or indeed in any future trade dispute between the two parties. It is a classic example of how not to conduct international trade negotiations and shows the difficulties that will arise whenever agriculture, in particular, comes up in the relationships between the Community and the rest of the world.

The financial impact of the documents that are before the House is extremely hazy. My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) referred to this. The Minister did not deal with it in his speech, though he promised to give some information in reply to a written question. My hon. Friend was right to point out that there will be increased cost to the EEC as a result of the agreement. It would have been helpful, in asking us to approve the agreement—which is welcome in all parts of the House, and I share that welcome—if the Minister had given an idea of the financial consequences of what we are being asked to do.

I agree with those who say that the United States is moving in a protectionist direction. But let us beware of presenting the EEC in a white sheet. We do not want to be likened to a pot calling the kettle black. After all, the EEC has always been a protectionist bloc, particularly in its agricultural trade with the outside world.

This GATT round—we are beginning to see some progress—will be crucial. I fear, however, that if it does not succeed, we shall see more trade wars, and I agree with the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) that eventually it will become a war in which, at least metaphorically, blood will be spilled.

I understand that, like me, the Minister is a free trader. Subsidies to exports are just as damaging to international trade as are barriers to imports. A basic principle of the CAP is that exports of agricultural products should be subsidised. The Minister did not comment on that. I should like to know his views on the subject and the views of the Department of Trade. Once one bloc starts playing with export subsidies, other blocs are encouraged to follow suit. Indeed, in recent years the United States has passed legislation to enable that country's Departments of Commerce and Agriculture effectively to subsidise United States agricultural exports to the rest of the world because they have been losing out to subsidised agricultural exports from the EEC.

Although there may have been economic advantages to accession for Spain and Portugal—there have certainly been political advantages—I am not sure that the same can be claimed for Britain, which I believe has suffered disastrously economically since we joined the EEC. Considering our trading balance with the original Six and then the Nine, until the admission of Spain and Portugal, it is clear that we have not done well. It is to be hoped that matters will prove more encouraging for Spain and Portugal than has been the case for this country.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I, too, welcome the agreement and, like other hon. Members, I fear that another US-EEC trade war is looming on the horizon. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) spoke of the possibility of a measure coming before the United States legislature shortly on a matter to which I shall come.

Trade wars and the threat of them cost jobs in the long run. There are no winners. For that reason, I particularly welcome the agreement that has been reached and hope that we shall do our utmost through the Community to avert any trade war with the United States. With no winners, both sides lose jobs, many of which may be lost for ever.

I wish to refer in particular to the textile and clothing restraint measure which, as the hon. Member for Livingston said, was presented to Congress last month. That United States Bill presented in the Senate by Senators Thurmond and Hollings and in the House of Representatives by Congressman Butler Derrick, proposes the introduction of global quotas for all textile and clothing imports including those from EEC countries and, as a result, will include those from the United Kingdom. Based on 1986 import levels increased by 1 per cent. per annum, United States tariffs would be reduced by a total of 10 per cent. spread over five years—a ludicrously small amount. To give the House an idea how small that is, the lowest present United States tariff on wool cloth is 33 per cent. so that would apparently be reduced to 29·7 per cent. after five years.

The United States Bill would prohibit any other United States tariff reductions under the new round of GATT multilateral trade negotiations now taking place. As the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) mentioned, there is a possibility if the Bill passes in both Houses in the United States of it being vetoed by the President. That happened with the Jenkins Bill to restrict textile and clothing imports in December 1985. It was a matter of touch and go whether that was defeated. Of course, the President's veto can be overturned by a two thirds majority in each House—and that only narrowly failed with the Jenkins Bill in August 1986.

Should the United States Bill be enacted, it would clearly be a very serious matter for British exporters to the United States. As has already been mentioned, our trade with the United States in clothing exports was over £300 million in 1986. The result of the Bill, a measure to limit our access to the United States, which has already been presented to Congress and the Senate would be that Britain and other countries would have to fight for a share of very limited global access to the United States. All the other suppliers including the low cost suppliers from the far east would join in. If the quota operated via a licensing system, based on individual importers' previous level of imports, it would also give extra bargaining power to United States importers when dealing with overseas suppliers.

This is a short debate, and as hon. Members have already stressed tonight, this is a matter of extreme consequence and great importance and it should not be channelled into a slot late at night in a debate lasting for an hour and a half gives us the opportunity to make the United States Administration and Congress aware that the enactment of such a Bill would result in large scale trade conflict spreading beyond textiles and clothing with counter measures hitting many United States industrial and agricultural exports.

When my hon. Friend replies, I hope that he will give the House an undertaking that he is, if necessary, ready to back up the warnings that have already been made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in Washington on 4 March and support those by being prepared to introduce immediately through the European Commission a list of counter measures if the American Bill becomes law.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in Washington a few days ago that any such Bill introduced in the United States would meet with considerable opposition and counter measures. I would have thought after the report that appeared in the Financial Times of 5 March that possibly my hon. Friend when he replies might be able to give us some idea of the type of counter measures that we have in mind ready to be introduced should that be necessary. Many other countries have protested about the introduction of the Bill. There have been objections worldwide. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will reassure the House that, if the Bill proceeds, we will be ready, with the Community, to do our best to adopt these counter-measures.

11.5 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I should like to follow the remarks of the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) and others and welcome the EC-US agreement. There have been three principal strands to this debate, to which I have listened with interest. First, the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) made the important point that the way in which we deal with these matters leaves a great deal to be desired. I hope that his impassioned and earnest plea will be considered by the Leader of the House and the other authorities with a view to improving the present position.

The second important strand concerns the way in which the Community as a whole is responding, and shaping up, to the difficult international trade position that is developing. The third strand concerns the way in which the Americans have been acting during the dispute which has culminated in the EC-US agreement. I agree with the argument of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) when he said that the American conduct had been unjustified and its response disproportionate in scale. That is true in view of the value of United States exports at stake. The hon. Gentleman said that it was 20 minutes' worth of United States expenditure. We are therefore talking only about approximately $400 million. My information is that the United States budget is about $350 billion, so I concur with the hon. Gentleman's argument.

More important still is the worrying and high-handed attitude of the United States. It does not augur well for future EC-US trade negotiations. A series of future negotiations about equally important matters may be difficult to handle.

I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins). I concede that he may be technically right in his interpretation of article 24—he said that the benefits were vague and difficult to substantiate—but I believe that some of the benefits to the United States are substantial. They are principally political and military, but there are also industrial benefits and benefits in terms of reduced tariff access for soya and maize gluten. The hon. Gentleman considers those to be insignificant benefits—that is a matter of judgment—but I believe that, on balance, the Americans did not get all that bad a deal. I do not think that the $400 million about which they were arguing was worth the aggravation and hassle caused to the relationship between the trading blocks of the European Community and of the United States.

The position will get worse. All the evidence shows that, in view of the Democratic influx in the last United States autumn mid-term elections and the fact that President Reagan is perceived, rightly or wrongly, to be more of a lame duck President than anything else who cannot necessarily depend on a majority in the Senate, there are obviously difficulties on the horizon. If it does nothing else, this debate should strengthen the Government's resolve firmly to face those questions if they arise.

I shall now turn to the direct implications for cereals. On checking the statistics, it is clear that the immediate implication of the agreement is that the amount of grain sold by the United Kingdom to Spain will be substantially reduced this year compared with what we sold last year. The International Wheat Council's statistics show that in the first 10 months of 1986, the United Kingdom sold 612,000 tonnes of barley and 634,000 tonnes of feed wheat to Spain. That was a considerable increase on a near-zero level of sales in 1985. That may be due to the fairly unique geographical and climatic conditions during 1986. We are right to recognise that those sales were of substantial assistance in dealing with some of the surpluses in Britain.

The hon. Member for Livingston quoted the president of the English National Farmers Union as saying that it must be recognised that agreements of this sort will aggravate the problem of cereal surplus, will drive more grain into intervention and add to the cost of the common agricultural policy. The view of the National Farmers Union is that the concessions have gone too far.

I certainly hold no brief for farmers such as the barley barons of East Anglia, but I represent a constituency where the cereal farms are largely in marginal areas of Scotland, and I can tell the Government that such producers cannot and should not be expected to bear the cost of what is essentially a political agreement. The Government should bear that fully in mind, although I understand that it is not really directly in the jurisdiction of the Minister's Department and overlaps into the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

I hope that the Government will look again at the long-term agricultural implications of agreements like this as they apply to the ninth GATT round in Uruguay. The hon. Member for Walthamstow was right to refer to that, because if we start to allow the Americans to make the running by insisting that things such as direct export subsidies should be used as the only criterion, we may start to forget that the United States loan rate scheme finances American agriculture to the extent of $25 billion.

I hope that the Government will take the advice of the NFU and found heavily on the OECD analysis that is shortly to be produced. Hopefully, that will provide a more objective and rational basis for evaluating the concessions and changes that will need to be made in the course of the multilateral trade negotiations that are currently under way.

Exchange rates are also important both to agriculture in general and to farmers in my constituency in particular. I hope that the Minister will use his influence with the Government to try to get more exchange rate stability because nothing is more destabilising to the international agricultural market than the fluctuations that we have seen in exchange rates in the recent past. The NFU takes the view that we have to bear in mind that any proposals to solve the problem of cereal surpluses must be accompanied by a slightly tighter control on the import of substitutes.

Textiles are an important part of EC and US trade negotiations. The hon. Member for Livingston has already advanced eloquent arguments about this. The new Butler Derrick Bill is a substantial threat and, as the hon. Member for Harborough has told the House, global quotas could have dire and far-reaching consequences. I make the unashamedly constituency point that they would have a disastrous effect on the high-quality, high-volume hosiery industry, and especially on the cashmere hosiery industry in my constituency. The compensation that is being envisaged in the course of the Bill being considered in America would not go any way towards meeting the difficulties that the industry would face if the measure is allowed to hit the American statute book.

I reiterate what the hon. Member for Harborough said —that the Government should take the opportunity this evening of making a clear statement that European Community retaliation would result. I give the Government credit for the position that they have taken so far. They have been fairly robust, but it would help if the Minister felt able to make a clear statement that retaliation would result, and would be directed to areas where it would hurt. That means using retaliation under article 19 of the measure in the US farm sector.

I am told by experts who know far more about the intricacies of some of this potential American legislation that the Butler Derrick Bill is supposed to be GATT-proof. I subscribe to the view that is reported to be taken by Mr. Willy De Clerq, the EC trade commissioner, in the Financial Times today. About the Bill, he said:

"it would fundamentally change the way in which the world trade in textiles has been conducted for the past 25 years."

The article goes on to say, that it would also

"call into question the recent extension of the Multifibre Arrangement between developed and developing countries."

After all the work, about which the Minister will know because he put a great deal of work and effort into getting the agreement that we have, the legislation could potentially blow a hole in that agreement and render everybody's work over the past 12 months nugatory.

The issue of distortion of trade by substantial diversion from the US has been properly raised by the hon. Member for Livingston, and I support his argument. The view of the experts whom I have consulted is that there is as much as a 50-50 chance of the legislation being enacted in America. If that happened, the sort of high-quality, high-volume business in my constituency, which considers access to the US markets to be vital, will find it difficult to operate. It is a fashion-based industry, and fashion is seasonal. If quotas are introduced, and the quotas are taken up in the first quarter of the trading year, it is impossible to export the products of a fashion-based industry without disastrous consequences. The compensation, such as it is, being offered at the moment is of no real value unless exporters to the US can stay in the market for five years, because it takes five years for the full extent of the compensation to mature.

The United States market available to the hosiery industry in my constituency has taken years of hard work to develop, and the Bill could sweep it all away. The competition from other countries would make price bargaining much tougher, as the hon. Member for Harborough said. It would put an awful lot more power into the hands of American negotiators when it came to discussing prices of goods, if they knew that they had behind them the strength of a limited access quota. The ability of the industry to develop alternative markets would be next to impossible.

I have a clear constituency interest. I know that the Minister pays close attention to these matters, and I give him credit for having done so over the detailed negotiations for the MFA. I know, too, that we have the 1988 cashmere bilateral still to negotiate with China, which is another continuing cause of uncertainty in my constituency.

I hope that the Minister will accept these arguments in the constructive way that they are intended. The House should strengthen his arm so that he can go back and argue strongly within the EC, and stiffen its resolve to negotiate toughly with the United States, not just on the agreement that we are debating tonight, but on the wider issues and other subjects we shall have to deal with in future.

Mr. Alan Clark: This debate has been extremely useful and encouraging for me. It has not been couched on party political lines. I entirely take the point made most forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) that it is desirable that there should be a closer liaison between the Select Committee, the House and my Department so that such matters as this are debated before the House is presented with something on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

The point that the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) made that we find ourselves debating this so late at night demonstrates the importance that the Government and my Department attach to the subject is a misplaced one. We are here at 11.30 pm because those who manage our business in such matters failed to appreciate the obsessive taste for self-congratulatory speeches on the arts which affects so many of our colleagues, and which turned what was meant to be a very short debate on the arts into a full-scale debate from 3.30 to 10.00 pm.

None the less, this is a highly important subject. The general feeling of hon. Members is that we are not out of the wood. There was general agreement that we must be vigilant and ready to resist any development that may return us to the extremely dangerous situation from which we have escaped.

There was a clear disagreement between the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) as to who was to blame for this dispute. I find both of their arguments entirely convincing. The hon. Member for Livingston made an interesting point, from which I would not dissent, that much of the difficulty is endemic to the economies that still abuse their treatment of agriculture and surpluses. Until that is sorted, the problem will recur in one form or another. The Government are foremost in the Community in attempting to get that dealt with. The OECD conference of last April demonstrated the direction in which OECD countries had to move. Some progress has been made and there is wider realisation that that is the key to solving many of the economic problems that are so prevalent at the present time.

The hon. Member for Livingston was right to raise the question of the agricultural budget. I shall attempt to give him an answer now, but I must warn him that it rests on a number of interlinked assumptions, one of which, if it is subsequently found to be invalid, may vitiate the conclusion. If we assume that over the four years of the agreement, Community grains take 15 per cent. of the Portugese market and all Spanish grain import needs, world grain prices do not change, EEC support prices do not change and EEC production levels do not change, intervention and storage costs will be offset by gains levy income. I am told that as good a guess as any is that the net additional cost of the agreement will be £100 million for each of the four years. That is subject to a wide margin of error of about 50 per cent. each way and represents a small factor of the CAP budget of £26 billion.

The hon. Member for Livingston mentioned the Airbus——

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): What about the money?

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman has only just come in and did not hear what his hon. Friend said, or the substance of his argument, which did not relate to that in the slightest. If the hon. Gentleman wants to continue with his constituency correspondence he might be better advised to do it elsewhere. I have responded vigorously to questions on the Airbus during questions to the Department of Trade and Industry. I fully appreciate that the Boeing apprehensions are undoubtedly leading the Americans into vigorous lobbying for protectionist measures but I am confident that they will be strongly resisted. I attach a great deal of importance to that, as I believe does the House, given the exchanges when these matters were ventilated at Question Time.

Virtually all hon. Members who have spoken mentioned the Textile and Apparel Bill. We are most concerned about the consequences of that. The Bill is not consistent with the GATT. It would represent another breach of the United States standstill commitment. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) referred to the Financial Times article which referred to Commissioner De Clercq and I agree that the Bill could not be enacted by the United States Administration while the United States remained within its MFA commitment. There is no MFA justification for those restrictions being provided and it is the reverse of the liberalisation provisions envisaged ultimately in the MFA protocol.

The House has registered its concern at the same time as its relief. There is a general measure of relief that a retaliatory cycle has been avoided, but at the same time there is the clear knowledge that many of the essential elements that are causing discordances in the trade field remain and the dangers of their raising their heads again are plain.

However, the House can at least draw some comfort from the fact that a combination of vigilance, patience, diplomatic skill and resolution prevented the dispute from proceeding to the extremely dangerous denouement that at one time threatened. If we continue to apply those qualities on future occasions and the House continues to show the single minded purpose which it has done this evening we shall fare well in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the unnumbered explanatory memorandum, dated 31st January 1987, submitted by the Department of Trade and Industry, describing a draft Decision concerning the Agreement between the European Community and the United States of America for the conclusion of negotiations under General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) Article XXIV.6, and European Community Document No. 5062/87 and the Department's unnumbered explanatory memorandum dated 23rd February 1987, on the implementation of the Agreement; and welcomes the Agreement as the means of averting an exchange of retaliatory and counter-retaliatory trade measures between the United States and the Community which would have very serious consequences for EC-US trade, for the multilateral trading systems and for progress in the new round of multilateral trade negotiations now beginning in GATT.

Industrial Training

11.27 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I beg to move,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Engineering Board) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 13th February, be approved.

The order requires parliamentary approval because one part of it — that covering site employees in the mechanical and electrical engineering construction industry sector—involves a levy exceeding 1 per cent. of emoluments.

Hon. Members will need no reminding of the importance of the engineering industry, which is the largest manufacturing sector in terms of employment. Engineering output has risen during the past five years by nearly 10 per cent. The increase is most marked in the electrical and instrument engineering sector. Mechanical engineering has continued its growth. Protecting the skill base of the industry is clearly vital. That is why it is essential that this order should be approved so that money is available to the Engineering Industry Training Board to enable it to encourage firms to train in the industry.

I am surprised that the Opposition have put down an amendment to the motion, and, indeed, are asking the Government to give a lead and support to the board. We do give that support, as I shall make clear.

While recognising that it is primarily the responsibility of employers and the board to identify and meet the industry's training needs, the Government also make considerable specific provision for training in the vital engineering sector. In 1986-87 some 25,000 young people were in engineering skills training under the youth training scheme. We expect the new job training scheme to make a major contribution in engineering training across a range of skill levels.

We also very much welcome the board's efforts to meet engineering skill needs. The board is putting an increased emphasis on high technology needs by providing an advanced technology training team. It also offers grants to help to alleviate high technology skill shortages — for instance, by encouraging companies to carry out more training for the conversion of suitable people to work in high technology areas. Accelerated management training and development for promising young engineers is offered through the board's fellowship schemes.

Those measures clearly demonstrate the board's commitment to stimulating employers to invest in training, and the order before us will enable that work to continue.

The board of course recognises that there is room for improvement; that employers must be encouraged to improve the volume of training if the engineering sector is to grow and not be hampered by skill shortages. To this end, the board issued, at the end of last year, an information paper setting out its view that the levy and exemption system now in operation was not bringing about the necessary quantity of training. The paper offered three options to improve the situation: more rigorous exemption rules, a levy-grant system, or a system where the board is funded entirely through a non-returnable levy of up to 0·2 per cent. of payroll.

I understand that the board agreed earlier today that, before making its final decision, it should develop criteria for a revised levy exemption scheme to deliver an adequate quantity as well as quality of training. The board will meet again in June to consider these criteria.

Technological advance has clearly had a significant impact on the employment patterns of engineers. Engineers are now widely employed in sectors not traditionally associated with the engineering industry. The board is beginning to address this problem by instigating a survey to identify where engineering skills are used and the flows of engineers in and out of the various sectors. This survey will go a long way towards identifying engineering skill needs across the whole of industry and services. Again it has our support — indeed, we are contributing to its cost.

The levy proposals before us now are in the same format as those approved by both Houses last year and are expected to raise just over £19 million. The levy will apply to those firms which are in the industry between the date the order comes into force and 31 August 1987. The levy is made up of two main parts. The first part applies to mainstream engineering, and the second to the mechanical and electrical engineering construction industry.

For mainstream engineering establishments, the board has agreed unanimously to propose increases in the non-exemptable portion of the levy and the following arrangements will apply. Small firms with 40 or fewer employees will be excluded from paying levy. This exclusion level remains unchanged from last year. All other establishments will have to pay a levy of 1 per cent. of emoluments unless their training is judged satisfactory against criteria set by the board. Establishments with fewer than 1,000 employees, who train satisfactorily, will be exempt from all but 0·08 per cent. of the levy. This non-exemptable portion is increased from 0·06 per cent. Similarly, larger establishments which train satisfactorily will be exempt from all but 0·08 per cent. of the levy in respect of the first 1,000 employees and 0·072 per cent. in respect of the remainder. This represents respective increases in the non-exemptable levy from the rates of 0·06 per cent. and 0·054 per cent. that were set last year.

For establishments in the mechanical and electrical engineering construction industry sector, the levy arrangements proposed remain the same as those approved by both Houses last year. The levy is in several parts. For off-site employees, no levy is payable by establishments of up to 30 employees. For establishments of more than 30 employees, 1 per cent. of total emoluments is payable, of which 0·15 per cent. will be non-exemptable. For site employees, no levy will be paid on the first £50,000 of emoluments. On emoluments over £50,000, a non-exemptable levy of 1·12 per cent. will be payable. That is the reason for the affirmative resolution that is before the House tonight.

The employer and employee members of the mechanical and electrical engineering construction industry sector committee agreed to the levy unanimously and the proposals were subsequently approved by the board without dissent. Letters of support have been received from the two major employer organisations in the sector. There is thus consensus in the industry for the proposals as required by the Industrial Training Act 1982.

I therefore recommend the order to the House. The proposals have been unanimously agreed by employer representatives on the board. They are necessary to help meet the industry's future training needs.

11.35 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Having listened to the Minister, one would be forgiven for thinking that all was well with the engineering industry and with training for it. The hon. Gentleman said that he was surprised that the Opposition had tabled an amendment, but the industry has shrunk alarmingly. For example, it provided 3 million jobs in 1979 against 2 million now. There has been a disastrous decline in training, which has contracted to a greater extent than employment in the industry. We are in a perilous position because the industry is not training the skilled employees that it or the country needs. If we do not get engineering training right, what hope [illegible] we have as a major manufacturing nation? I was [illegible]rised by the complacency that the Minister showed this evening. In years to come historians and others will read his speeches, including the one that he delivered this evening, and they will contrast the decline in engineering and the manufacturing base generally with the Minister's performance. The hon. Gentleman sleepwalked his way through a speech that would cause some to think that everything was well.

I shall spend a few minutes—I know that the hour is late — highlighting the ruinous position in which industrial training finds itself. There are some key issues to which we must address ourselves. The effective training of engineers, both in traditional skills and in the new areas of technology, is at such a low level that the role of training should be seen as a key engine of economic development. If we are ever to put right manufacturing industry and get the economy moving again after nearly eight years in the doldrums, we shall have to invest in the three engines of growth, which are capital investment, research and development and education and training.

A report was issued the week before last by the National Institute for Economic and Social Research. The top 10 British industries are 40 per cent. less productive than their American competition. Our bottom eight industries are 75 per cent. less productive than their American counterparts. This spells ruin for Britain if we are to meet the two challenges of markets and technology. If we do not invest in training, the report to which I have referred states that the shortest way of trying to bridge the gap between our performance and that of the United States and elsewhere will be by investment in human capital. In my part of Britain, that means investment in men and women and proper education and training.

The Government, with their appalling record of mass unemployment, have been forced to skew their training policy at the short term and the superficial. There are now 1 million on schemes that are largely for the unemployed —as many as those who were unemployed in 1979 when the Tories said that Britain was not working. If we are to be truly productive and compete in an increasingly competitive world market, we must train our work force.

The Government have singularly neglected the training of those who are in work. The most recent labour force survey tells us that only 7 per cent. of men and women who are in work are receiving any training. That compares so badly with our international competitors that it is embarrassing to dredge up the statistics.

Rather than there being a consensus on how everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds, the Minister is covering up a ruinous situation in engineering. Members of the engineering industry training board know that the situation is totally desperate. They are waiting for a Labour Government to put training right, or for the present Government, even at this late stage, to realise the folly of relying on the workings of the free market to determine how many people are trained.

The engineering industry training board is the classic example of how the Government's market philosophy does not work in serving the national interest. The EITB levy exemption system is based on the principle that if we leave it to employers to train for their needs, the total sum will add up to the national interest in engineering training needs. Since 1982, when the engineering industry training board was basically neutered and its ability to raise the levy and ensure that training was done was weakened, we have seen that, compared with a 60 per cent. exemption, 94 per cent. of the engineering industry has been exempted from the levy. What is more, we have the equally grave matter that the Minister glossed over. Fifty per cent. of people who are qualified to work in engineering work not in the engineering sector but in other sectors. The EITB has no responsibility or power to train in such sectors. Indeed, most sectors have no ITBs because they were abolished in 1982.

We have two facts. First, only 50 per cent. of engineering employees are covered. Secondly, firms with fewer than 40 employees—a sizeable 250,000 people—are not covered by the EITB. The system is not training for most of the industry, even before we start to look at the levy exemption. Who blames an individual employer for not training if half the people working in engineering are not covered by the system, anyway? Of course, that makes individual employers in the engineering industry loath to do more than to train for their most conservative needs. That leads to ruin for the planning of training and the equipping of the work force. We need to concentrate our energies on the skills of our existing work force. The EITB could be the organ that pumps the blood around the body of engineering training.

I have three questions for the Minister. I do not suppose that he will answer any of them fully. First, why have we seen the fate of the EITB under the Government? Why has it been brought so low? Why is morale in the EITB so low? How is the EITB, even in its neutered role—it has some excellent men and women working for it—to try to meet the central issues of engineering training? The people in the EITB care about training. They know the scandalous situation that we are in but are helpless to do much about it. What are the Government doing about training in engineering? I do not have to look far for evidence about the parlous state of training. The Minister has access to all the evidence that is being given to the Select Committee on Employment by the EITB and by other expert witnesses who say that engineering training is in a parlous state.

I listened only the day before yesterday to a most interesting lunch time speech. A distinguished gentleman referred to the fact that Governments have a major responsibility to provide education. He said:

"Unemployment is an intractable problem, with overall 11 per cent. of our labour force sitting on the sidelines. Among youth the figure is nearer 20 per cent. . . . Since 1980, industrial output has grown more than twice as fast in the United States and more than three times as fast in Japan. The Pacific Basin has been attracting investment that we need in Europe . . . To hold our own against the US and the Far East, our two world class competitors, we need action that creates and sustains the right environment for enterprise to flourish. That is primarily the role of government. . . . A major responsibility of governments is education . . .

Certainly companies have their part to play—a larger part than at present, judging by the fact that, for example, corporate America spends proportionately three times more than corporate Britain. But we look primarily to government to provide Europe's trained base of human resources. I won't join the debate you are conducting in the UK, except to note that your Manpower Services Commission reports a chronically short supply of mechanical designers, engineers (where demand for qualified people doubles every five years) programmers and multi-skilled craftsmen."

That was the president of IBM in Europe, a Swiss national, who knows about industry in Europe, speaking about the state of British productivity and about high technology. What he said at that American chamber of commerce lunch only two days ago would make very good reading for the Minister, after his complacent remarks this evening.

There are chronic skill shortages throughout the country in an industry that is at the centre of our hopes for economic recovery. Unless the Government realise that dramatic action must be taken to provide both traditional and high-tech skills, we shall be in terrible trouble. The EITB has inadequate leverage over the whole system. It does not have the power to do the job. The Minister could give it that power. There could at least be a levy grant, thereby providing more resources with which to do the job. He could also devise a system of training that ensured that employers trained their employees so that firm after firm does not live by poaching off the few firms that provide training.

At a recent conference the managing director of a company that teaches computer skills and sells distance learning packs — it is a reputable and prestigious company that is doing a worth-while job—said that his company offers those packs to the engineering industry and that one of the major engineering employers — a household name—was told that this pack would lead to its employees passing the computer skills course and obtaining a City and Guilds certificate. The company held up its hands in horror and said, "We do not want them to get a certificate. It will make them mobile and someone will poach them." I do not blame the company, but it is terrible that companies should be frightened to give the men and women in the engineering industry certificates because it might make them poachable.

That is the heart of the problem in the engineering and other industries today. No company will train people if it thinks that it will not hold on to its trained employees. Firms cannot be persuaded to take training seriously because they regard money spent on training as a cost rather than an investment. It is a cost if the individual, when trained, is recruited at a higher wage by a competitor who puts nothing into the training pool. We need a Government who take training so seriously as to require every firm to train in the national interest. If not we shall end up an impoverished third order power.

The Minister also glossed over the engineering industry training board consultation paper which has been out for over two months with no response from him, his Ministry or any other Minister.

Mr. Trippier: What makes the hon. Gentleman think that the Government will be included in the consultation exercise? I have already said that we welcome it. The board is supposed to bring the result to Ministers. That is the way these matters are normally dealt with.

Mr. Sheerman: If a major centre of industrial training makes a plea that the system under which engineering industry training is carried out is so hopeless that something dramatic must be done, and says that the industry is faced with three options, one would think that the Minister responsible for training would get involved in the consultation and say, "You ar right. It is disgraceful. We have to do something about it. This is what the Government think." Presumably the Government have no opinion.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman's suggestion is ludicrous. He is suggesting that Ministers in the Department of Employment should respond to the consultation document put out by the board prior to the board receiving the clear message from the industry and trade unions, which we want to hear. Is he suggesting that in the unlikely event of a Labour Government ever being returned to office, they would override the decisions made by industry and the trade unions?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I have allowed the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) to discuss training in general, but I remind the House that we are discussing a particular point of order which deals with the levy, the way it is assessed and its purpose. It is not a general debate on training.

Mr. Sheerman: With great respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have not at any point in my speech wavered from the levy. The three options that I was discussing before the Minister intervened were the three options put out about the levy only two months ago. The first was a move to a levy grant system; the second was a significantly increased non-returnable levy system; the third was a much stiffer levy exemption system. The decision of a meeting today on the levy, I understand, was in the interim to consider the third alternative which I would have thought was the weakest of the three.

It also set out in the evidence to the Select Committee on Employment all the worries about the levy system and the way it operated and its inadequacy. Tonight we are debating the levy. If the levy is inadequate, the amendment tabled in the names of myself and my right hon. and hon. Friends is absolutely germane to the debate tonight. What we are saying——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that the amendment was not selected because it is out of order on an order of this kind.

Mr. Sheerman: We were quite well aware of that, but I understand that it is our right and privilege to table the amendment to give some indication of our feelings on this matter. We believe that the Government should be moving immediately to correct the scandal that the EITB document has been out for two months and the Government have not responded in any positive way.

The Minister is looking pained and injured. The Government do not care about training, having allowed jobs in the manufacturing engineering industries to collapse from 3 million to 2 million. Here are a Minister and a Government, knowing how bad the situation is, letting market forces rule. Here is a Minister who will not admit what everyone in the industry and the EITB knows and what his friends in the Engineering Employers Federation must be telling him in private—that this is a very grave situation now.

Heaven knows what it will be like next year, or two or three years from now. This is too serious a matter for the

[Mr. Sheerman]

Minister to smirk and look pained about. He is responsible yet he seems not to be taking this situation seriously. He is not willing to take on board the views of the Labour party that we need a national training fund that everyone will pay into and that will put engineering and industrial training in this country on the right footing and re-equip and reskill our country to face the future with confidence.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): The last debate on this subject, in April last year, was unique in that it was commenced by the Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household. Perhaps it is appropriate, in view of the events at Truro today, to pay tribute to the contribution made in that debate by the late Member for Truro, Mr. Penhaligon, who, like myself, was a chartered engineer. In that debate he spoke of the need for us to be proud of engineers and not to regard engineering as an alternative occupation. He had served an apprenticeship in engineering, as I have. We have every reason to be proud of engineering as a career in itself and as a preparation for a career in this House or elsewhere.

I listened to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). It is amazing that people should come into this House and ask for more training when it is so evident that they need training themselves. I was surprised that we have heard no more talk tonight about a 2 per cent. levy on sales. As the labour payroll in engineering is about a third of the total cost, that would be equivalent to a 6 per cent. levy on the payroll. Yet there is no suggestion by the Opposition that we should be talking about a 6 per cent. levy on payroll because plainly that would be a prohibitive burden.

Mr. Sheerman: If the hon. Gentleman waits until next Thursday, he will see the launch of our major statement on training and he will get the answers. Let the hon. Gentleman hold his patience until Thursday.

Mr. Thurnham: If it is anything like the launch of the job package yesterday, some member of the Opposition will put his foot in it and take the headlines from something else which would be far more helpful to Members on this side of the House.

The engineering industry training board submitted a memorandum for the Select Committee a week or two ago. The growth in jobs for professional engineers is shown in the figures prepared by the board for the Committee. The growth in jobs for professional engineers has been quite outstanding. Over the last eight years the total number of professional engineers in the country has grown from 60,000 to 90,000, although employment in the industry has declined from 3 million to 2 million. The loss of jobs has been more in the unskilled sector and the board needs to concentrate on the provision of training for professional engineers.

In the north-west, the number of professional engineering jobs has also grown, from 6,300 to about 7,900 last year, but the increase has been nothing like large enough. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is as interested as I am in the north-west. Perhaps he will say whether he thinks that more measures should be taken to increase the number of training places, as I believe that there should be at least another 3,000 professional engineers employed in the region.

Other interesting figures provided by the training board show that the number of women taking careers as professional engineers has increased fourfold in the country, from 1,000 to 4,000 last year. In the north-west, too, there has been a substantial increase, but not on the same scale. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the need for more training places for women in the north-west so that we can have twice as many women employed as professional engineers in the region, not only to provide more employment but because the future prospects and prosperity of the industry depend on having sufficient professional engineers, scientists and technologists who are in such short supply.

Sixty per cent. of the firms surveyed by the training board said that they experienced difficulties in recruiting specialist graduates in areas such as electronics. Does my hon. Friend think that the training board should concentrate more of its resources and time on the provision of those specialist skills rather than trying to provide the whole range of skills? The training board told the Select Committee that it would be making a decision this month on the method of its funding and listed three possible options, including higher levels of mandatory funding. I suggest that if the board were a little more selective there would be no need for higher mandatory funding.

A press release put out the other day by the Engineering Council drew attention to the need for more engineering places in universities and polytechnics. It ended by saying that longer-term measures should include the provision of greater facilities in schools to encourage people to take up careers in education and drawing attention to the need for more maths and physics teachers and the need to broaden the school curriculum so as to encourage both boys and girls to consider careers in engineering. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider whether more can be done in that respect.

Finally, I draw attention once again to the statement by the Engineering Employers Federation, which was echoed in evidence given to the Select Committee on Employment today by my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) when he said that the firm of which he is chairman would be pleased to help with the training of more engineers in schools. The federation's annual review, which has just been published, says that it would like the Department of Education and Science to give a clear lead to local education authorities and teachers on ways in which they should be seeking and responding to industry's offer of help. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will draw this to the attention of his colleagues so that the Government can respond more fully to that offer of help from industry.

12.3 am

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): It is fair to say that this debate takes place against a background of genuine concern about the skill shortages in British industry generally and in engineering in particular. There is no doubt that the method of training had to change because technology was changing, and I appreciate the remarks of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurham) about the former hon. Member for Truro, the late David Penhaligon. In the short and rather unusual debate on the subject last year, the former Member for Truro said:

"one is tempted to believe that, although the time-serving part of the apprenticeship system has been abolished, the skill acquisition side of it has not been introduced to the extent that is needed."—[Official Report, 28 April 1986; Vol. 96, c. 753.]

That is the kind of gap we are facing today.

The engineering industry training board told the Select Committee on Employment that it felt that its pleas for more assistance had fallen on deaf ears — the board's words, not mine — and that the various undertakings given by the Government had not gone anywhere near what was needed to put Britain back on course to be able to compete effectively in manufacturing engineering worldwide.

An article in the Financial Times on 20 February began:

"British industry's attitude to training remains every bit as vacant as the jobs available for qualified staff."

It went on to quote the secretary of the EITB, Mr. Pennant Jones as saying:

"More and more people are trying to fish talent out of a smaller pond."

The Minister will acknowledge that comments such as that, coming from within the EITB, show a real anxiety and crisis. Indeed, the article pointed out that the exemption and the fact that so much of engineering employment was among small companies meant that the levy which the EITB received—because of 92 per cent. of companies in the industry being exempt—amounted to £3 million compared with £160 million.

I am not suggesting that that is anything other than a broad brush indication of the gap. As the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said, the EITB has put forward three alternative proposals for consideration. All of them show that more than that £3 million is needed. Of course tonight's order should be approved, but it should not be approved on the understanding that it addresses the real problem, which remains to be tackled urgently.

I understand that the position was highlighted at a meeting at the beginning of the month between the Secretary of State for Education and Science and representatives from six leading engineering companies in the United Kingdom, including Jaguar, Rolls-Royce and British Aerospace. They told the right hon. Gentleman of their belief that there was still a 60 per cent. shortfall in engineering graduates required, being 1,700 graduates in addition to the 1,700 graduates whom the Government have agreed to fund under the expansion scheme. I can say therefore at this late hour, in a spirit of generosity, that the Government have moved but that they have not moved anything like far or fast enough to meet the requirements of the industry.

I was given today a statistic which, if it is true, is alarming. I am told that South Korea is currently training twice as many engineering students as Britain, Sweden and West Germany combined. If that is the reality, it is an indication of the desperate position we face in the world and of our need for a more urgent response to our skill shortages, and for a better way of overcoming those shortages than the levy we are debating tonight.

It is clear that the employers in the engineering industry are not shouldering their responsibility to train. There is no doubt that the good companies will do the training. They suffer because they train for the companies that do not, and we must move to a system that ensures that the share of the cost of training is even, equal and fair.

I had a meeting recently with the Industrial Society. At that informal exchange of views I was told about the extent to which the Industrial Society is aware of how many companies have simply pulled out of in-house training. I was told that this was of some benefit for the Industrial Society because it had expanded dramatically, providing services for companies which had previously provided them in-house. On the optimistic side, the Industrial Society said that it noted that there was now a tendency for companies to start to re-establish their training departments. However, I believe that all the evidence shows that there is an enormous gap. Realistically, small companies will not do the training unless they are drawn in under the umbrella of the engineering industry training board.

To return to my earlier point, I do not look back to the good old days of engineering apprenticeships because I accept that we have moved on from there. However, I look forward to a time when we shall find a way to train and re-train people that is comparable to what the old scheme achieved, to ensure that we have the skills in the industry that are clearly missing at the moment.

I end by saying that the House should approve the order. However, the Minister should recognise that there is a crisis, especially in the engineering industry, and the Government have not shown the sense of urgency and commitment to solving that crisis that I believe is necessary. As we shall be moving into an election climate sometime in the next few months, it is not good enough for the Government simply to say that they have created the climate which British industry can take advantage of to become competitive in the world if they do not fill the gap and ensure that we have the skills and the means to train and re-train to ensure that we can keep pace with new technology and its application, something which we cannot do now. If the Korean statistics I have quoted are accurate, it is clear that Britain will not end up in the teens, in the league but will fall much further down the list unless we can respond to that. Engineering must be the backbone of our manufacturing industry, and skill training and re-training must be the backbone of the engineering industry.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade spoke about a consensus. It is true that everyone is in favour of training. Training is a good thing. The Minister was referring to consensus on the modest changes envisaged in the order. There is not much doubt that all hon. Members in the Chamber will give the order a welcome.

However, it would be wrong for my hon. Friend the Minister to assume that that consensus goes beyond the narrow proposals before us to the unquestioning acceptance of the way in which the levy is utilised by the engineering industry training board. He has said that over the next few months there are to be announcements of changes to the levy and exemptions. Those proposals might not receive a consensus as have tonight's proposals. The reason is that there is hesitation among companies — including the high technology companies in my constituency — about whether the sum of £19 million, which is an additional cost of training incurred by the company, is the best and most efficient way of obtaining an increment for training.

It has been suggested that, in practice, the engineering industry training board is not as responsive as we might expect it to be to the ideas, proposals and suggestions of companies. Firms have been responding — until last month — to the consultation document published in November. The three choices given in the document were of interest and gave cause for concern, but some companies answered the document by saying "Put your own house in order first." Companies have questioned whether the training board is responsive to the demands of the engineering industry today and whether it is capable of looking ahead to the requirements of the industry in future. It should set the pace. While companies are training workers to meet their immediate needs and their needs over the next few months, the industry board could be looking ahead to the requirements of the future.

Some people suggest that the engineering industry training board is administratively top heavy and that what it produces is not as efficient as the type of training provided by the best companies. I do not suggest that we should oppose the order, but I believe that many companies want to be assured that, if there are larger levy increases than those envisaged in the order, and if there are changes in the exemptions during the next few months, the burden on industry—it is already faced with extremely heavy competition in Britain and overseas — will not increase. They want a training system that will be cost-effective and the most efficient that can be devised in this essential industry.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Hanging over the debate is the spectre of the decline in the engineering and manufacturing industry. The fact that we are discussing it after midnight says a great deal about the way in which the Government, and indeed the country, view engineering and manufacturing. It underlines what many of us suspect —that the Government place greater priority on those who make money than on those who make things. My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said that we should all be greatly alarmed at the contraction in manufacturing industry, especially engineering. That contraction can clearly be seen in Huddersfield, in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Harrison), who is anxiously awaiting the Adjournment debate, and in my city of Bradford, where thousands upon thousands of skilled engineering and textile jobs have been lost in the past 10 to 15 years. There is enormous concern about the loss of skills together with the contraction of Bradford's manufacturing base. There is concern about the deskilling that has occurred. Those who are still in manufacturing industry are very worried about the need for their skills to be constantly improved to meet the challenges of the present and the future.

There is widespread unemployment in Bradford—15 per cent. compared with a national average of 12 per cent., with 28 per cent of those unemployed being out of work for more than two years. In some districts unemployment reaches more than 35 per cent. There are some six unemployed people chasing every job vacancy. Nearly half the unemployed are under 35.

Young people and adults in Bradford and elsewhere want good quality training and genuine job experience. They are wary of many YTS projects and are extremely suspicious about what real training will be available under the job training scheme. Despite the disparaging remarks made about apprenticeships by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), who is the spokesman for the alliance, most of my constituents regard apprenticeships as a valuable opportunity of the past.

The picture of training in Bradford has been painted recently in a survey by the vocational, educational and training group of the Manpower Services Commission, which has surveyed more than 200 companies in the city and is providing information that is regarded as fundamental to any planning process that seeks to equip young people and adults for the world of work. The covering letter distributed with the survey results states:

"It is encouraging to note that 25% of all companies visited expect their staff numbers to increase during the next 12 months. However, of the companies visited, almost a third of employees received training of some kind; this does mean that two-thirds did not, and whilst almost a half of those in managerial grades received training, this again means that a large proportion did not.

The report also highlights likely skill shortages in processing, both metal and non-metal, mainly within larger companies. It identifies, also, a major need for training or future training in computer or computer related skills."

I shall quote briefly from some of the main points made in the survey. On skill shortages and hard-to-fill vacancies it says:

"The major area of skill shortage is in non-metal and electrical processing with a particular problem in finding skilled sewing machinists."

On the future use of new technology the survey says:

"Although major use of New Technology is still likely to be in information handling it is worth noting the relatively high number of companies likely to be introducing NT in Manufacture and Design. This includes CNC machines in Textiles and CAD/CAM in drawing offices.

Of 121 companies likely to introduce new or further NT 11 thought this could create new jobs whilst 13 expected job losses as a result. All the other companies expected no change."

On training needs in new technology it says:

"There is however a significant number of non-clerical workers requiring training including Computer Aided Design in draughting, CNC machines in both engineering and textiles and the use of computer aided point-of-scale systems in retail distribution."

If the decline in manufacturing industry in my city and elsewhere is to be reversed, if the service sector and employment in it is to be sustained, training and re-training are vital. We need a comprehensive national training programme if men and women are to be brought back into work or into work for the first time.

As I said earlier, this Government have, regrettably, presided over the collapse of good training and the next Labour Government are awaited to repair that damage. It is difficult for us in Bradford to appreciate the priority that the Minister says his Government attach to the need for graduates, when in recent years we have seen significant cuts in the funds for Bradford university and the cuts that Aston and Salford have also suffered.

It is difficult for us to believe that the Government place a high priority on young people who require the skills that Britain will desperately need in future. The Government suggested establishing city technology colleges in cities such as Bradford and Leeds. I gather that there is now considerable uncertainty about whether those colleges will proceed. Certainly, they would cream off the most able young people and the most able teachers, and would be thoroughly unwelcome developments in Bradford and Leeds.

One in five of my constituents is unemployed and desperately anxious to obtain employment. Those people know that their chances will be enhanced if they have training, skills and experience. I would welcome the Minister's comments on this survey by the Manpower Services Commission. I assume that it has been passed to him and I would appreciate any information that he can give about what will be done in Bradford to enable the two thirds of its people who are in employment to obtain the training that they are currently denied. I should like to know what will be done to give those people who are desperately seeking employment the opportunity to secure good training that will improve their prospects for employment, either for the first time or after a long period of unemployment, during which they have wasted their skills, talent and enthusiasm on the dole.

Mr. Trippier: I shall ignore for a moment the vitriol in the uncharacteristic speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). I was flattered to hear him say that historians would read my speech in years to come. No one has ever been so kind to me in any debate. I thank him for that, and I hope that they do. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has finally decided to line up behind the board's efforts to increase training in the industry. He and his colleagues in the official Opposition have been treading a rather difficult path of late. They have wanted to blame someone for the skill shortages in engineering, but they have also wanted to maintain the ITB system as whole as the way forward. They cannot have it both ways. I made that point to him on numerous occasions at Question Time.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that morale was low within the board and among the staff of the ITB—he really must stop reading The Guardian. It is not true. Morale is not low on the board, and certainly not low among the staff, which is enthusiastic and keen to be involved in the important work of the National Council for Vocational Qualifications. It is keen to develop engineering training schemes under YTS and to play a significant part in it. It is getting more and more involved in these and other initiatives that we are introducing. One has only to speak to the people in the ITB who were involved in last year's "Winning Margin" conference to find out that what I am saying is fact and not hypothesis.

The Government will always try to respond positively to constructive suggestions made by the board—that is the way that the system works. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), in his effective contribution, made the point that we have to have consensus. We have consensus on the order today, but the board must have consensus within it, and the hon. Member for Huddersfield knows that well. It is a tripartite board, and the three questions that have been put in the form of a consultation exercise by the board to the industry and to trade unions, but not at this stage to Government—I emphasise that again—are seeking to address the problem that all hon. Members would agree are those confronting the engineering industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North is right to say that when the board decides to bring its conclusions to the MSC and ultimately to Ministers, we must have a consensus within the industry. That important point was lost in the contributions from the Opposition Benches.

I find it incredible that Opposition Members feel able to criticise the Government's training record, given how well it compares with that of the Labour Government. We have more than doubled our expenditure since we took office, and it is now running at £1·5 billion a year. Raising the skill level of the work force is vital if our industries are to compete in a world of rapidly changing technologies and markets. That is why vocational training and education measures are central to our economic strategy.

Mr. Madden: What about JTS?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman is out of step with what his party is saying about that, because it has changed its tune. I hope that he has time to read the new, official Labour proposals, which came out yesterday. I do not seek to rubbish them because some of them seem remarkably like those that we have recently introduced for the job training scheme. Some are exactly the same.

Our introduction of the JTS is not due to complacency. It is not a sign of complacency that we have tackled the problems that arose because schools were not equipping children for employment. We have introduced TVEI. I suppose nobody in the Labour party has thought of knocking that. We shall be spending £900 million on that over the next 10 years. We introduced first the YTS and now two-year YTS. That is not complacency. Young people are now entering the labour market with a sounder foundation of initial training than ever before. We are encouraging the reform of apprenticeship training and doing away with age limits and time-serving, and supporting apprentices through YTS.

The official Opposition seem keen on traditional apprenticeships. I agree with the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), that things have changed considerably over the last few years. The Labour party is always bemoaning the decline of traditional apprenticeships and we heard it again from the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). Luckily, an increasing number of trade union leaders — Clive Jenkins and Eric Hammond come to mind — are more enlightened. The other day, Eric Hammond said:

"Others will continue to cry crocodile tears over the plight of young people, but keep archaic, unused apprenticeship agreements intact."

We are contributing directly to skill supply through adult training programmes such as the new JTS, which will help up to 250,000 unemployed people per year to train in the skills that industry needs. We are widening access to training through the Open College, training access points and career development loans.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield asked what role the Government were playing in that, in addition to the support that they are giving to the board. That is the question that I am now addressing, apart from the first question that he asked about low morale. We are seeking to create the right framework for cost-effective training investment by employers and individuals by reforming the qualifications structure. That is not complacency. We are promoting collaboration between employers and training providers by the development of more cost-effective methods such as open learning and by providing better information on training needs and provision.

All the measures that I have mentioned directly address the central issue, on which we all seem to agree, that many British employers do not do enough training. They do not recognise that it should be regarded as an investment. Most of them regard it as a cost. Laying the foundations of initial training for new entrants to the work force is the most effective strategy that can be introduced for encouraging employers to take on young people and train and update them through their working lives, since it gives them a basis on which they can build cheaply and cost-effectively. We do not stop there.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Minister answer the central point that hon. Members have asked, about how much is spent on training people in the work force? The Minister has given us a catalogue of income support measures for unemployed people. Most of the money is spent on income support, not training. The Government have spent a little on training, but almost none on training people in work. Will the Minister answer that?

Mr. Trippier: That is the point that I was seeking to make earlier. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. The Government responded positively—I assume the hon. Gentleman agrees with that—in retaining the statutory training boards for certain industries because the employers wanted to keep them. If we have a system such as that, they should be responsible for training in that industry and, as I have already said, we respond positively to the constructive suggestions that they make to us. That is the system that we have supported and the hon. Gentleman cannot knock it. It is working.

If the hon. Gentleman is saying that the statutory board system is not working effectively, what does the Opposition propose to do with statutory training boards? I thought that the hon. Gentleman supported them. The statutory training board has been responsible for training in the engineering industry, and it is up to it to deal with the problems of skill shortages, which all hon. Members have identified in their speeches this evening. It has to identify them and deal with them effectively through consensus.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) drew the attention of the House to another problem. We recognise the challenge that is posed to employers by new and high technologies and our work force must be skilled in those if we shall compete in world markets. Some £30 million of the MSC's adult training expenditure is in that high technology sector. That is a good example of training that we are giving to people who are already in the work force. Examples include the leading edge technology programme, in which the vast majority of the courses funded are in information technology skills. There are local collaborative projects in software engineering, OpenTech packages and electronics. We also spend £43 million under the Switch programme to provide extra places in higher education on courses in engineering and technology.

Labour Members are fond of talking about skill shortages, but they are now far less severe than they were when we took office. In 1979 over 15 per cent. of manufacturing firms were expecting output to be constrained by shortages of skilled labour, but now the figure is 9 per cent.

What is the Opposition's proposed solution to the problems? I find it difficult to comment on that on the basis of the document entitled "New jobs for Britain" which they published yesterday, which seems to have been eclipsed by certain other matters which have arisen both in the House and outside. From what I have seen so far, the proposal for training places looks remarkably like the Government's policies which have already been implemented. One would be hard-pressed to spot the divide. But we are a little confused and we hope that that confusion will be cleared up when the final package comes forward next week.

We want to know whether the 300,000 training places referred to in that document are in addition to the 300,000 young people and 300,000 adults whom we are already training, or whether they are in place of them. If they are in addition to, I can only welcome the fact that the Labour party has suddenly recognised the value of our policies and seeks to build constructively on them. If they are instead of, I can only say that I am sorry that it is proposing to cut training provision in half.

What about mobilising employers' contribution to training? Again, I cannot wait to see the removal of the veils. Have the Opposition abandoned the solution preferred by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) of bringing back all the industrial training boards or replicating the ITB system across industry, trade and commerce? Have they abandoned their proposal for a 1 per cent. levy? That has been said, but it has not been said again today. It was not mentioned yesterday. Will that be referred to in the document? What will the 1 per cent. be on? Will it be on turnover, payroll, or what? That would act as a significant brake on enterprise — an increase of 15 percentage points in corporation tax.

Do the Opposition propose to hide behind the Manpower Services Commission's forthcoming study, as they seem to have suggested in their document yesterday? If that is the Opposition's alternative, I do not see how the House can do anything other than support us in our policies on training in the engineering industry and in industry as a whole. I recommend the order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Engineering Board) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 13 February, be approved.

County Hall, Wakefield

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Portillo.]

12.37 am

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me. I have had a long wait, but I sincerely hope that we shall gain some benefit from the debate. You may recall that on 4 March I waited a long time to intervene on this same subject, the use of county hall, but on that occasion we were discussing county hall, London.

Under question 14, my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), whose constituency is 400 miles away, was given the opportunity to ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he had had about the continued use of county hall for the London marathon. I waited for a long time hoping to ask the same type of question. I live only two miles away from county hall in Wakefield, but I thought that if a Scotsman could ask a question about a building 400 miles away, I would be entitled to ask a question, living as I do only two miles away.

Time has gone slowly tonight. I have waited five hours. I was told that we would quickly reach the Adjournment debate. But last week, tempus fugit. It flew quickly. After rising to my feet twice, Mr. Speaker said to me, "Bad luck". He drew my attention to the fact that it was 3.31 and then terminated questions. I saw a broad smile come across the faces of the two Environment Ministers. I know that they were pleased that I had got the chop.

However, my fortunes turned because, having applied for an Adjournment debate, I was quickly told that I had been lucky. Instead of bad luck, I had good luck. However, at this time of night I doubt whether I was lucky to get the Adjournment.

When I left the Chamber, having got the information about the Adjournment debate, with my usual warmth and affection for Government Ministers, I said, "Hello, Chris. How's things?" Chris replied, "All right. We have got a debate next Thursday; I am looking forward to it." I said, "So am I", and here we are tonight. That is where the mutual admiration society finishes—it had only a short life. I am here to argue an absolutely different point of view from that of the Minister. The mutual admiration society that the Under-Secretary and I were going to form has terminated already.

What have I found out? On Sunday, in a newspaper proscribed by some people, I read the headline:

"Ridley urges sell off."

It stated:

"A new crackdown on local councils holding large amounts of assets was signalled yesterday by Nicholas Ridley, the Environment Secretary. Ridley indicated that a future Conservative Government would take steps to encourage councils to sell assets, such as land or property, to the private sector."

The Secretary of State and his predecessor took positive steps regarding county hall in Wakefield. I have made representations and led delegations because I am concerned about that marvellous building. It is one of the finest buildings in the country. It was purpose built in 1888 after the county council decided to build its own residence. At that time, the council resided in Wakefield city town hall. However, in the space of four years, it built a marvellous edifice which was officially opened in 1898.

The building has terrific historic value. The stone work, the staircase, the carpeting, furniture and panelling were purpose built for the local authority. The standard of county hall is above that of the Palace of Westminster.

What has happened? From the representations and discussions that I have had, I believe that I have been misled on certain occasions. When I met the Under-Secretary I was told that the decision to sell off Wakefield county hall was the responsibility of the residuary body. However, when I visited the residuary body I was told that the responsibility lay with the Minister. I was used like a ping pong.

Having been so misled, I shall continue with my strong representation that county hall should stay with the Wakefield metropolitan district council and remain a public body building. It should not be sold off for use as a hotel, casino, dance hall or bingo hall. It should retain the dignity of the purpose for which it was built. In other words, it should be used for local government.

If the Wakefield metropolitan district council and the police authority, which was in the West Riding, were to remain with the Wakefield metropolitan borough council, millions of pounds would be saved. The local authority is short of accommodation because of the additional duties that it has to perform following abolition. The police authority is stretched. Indeed, for several years it was told that it could have £30 million worth of new headquarters. Consideration was then given to refurbishment, which would have cost £8·5 million. If the police authority were committed to have the education block by arrangement and by package deals and the local authority were to have the county accommodation, at least £6 million or £7 million would be saved immediately.

When I referred this matter to the Home Secretary, my questions were directed to the Department of the Environment. The DoE referred me to the residuary body. When that body has gone to the highest bidder, I hope that the Minister will intervene—I trust that he will assure me this evening that he will do so—and take into consideration all the issues that are involved, instead of concentrating on the highest bidder, who will make a quick buck. It is probable that he will try to rent the property to the local authority and the police, as others have tried to do in the past with other properties. I appeal to the Minister to assure me that he will take into consideration all the issues and ensure that there is proper consultation.

On 1 January 1988, I want to march from the town hall to county hall to reoccupy the magnificent building that I have described. That is the day on which the residuary body says that it can be taken over. The police band should take that route and the WMBC supporters. We want properly to reoccupy county hall.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Harrison) for raising the issue and for the way in which he has put his case. It is not a new one. We have discussed it on a previous occasion. I hope that he is appreciative of the fact that I can respond to the debate as I could not during Question Time, when he sought to raise the matter. I now have a little more time in which to explain the background to the matter and what is likely to happen in future.

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The responsibility for the future of county hall rests primarily with the residuary body—one of the residuary bodies that were set up under the Local Government Act 1985. The residuary bodies were established to wind up the outstanding affairs of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. The property of the abolished councils transferred either to functional successors or to residuary bodies. County hall, Wakefield, has no relevance in terms of transferred functional responsibilities, and therefore quite properly passed into the ownership of the residuary body. It therefore falls to the residuary body to decide just how the building should be disposed of, within the general property guidelines issued by the Department of the Environment.

As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, at his request, I met the chairman of the West Yorkshire residuary body last October to discuss the issue. At that meeting, I explained that I expected the residuary body to consider all of the options open for the future of county hall and that, in doing so, they should be aware of their fiduciary duty to all of the ratepayers of the former county council area. I also stressed that, in considering all of the options, the residuary body should properly consider opportunities for disposal on the open market. I also made it clear to the chairman that any disposal to Wakefield metropolitan district council or some other public body should be for value — that is to say, a fair market price — to take account of the interests of the ratepayers of the abolished authority as a whole.

The right hon. Gentleman will recognise the fact that the points that I made at that meeting were entirely in line with the general property guidelines issued to the residuary bodies, a copy of which was placed in the Library last August. I am pleased to say that the chairman of the residuary body was in full accord with me on those points, and I am content that he and his fellow members are acting entirely within the framework laid down by the guidelines. Indeed, I should take this opportunity to put on record my appreciation of the way in which all of the members of the West Yorkshire residuary body have so conscientiously discharged their responsibilities.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the possibility of Wakefield metropolitan district council or the West Yorkshire police authority acquiring county hall. I understand that both bodies have submitted bids to take over the property, and I am sure that these bids will be considered on their merits, alongside any other bids that are received. However, I am informed that neither bid takes the form of a firm monetary offer for the building. I remain of the view that any transfer within the public sector must be on a value basis. It should be borne in mind that county hall belonged to all of the ratepayers of the former county council area — not just to those of one district — and the residuary body has a duty to all of those ratepayers. Only by ensuring that any disposal is on a cash basis and that the proceeds are then distributed to all five district councils in west Yorkshire can the residuary body adequately discharge that responsibility.

It has been suggested that, under the present arrangements for the distribution of proceeds from the sale of residuary body property, Leeds and Bradford district councils would benefit most from the sale of county hall. It has also been suggested that the proceeds from such a sale should be distributed between Wakefield, Calderdale and Kirklees, who originally paid for the building. The general principle that has been followed is that the financial benefits and liabilities inherited from the county councils should be distributed to the districts in each county, pro rata to population. This applies to both inherited money and to receipts arising from property sales. Orders giving effect to this principle have already been made.

The liability for any debt outstanding in respect of county hall falls countywide. It is fair that the benefits from its disposal should do so, too. There is no case for treating county hall — or any proceeds arising from its sale — any differently from the other assets or liabilities that the residuary body has inherited.

While mentioning the bids received from Wakefield metropolitan district council and the police authority, I should say that the residuary body has been scrupulous in ensuring that both local Members of Parliament and councillors have been kept fully informed of all developments. I know that the residuary body chairman has had a number of meetings with hon. Members and councillors. Indeed, I understand that he met the leader of Wakefield metropolitan district council only yesterday afternoon.

It is right to pay tribute to the work of the residuary body and to acknowledge the success so far. West Yorkshire residuary body has the largest property portfolio outside London. It is to its credit that it has so quickly got to grips with the task of sorting out the records — transferring the appropriate records to the district councils and joint authorities as it proceeded — and bringing forward for sale as much surplus property as it has been able. I am informed that, to date, it has realised £2·8 million from the sales. This money will eventually be distributed among the five district councils in west Yorkshire and will benefit all of the ratepayers of the area. If we had acceded to the right hon. Member's requests for all of the surplus property of the county council to be transferred to the district councils, the ratepayers would not have received this benefit.

The residuary body has also done an excellent job in winding up the financial affairs of the county council and in closing the accounts for 1985-86. Both of these tasks were completed quickly. In addition, the residuary body has been responsible for calculating and paying both redundancy payments and detriment payments to former county council staff. Again these tasks were performed scrupulously and swiftly.

I should make one final comment on the role and accountability of the residuary bodies. The residuary bodies are properly accountable. The members of the residuary bodies are appointed by and are accountable to the Secretary of State who, in his turn, is accountable to Parliament. I am therefore content that the residuary bodies are properly and fully accountable for all their actions.

As I have said, I am satisfied that any offers received from Wakefield metropolitan district council, the police authority or any other public sector body will be considered on their merits. But many other expressions of interest have also been received. I am informed that there have been some 60 inquiries to date, and it is quite right that all these should be followed up to ensure that the best possible deal is obtained for the ratepayers.

I understand that some of the inquiries received are on the basis of possible use for hotel or residential development. If these inquiries are to come to fruition, they could be the subject of planning appeals. Therefore, it would be wrong of me to comment on specific suggestions. However, I must record my strong belief that the residuary body should consider seriously all the various possibilities for both private and public sector investment in this building. Over the years, Wakefield's economy has been over-dependent on local government employment and it would benefit from the boost of additional private sector employment.

I have visited this fine building and it could possibly be used by the private sector. However, it is open to Wakefield council to purchase the building. I understand that it has the resources with which to do so, if it places a sufficiently high priority on that objective. Recent press cuttings suggest that Wakefield will be taking £9·5 million from its reserves for its 1987-88 budget and that it is spending £5·5 million on new leisure facilities. That is evidence of the ability of Wakefield council to incur high expenditure. If the council wants to put in a good bid for this building, it will be able to do so. All other things being equal, if Wakefield's bid is the highest it will get county hall for its own purposes.

There is nothing to prevent Wakefield from negotiating with the police authority over dual use. I am unable to comment on the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion that particularly large savings could be made from a deal involving the police authority and the education authority, but I understand that the West Yorkshire police authority would like to purchase the premises of the education department at No. 8 Bond street at a cost of £725,000. However, that purchase would depend upon Wakefield council obtaining county hall.

The West Yorkshire police authority argues that if it obtained the education department's premises it would permit the early centralisation of a number of police headquarters departments and the surrender of unsuitable accommodation in other parts of Wakefield. Furthermore, the proposed redevelopment of the existing police force headquarters would no longer be necessary. The West Yorkshire police authority's preliminary estimate of the proposed redevelopment of the force headquarters is £8 million and phase 1 is expected to cost about £2 million. Estimates have not yet been submitted to the Home Office, but if there is to be a beneficial financial deal involving the police authority's use of the education department's premises, it will be taken into account by those who are considering the bids for county hall.

The right hon. Gentleman implied that there was a threat to this fine building. The fact that it is a grade 1 listed building is a guarantee that it will not be vandalised. Anyone thinking of purchasing the building would have to take into account the fact that it is a listed building. The fine panelling and other accoutrements to which the right hon. Gentleman referred will have to be retained by any purchaser.

I have been to see the building. It is a fine building for which the right hon. Gentleman rightly has great affection. He becomes emotional about it because he is attached to it, but there is no reason to suppose that the building will be in jeopardy because of the actions of the residuary body in seeking to dispose of it, with the sale being of benefit to all the ratepayers in the former county area.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at One o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 13 March 1987

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Cancer Patients (Treatment and Care)

9.35 am

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I beg to move,

That this House believes that a humane and efficient health service should be guided by three main priorities in relation to cancer, namely: an effective national screening system designed to facilitate the earliest possible diagnosis of the different forms of disease, the provision of resources to enable patients to benefit promptly from the most technologically advanced treatment available, and the development of hospice and other facilities to permit the terminally ill to end their lives in decent and dignified surroundings with the minimum of pain; and calls on the Government to ensure that these priorities are fully reflected in the future funding of the National Health Service.

I should like to thank the research department of the House of Commons Library. The researchers were most helpful. I thank also the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security. The hon. Lady was kind enough to speak to me last night about the terms of the motion. I should also like to thank her staff. I am also grateful for the help given by Dr. Charles Gillis of the cancer prevention unit at Ruchill general hospital in the north end of the city of Glasgow.

Seventeen years ago I was told that my mother was suffering from cancer of the womb. I know what families go through when they get that dramatic news. They have a duty to look after their loved ones, and at the same time they have to face one of the most distressing situations with which they will have to cope in their life. Even after all those years, I still say to myself that perhaps in my mother's case, and that of many other women, that could have been prevented had there been the proper screening facilities and education for women.

I should like to mention research into cancer. I am told by many experts that there is serious concern about the lack of research and the fact that excellent grant applications are being turned down because of the lack of resources. Perhaps the Minister can comment on that.

I have been informed that in the United States of America public and private resources are made available to the tune of 20 times the level in the United Kingdom. Not only does that inhibit research into a cure for cancer, but it leads to some of our brightest young scientists going abroad. It is not helpful in any branch of science that we are losing the cream of our scientific community.

The Medical Advisory Committee working group on "Acute Services for Cancer," expressing concern about resources, stated:

"The NHS generally cannot be insulated from economic realities, but current resource constraints do have particularly significant implications for services to cancer patients. The gap between the level of services generally available and the level that it is now possible to achieve has increased considerably. This may be true for some other diseases but we believe it is especially true for cancer. The costs of surgery and radiotherapy are largely contained within the fixed costs of the service but the more recently developed methods of investigation and treatment of cancer patients, based on recent technical advances, are frequently very costly and have to be provided from the limited funds available for new developments. We recognise the difficulties but the overall aim must be to narrow the gap between what is technically possible and what is practicable in service terms with available resources."

The Lancet and other leading medical journals have claimed that Medical Research Council funds are insufficient to maintain a healthy base of science for medical research in the United Kingdom and the confidence and morale of the gifted workers, especially those entering research. I should be obliged if the Minister would comment on such statements by journals that are highly regarded in the medical world. If we are to find a cure for cancer, we must support research.

On the issue of prevention, screening must be available to everyone who is at risk in the community. Proper screening means that there must be proper recall services and easy access to the clinics and GPs who are able to carry out such screening.

On 11 June 1986, the Nursing Times expressed grave concern about screening. It stated:

"The mortality rates for cervical cancer have not improved markedly during the past 15 years and this despite increased medical and technical knowledge.

Cervical cancer is a largely preventable cancer. That is the good news. The bad news is that an estimated 2,000 women are still dying each year from this disease, often because they leave treatment too late. Why is the screening programme still so ineffective?"

In my area, the Greater Glasgow health board is taking steps to rectify the problem. However, until recently, the board would have been unable to tell whether six, seven or eight smears had been taken from one individual over several years, or whether several women were involved, because proper records were not kept.

If we are to have proper screening facilities, we should have a recall system, and proper records must be kept if we are to have effective recall. We must also have specialists to analyse the smears that are taken. Scandinavian countries are far more effective in their screening processes than we are. In those countries, cervical and breast cancers have been drastically reduced. Why can we not learn from the countries that are so successful at the moment?

We need not only effective screening but to cut down the incidence of error. The clinics should be within easy reach of both city and rural dwellers.

I welcome the statement made by the Secretary of State for Social Services on 25 February 1987 in which he spoke of the need for proper recall services for cervical and breast cancer. I hope that the resources that he mentioned will be new resources, not funds shifted from another part of the Health Service.

There can be no doubt that education must and will play an important part in prevention. There has been a three fold increase in the incidence of female lung cancer in Glasgow—it has been established that smoking is on the increase among younger women—yet 40 per cent. of the population continue to smoke. The medical profession regards Glasgow as the lung cancer capital of the world. In 1985, 46 per cent. of male cancer deaths were due to lung cancer, and 90 per cent. of lung cancer is avoidable. People working with dangerous substances, such as asbestos and rubber, and who are non-smokers, run the risk of contracting cancer. People in the same occupation who are smokers vastly increase their chances of catching the disease.

I know that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), has got into difficulties over the issue of diet. However, we should all take expert advice on our diets and lifestyles. I hope that her Department envisages expanding education on those matters.

Turning to patient care, I understand that some cancer wards in my area—this could be the case throughout the country—have nursng levels below those which doctors and specialists would like. I should be grateful if the Minister could look into that.

I should like to mention specially the Beaton memorial hospital in Glasgow. One of my friends, a terminal patient, was cared for in that hospital some weeks ago. Through visiting her on many occasions, at a stage when the family were allowed in at any time, I know that the care given by the nursing staff and doctors in that hospital was absolutely second to none. Such care is a great comfort to the patient's loved ones. It helps them to know that the patient has been cared for in a loving manner and with all the dignity that is deserved. I hope that all hospitals that care for terminally ill and other cancer patients, who are receiving radiotherapy treatment, look after their patients in that way.

In my constituency, there is the Marie Curie hospital, known as Hunters Hill. When I visit that hospital I am always amazed, because it is one of the most cheerful environments that I have had the pleasure of visiting and it is one of the happiest communities in my area. I would certainly welcome an expansion of hospitals.

Many people who are ill want to be cared for in their own home and cancer patients are no exception. Domiciliary care is most important. It takes a great deal of support to look after a patient at home, and support must be given not only to the patient, but to the family. Such care requires co-operation between general practitioners, district nurses, health centres and social services. When patients want to be cared for at home every effort should be made to make that possible.

Often a husband or wife will not leave a sick spouse who is in pain unless an experienced nurse is prepared to sit with the patient through the night. The Marie Curie organisation and the Health Service are prepared to provide night services. Will the Minister tell us whether she intends to expand the domiciliary care services?

I understand that there are many effective ways of relieving pain. However, those who live in rural or remote areas run the risk of sometimes being denied that help because doctors are not prepared to leave what are considered to be dangerous drugs with anyone other than a qualified nurse. People who live in the borders and the Highlands must travel long distances for radiotherapy treatment. I would like an assurance that steps will be taken to reduce such long journeys to relieve the burdens that patients already endure.

Finally, I should like to read two quotes from the report of the Standing Medical Advisory Committee. The first relates to the need for an integrated service. The report stresses the need for an integrated service, and states:

"In discussing the organisation of cancer services we have emphasised the importance of easy access to services. The underlying aim of cancer services should be to ensure that cancer patients, whether potential or confirmed, have speedy access to the diagnostic and treatment services their condition demands. This must be the baseline on which the efficacy of services in any Region is judged. Given the complex nature of the various cancer conditions and the increasingly complex and expensive treatments involved, we believe this access can only be achieved where cancer services within a Region are planned and delivered in an integrated way. This should embrace not only the hospital services, with which this report is concerned, but also the community and prevention services."

My final quotation is on the need for co-operation between the different disciplines. The report states:

"Success in developing integrated cancer services depends very much on the quality of communications between the individuals and institutions concerned. A theme throughout the Report is the need for good communication between clinicians, between clinicians and nurses and between staff and patients and their families. Good communications between DGHs and the hospitals providing specialist services are essential if the close working links described above and elsewhere in the Report are to be developed successfully. This Report is intended to help clinicians, planners and others both at Region and District to meet the challenge of organising their service in a way which ensures the development of these good communications and the resulting complementary working relationship. Only in this way will those working in both DGH and specialist unit be equipped to meet the basic aim of providing all cancer patients in their care with the services they need when they need them."

I am grateful to have had this opportunity of bringing the motion before the House.

9.55 pm

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): I am sure that all hon. Members present are grateful to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) for giving the House the opportunity to debate this important subject this morning. We have heard, rightly, a great deal recently about the threat of AIDS, but that should not obscure the importance of the long-term fight against cancer, which continues to kill many people.

First, I must declare an interest as the vice-president of the Women's National Cancer Control Campaign. It is a voluntary organisation concerned, not only with educating women about cancer, its prevention and treatment, but with practical steps to fight the disease, particularly through screening programmes.

Breast cancer, because it affects women in a way which is particularly damaging to their self-perception as women, demands particular care in treatment. As with all cancers, women are frightened of the unpredictability of the disease, but women are also not helped by the unpredictability of treatment. To many women, breast cancer invokes images of radical mastectomy, yet in reality treatment may involve the removal of only small amounts of tissue. Although less obviously traumatic, much the same applies to the treatment of cervical cancer. The most important step is early screening. The Government's recent acceptance of the Forrest report's recommendations and their announcement of a national screening service for all women between the ages of 50 and 64 are essential first steps and are most welcome.

I accept that any such services started from scratch will need time to establish a network of back-up services, such as training for staff and treatment and counselling for patients. Nevertheless, one must recognise that the numbers of cases of breast cancer among young women are increasing. I hope that the Government will continue to monitor that and to keep under review whether the service should be expanded to cover all women.

Obviously, it will not be easy to persuade all women to be screened. Understandably, some will be frightened by the possible results of the tests. The only way to counteract that is to show that early screening means early detection of problems and swift, more effective treatment. The WNCCC is in the vanguard of that work and runs a special mobile screening unit which is already in demand.

I should like to congratulate the Tesco supermarket group, the headquarters of which are in my constituency. The firm has arranged with the WNCCC for the mobile unit to tour stores in England, Scotland and Wales, providing free cervical smear tests and breast examinations for female employees. I should add that men have not been ignored—check-ups for excess weight and blood pressure are available to them.

That is an excellent example to other employers. It is an initiative that could usefully be developed. Resources are spread widely throughout the many services within the National Health Service and opportunities for involving the private sector in developing screening programmes would surely be in the best interests of all. As more companies recognise the benefits of pay packages that involve more than just money, co-operation is definitely possible.

Recently the WNCCC provided its mobile screening unit for use during a women's health week which was run by Waltham Forest health authority. The facility was backed up by considerable publicity in the local press and by the use of posters and leaflets. Results were encouraging and, paradoxically, worrying. The tests performed were cervical smears and breast examinations. Of the 406 tests, two were positive, 61 required recall within three to 12 months, 12 were inadequate or lost and 331 were negative. The number of women coming forward was a good response to the publicity, but the fact that 63 out of 406 would require at least further screening suggests that there is a definite problem since, without the WNCCC's mobile unit and Waltham Forest's initiative, none of those women would have been aware of any problem until much later.

Other statistics reinforce my plea for constant monitoring by the Government. A total of 59 per cent. of the women were under the age of 50, which emphasises that screening may have to be widened. The computerised call and recall system for cervical cancer will go a long way towards tackling that, but the inclusion of breast examination needs to be kept under review.

A total of 129 of the women gave details of previous tests. No fewer than 84 per cent. had not had a test within the last three years, 55 per cent. had not had a test within five years and 18 per cent. had never had one. That illustrates the scale of the problem.

The committee on gynaecological cytology has recommended screening at three-year intervals. While I can understand that improving the numbers who come forward for tests is high priority, I think that it is important that if shortening intervals from five to three years significantly improves successful treatment, the change ought to be considered seriously.

Despite a comprehensive screening programme, it is inevitable that some women will still develop both breast and cervical cancer and, unfortunately, die as a result. It is true that tremendous strides in the development of treatment have been made over recent years, not only in relation to tackling the disease at cellular level, but in providing psychological support for those undergoing therapy.

Medical science has known for some time that the speed and effectiveness of recovery from surgery is improved by giving patients accurate, relevant information about their treatment and what they can expect to feel like after an operation. It is as important to post-operative care as pain-killers can be. Much of that research is now incorporated into hospital treatments, and more especially into the work on those who are terminally ill, both in hospitals and hospices.

Such an approach requires co-operation between patient and doctor. The onus lies with the doctor, for it is not always easy to discover a patient's true worries in a simple, single interview. The development of the role of trained nurses as counsellors must provide a way forward. That may produce an additional burden upon resources, but some of that will be offset in the improved effectiveness of treatment. It would also help to deal with the known problems of depression and anxiety which are often found in patients undergoing courses of cytotoxic drugs.

The process relies upon two-way communication; both nurse and patient need to develop a relationship which gives the patient trust and confidence in the treatment she is undergoing. In the light of this, treatment needs to take full account of the views of women as patients, not simply the results of clinical reports and observations of doctors.

Across the country, there are hospitals where such attitudes prevail; but it is not universal. We all accept that the NHS exists for patients, and in the area of cancer treatment that philosophy needs stressing above all. It is not just a matter of surgery as a steady, clinical process.

For all that, for some patients there will come a time when treatment cannot cure; it can act only as a palliative. In this area, I welcome the recent DHSS circular and the National Association of Health Authorities' publication on care of the dying.

Publicity about AIDS has heightened awareness of this both in hospitals and hospices, and emphasised the humane, dedicated care already provided for those unfortunate enough to have cancer.

I welcome in particular the stress laid by the DHSS upon collaboration between local and national voluntary groups and health authorities. No one group has a monopoly on wisdom or resources; joint planning arrangements would make sense.

Although there will be training for those in the Health Service, what arrangements exist for assisting those in the voluntary sector, or local authority social services staff? It is important that there should be no weak links in the chain. Care of the terminally ill cannot rely on small numbers of centres of excellence; every hospital, hospice or home has to be a centre of excellence. So we need to strengthen links between the Health Service and the community—between individuals, rather than between the daunting face of bureaucracy and the confused member of the public, which is the image of big organisations.

What provisions exist for liaison between community nurses and ward staff who have been looking after patients who choose to leave hospital? Patients must have the maximum confidence that community nurses know all about their case, and the treatment that has been offered. That is especially important in the tragic cases of child cancer patients.

I believe that cancer services have been greatly improved over the past 10 years. We have in this country a record of treatment and care of which we can be proud. There is always room for improvement, but every year brings us more understanding and knowledge, and a step nearer a cure. What we can do is to help ourselves by improving prevention.

10.8 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) who has allowed us the opportunity to debate this subject. The hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) hinted at the fact that we often have an opportunity on a Friday to deal with important subjects, which are not total cross-departmental subjects. Cancer, by its sheer statistical toll, has affected and does affect so many families. It is the second highest cause of death in this country. Most of us have had personal experience of coping with the death of close relatives from cancer. This is a good opportunity to try to put that into the perspective of public policy, so I am grateful to the hon. Member for Springburn for his choice of subject.

The hon. Gentleman highlights three main priorities as being those on which to concentrate. Clearly, in a relatively short debate we cannot talk about all of them. Principally I want to consider the facilities available to deal with the terminally ill. However, I want briefly to mention the first two of the three priorities highlighted by the hon. Member for Springburn. I shall start by rehearsing one or two of the statistics which make this such a vital subject for our consideration.

The Minister will confirm that, apart from circulatory diseases, cancer is still the largest cause of death in the United Kingdom. It is interesting that that is not the case in other countries. Other countries are more successful in reducing the incidence of cancer, especially preventable cancer; for example, lung cancer through the avoidance of smoking. At the moment, we suffer about 150,000 deaths a year from cancer in the United Kingdom out of a total of 650,000 deaths. Among those under the age of 70, the disease affects women more than men. We should be aware of that when we consider ways to deal with cancer.

I notice that adverts on billboards claim that one person in three suffers from cancer at some time in their lives. I believe that the figure is closer to one in four. To complete the picture, I will give the other figures. Some 190,000 cancer cases are diagnosed each year and there are approximately 75,000 cures. A lot of good work is being done, but we will not be able to find cures in many cases for some time to come. Therefore, we need to concentrate on care and support systems as well as the preventive aspects of the debate.

The hon. Member for Broxbourne said that one in 12 women suffer from breast cancer at some stage during their lives. The figures are horrific because 15,000 women a year die from breast cancer. That is still the most common form of cancer among women. Therefore, last week's initiative announced by the Government is more than welcome because there are still about 25,000 new cases of breast cancer a year.

Those are the cruel statistics of this horrendous killer disease. The announcement made by the Government two weeks ago was, as I said at the time, unreservedly welcome. It was specifically aimed at women aged between 50 and 64. Hopefully it will provide relief and prevent deaths for up to 2,000 women a year.

Before I consider other issues, I hope that the Minister will deal with the points made in Hospital Doctor magazine last week. On its front page an article states that effective screening will take up to 10 years. That is clearly of some concern. Although those people involved with the Forrest committee welcomed the announcement, there is still concern about how long full implementation will take. When the Minister replies, I hope that she will consider whether it is possible to foresee a speeding up of the timetable so that we can have effective screening for those who are intended to be covered by last week's announcement. There is proper professional concern on that point.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Was the 10 years based on the current rate of funding announced by the Government last week or was it calculated on some other basis? Clearly the rate of funding is crucial.

Mr. Hughes: That was the assessment made by the Forrest committee in the light of the recent announcement. That is the figure which has been announced in the light of funding. Obviously, funding and resources will always be the major determinant of the speed with which programmes can be implemented. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) may want to develop that later.

The second priority highlighted by the hon. Member for Springburn was the provision of resources to enable patients to benefit promptly from the most technologically advanced treatment available. I guess, as the hon. Gentleman must know, that that will never be entirely achievable. However highly advanced the technology available, there will none the less never be enough technology to deal with everyone at the maximum rate of efficiency. There will always be a difficulty there. That is probably one of the reasons why the third priority which the hon. Member for Springburn quite rightly highlighted — the development of hospice and other facilities — is even more important.

I remember when my father was dying of cancer he lived in Hereford and had to be treated in Cheltenham in Gloucestershire. He had to go there every week for treatment. The institution in Cheltenham was a relatively new one and the special therapy treatment it provided was also new. I was aware that the competition for places for treatment was enormous. That is still the case and not everyone lives near to such high-tech treatment which can provide alleviation and a possible cure for the disease.

I want to consider the treatment of the terminally ill and the collaboration between health authorities and the voluntary sector. First, I want to consider the growing and apparently effective role of self-help groups, self-help centres and facilities for the dying. I wonder whether we need to be a little wary of the sort of announcement that appeared in The Independent on 10 March which stated that it was forecast that by the year 2000 there would be a cure for two thirds of those suffering from cancer. I am not certain that that idea is generally accepted yet. I am not sure that we can look forward to as early a solution as that suggests.

Because self-help is very important, I shall consider one example of an organisation and address my points specifically to the Minister about that body. The Minister will be familiar with the body as it is the British Association of Cancer United Patients—BACUP. That body is run by a cancer patient, Vicky Clement Jones, of whom the Minister will know well. Vicky Clement Jones has come to public knowledge through the publicity which BACUP has received in the past two years. She has learnt, as she came to terms with her ovarian cancer, that she had to confront the fact that she was dying. That was her challenge. When the able-bodied go about their daily lives, they do not think about dying, although we should all be confronted by the fact that we are dying. The point for cancer sufferers, AIDS victims and others is that death may be more imminent for them than for the rest of us. Vicky Clement Jones found—as we often find—that people with a fatal disease often shrink back from confronting the reality. The rest of the public silently put those people into a different category. They seem to say, "They are dying, we are not." That is a false dichotomy.

Vicky Clement Jones reacted to such attitudes. She had the advantage of being a doctor and she reacted positively. She claimed that the lives of people who were dying—the terminally ill—are just as valuable, and probably more valuable for that period, than the lives of healthy people. The terminally ill can live their lives fully and often more fully than those of us who have no imminent risk of our departures. "The prospect of death concentrates the mind wonderfully" is a cliché, but in reality it also concentrates the way in which people try to get the most out of their lives.

Prevailing attitudes must be changed. Even those who are well-informed withdrew from Vicky Clement Jones and that included her medical colleagues. People must be encouraged not to do that. BACUP is trying to ensure that people do the opposite and above all it is trying to inform people of the alternatives if they are suffering from cancer. They inform people of the alternative ranges of action available to them to overcome the disease, minimise its effects or to maximise the opportunities during their remaining weeks, months or years of life.

Without doubt, BACUP, over two years, has begun to change attitudes. I hope that the Minister will be able to give some encouragement to that body today. Since its launch on 31 October 1985—only 16 months ago—it has dealt with 20,000 inquiries, 80 per cent. of them from women. It has been almost overwhelmed by the volume of inquiries because it emphasises the need for information and to communicate to and with the cancer victim.

It has become the national information service for cancer patients. It sees itself as in no way challenging the National Health Service but as a complement to the NHS. It deals with all types of cancer and goes across the range of cancer issues. Cancer patients represent 40 per cent. of its clients; relatives and friends of cancer patients represent another 40 per cent.; 6 per cent. are health professionals, who are often ignorant of the emotional implications; and 6 per cent. ask about screening and prevention.

Apart from a few doctors who still believe that no one else should talk to their patients about their health, BACUP has been accepted as a valuable and useful service. It has received favourable professional comment and it has an eminent team of advisers. Its founder, Vicky Clement Jones, has been recognised by being made a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. The organisation has tried to involve the users of the service as much as possible.

An important point is that the organisation has made it clear in its statements that there can be no psychological or psychosomatic alternative cure. We often hear the argument that health is all in the mind, but the organisation does not encourage people to believe that the main cause of cancer is psychological and that if they deal with the psychological problem the cancer will go away.

All BACUP services are provided free. The organisation employs 14 staff and its budget this year is £422,000. It is supported by all the cancer charities. In November it asked the DHSS for £40,500. The request is under consideration, and I strongly urge the Minister, although she can probably do nothing today, to grant that request. I understand informally that the Minister may give £10,000. I respect her concern for organisations that predominantly help women, and I ask her to give the service the full amount because it could use it to fund two administrative staff and someone to run the cancer information service. It is the sort of partnership and public access organisation that we must support. I hope that the House recognises the value of such organisations and that the Department will grant the money for which it asks.

There is no great difference across the political spectrum about terminal care. We all want proper provision for the terminally ill, including hospices specially designed to meet the needs of dying people. The theory on which they work is commonly recognised and the Government have responded to them. The circular of 27 February shows that they are committed in principle, but yet again the point at issue is resources. Doctor magazine of 29 January said—it is still true—that the hospice movement is "cash starved". That must be corrected, and the Government must play a key role. The sector is growing. Of course, there is voluntary money, but going round with a begging bowl for money for hospices is always difficult and unreliable. It will be more difficult if one of the key groups of people who need hospice treatment are AIDS sufferers, who may not be the most obvious beneficiaries of charity.

I was in the House when the Minister answered a question about encouraging the partnership between the voluntary sector and the public sector. Of course, that must be done, but there is now a serious challenge given the growth of the AIDS factor in hospice care, which must not be allowed to detract from the continuing and growing need of cancer victims in hospices. I hope that the Government will move quickly to respond to the requests for financial and other support. South-East Thames regional health authority produced an excellent report on AIDS, highlighting the fact that hospice treatment and the funding of it is required.

Perhaps we have reached the stage in the development of the hospice movement where we need an umbrella body to co-ordinate voluntary sector provision. London Lighthouse has made representations to the Government in relation to AIDS. It may be the right organisation or it may not, but we shall need an appropriate forum to provide a proper partnership dialogue between the Government and the voluntary sector.

I hope that the general good will and support for the hospice movement will be recognised and that, in the words of the hon. Member for Springburn, terminal care will become a generally accepted priority for NHS expenditure in every region and district in England and Wales and in every health board in Scotland. That will be increasingly important if the service which the organisations have shown that they can deliver is to be available to everyone who needs it.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) on his choice of subject. If one is lucky in the ballot, it is often tempting to choose a subject that is bound to hit the headlines or one that is of a partisan nature. But, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said, most of us have an interest in this subject because the scourge of cancer is so widespread. This is an especially valuable opportunity to discuss it.

The motion refers to screening for protection against cancer, the treatment of cancer and the care of cancer patients, but it omits to mention—although I was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman mention it during his speech—the prevention of cancer. Alas, we know of no cure for some cancers and we do not know how most cancers are caused, but there is at least one well-known cause of some types of cancer. I refer, of course, to smoking. That cause of cancer is eminently avoidable. Of course, the tobacco companies argue that it has never been possible to isolate an ingredient in tobacco that causes cancer. But there is overwhelming evidence of the link between smoking and cancer. The most obvious type of cancer is lung cancer, but it is also true that a smoker is between five and 10 times more likely to develop cancer of the mouth or the throat than a non-smoker.

I asked the British Medical Association what evidence there was to link smoking with other cancers or whether it could be linked only to the three that I mentioned. It provided me with evidence which is scientific, technical and somewhat beyond my grasp, but it is voluminous. I was surprised by the extent to which cancer of the pancreas, the kidney, the cervix, the urinary tract and the bladder may be associated with smoking.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that some people still believe that the relationship between cigarette smoking and lung cancer is not proven? I ask hon. Members to push as hard as they can to show that that is not true. If we had even one hundredth of the evidence linking smoking with lung cancer showing that Westminster bridge was unsafe, it would be closed within two or three minutes.

Mr. Sims: The hon. Gentleman, who is a general practitioner, is far more knowledgeable on these matters than I am. What he says is true, and he will also know that the tobacco companies still deny it. We all know that if tobacco had only just been discovered and was suddenly introduced today, it would not be allowed on the market. He and I are realistic enough to know that it would not be practical to prohibit tomorrow morning the consumption of tobacco. However, we have to do all that we can to persuade people to cut down on smoking, because not only does it have links with the forms of cancer that he and I have talked about, but there is clear evidence that babies whose mothers smoked in pregnancy are more likely to develop cancer.

There is increasing evidence linking the incidence of cancer with the inhalation of other people's smoke, so-called passive smoking. We should be thankful that smoking is becoming a minority activity and that many people are ceasing to smoke. Unhappily, smoking is increasing among young women. About one third of the adult population smokes and it is becoming less socially acceptable. That should be encouraged. We have just had National No-Smoking Day. Last year, some 50,000 people stopped smoking as a result of the National No-Smoking Day campaign and we hope that that figure will be exceeded this year.

In the light of the evidence, we must hope that the new health education authority will give fresh impetus to the campaigns to discourage the young from taking up smoking, and to encourage smokers to cut down or cut out smoking altogether. There is ample scope for that authority to do more work in educating people and to develop non-smoking policies in public places and workplaces.

Since it is the case, alas, that we cannot prevent all cancers, we must do all that we can to detect cancer in its earliest stages. I warmly welcome the recent announcement about Government funds for this purpose. Breast cancer is responsible for 13,500 deaths a year. Following the Forrest report, the Government agreed to set up a nationwide service for breast cancer screening and to have a centre in operation in each of the regions by this time next year. The target is for 100 centres by 1990. This is good news and will be welcome in all parts of the House.

Cervical cancer causes about 2,000 deaths a year. Funds have been made available for call and recall schemes and for the speeding up of testing. This is important because I am sure that all hon. Members will have experience of constituents who had a smear test and then had to wait weeks for the result. That is not satisfactory. If the funds recently allocated assist in speeding up the testing process, it will be money well spent.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey and I were present a few weeks ago at a press conference held by an organisation called Quest for a Test for Cancer. It claims to have developed a mechanical screening process for cervical smears and says that it is faster and more reliable than conventional processes and can detect cancer at an earlier stage. I do not profess to understand the scientific basis for the test, although I tried to master the papers that the organisation provided, but it seems that the process was devised and tested by qualified people.

The organisation is keen to open centres throughout the country. It has sought help from the DHSS which says, perhaps understandably, that it wants the process to be properly evaluated. The organisation says that it has already held independent tests and has had the process evaluated, but that it does not have the resources to do further testing. With the support of the Royal College of Nursing and many women's organisations, it has started a campaign to raise £2 million to set up centres. I am not medically qualified to judge the validity of this process, but it seems to hold out hope.

Perhaps there is some misunderstanding between this organisation and the DHSS. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), is not one to stand on ceremony. If one wanted somebody to cut through red tape, one would go to her. Perhaps she and her officials could get round a table with people from Quest for a Test for Cancer to see whether there is some way in which the work that it is doing could be accelerated.

Hon. Members will know about St. Christopher's hospice in Beckenham in the borough of Bromley, part of which borough I represent, and of the pioneering work carried out by Dame Cecily Saunders. I do not need to dilate on that, because on 19 February the hospice was the subject of a debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), in whose constituency the hospice is situated. He urged more Government support for the hospice, which at present receives support of about 35 per cent. of its costs. The rest of the money for running the hospice comes from voluntary sources and an enormous number of people do a great deal of voluntary work to raise money.

I know that it is not usual to report conversations that take place in the Tea Room or the Lobby, but I was stopped in the Lobby by one of the Badge Messengers who serve this House so very well. He invited me to sponsor him on a walk in support of St. Christopher's hospice and I was happy to do so. It sounds an interesting sponsored walk because I gather that the stages are between local hostelries. The cause could not be a better one, and I hope that when hon. Members are leaving the Chamber after today's business they will take the opportunity to add to my sponsorship in aid of St. Christopher's.

Government support of 35 per cent. is not enough and my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham suggested that about 50 per cent. would not be out of order. I hope that the Government will consider whether more help can be given to hospices. St. Christopher's does fine work not only in the hospice but in the community. Community care has become known as hospiscare. In that part of north Bromley, the hospice is able to help many families because it is often better for the family and the patient for the patient to spend his last days in the comfort of his home — but with the right sort of care, attention and treatment — rather than in a hospice. That service is limited to the immediate area of St. Christopher's hospice.

About two and a half years ago a similar voluntary hospicecare scheme was set up in the southern part of the borough of Bromley. In that time, 422 patients and families have been helped. On any one day between 30 and 40 people are cared for by South Bromley Hospiscare. The movement has only three full-time nursing sisters, two doctors who voluntarily give their spare time to the movement, a part-time social worker and secretarial staff. Obviously, this sort of work is extremely valuable in helping the patient in the final stages of a terminal illness, in helping the family after bereavement and in educating medical and nursing staff in hospitals on how to cope with the terminally ill. It is a special technique which is not part of the usual training of medical staff. The service enables the patient to spend his or her last days in familiar surroundings as well as releasing a bed in an acute ward for other purposes. It is important, however, that there should be one or two beds available in nearby hospitals for urgent and immediate use if the home situation breaks down or the illness develops in such a way that the patient has to return quickly to hospital.

The recent DHSS letter invited district health authorities to review their care provision for the terminally ill. I hope that the outcome will be the conclusion that each district health authority needs adequate hospital and/or hospice care facilities for cancer patients and adequate domiciliary hospice care services of the kind that I have described. I think that I have shown the value of those services, but to operate properly they must have generous financial support from the health authorities.

I conclude by expressing the hope that some of these points will be recognised by the Government as priorities and will be fully reflected in future funding of the National Health Service.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be brief, as the debate is of great importance to all our constituents. As you will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Government have in effect been found guilty in the Australian court of neglecting national security since 1981. We had expected a statement from the Government at 11 o'clock this morning, as this is the first occasion for many months on which they cannot argue that, although the matter is not sub judice here, it is sub judice in the Australian courts, but there is no announcement on the Annunciator and it is only 15 minutes or so until 11 o'clock. So that we may be prepared, can you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, say whether there has been any request from the Government to make a statement? If not, may we make it clear through you that the House will expect a full statement on Monday before any appeal is lodged in Australia?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I am not aware of any request for a statement. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, such requests normally have to be made before 10 am on a Friday, so it seems that there will not be any statement at 11 o'clock. However, the right hon. Gentleman's request will have been heard and will no doubt be communicated to the Leader of the House and to the Minister responsible.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): I join hon. Members on both sides in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) on giving us the opportunity to debate this important matter which affects ever-increasing numbers of women. Like the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), I must declare an interest as a vice president of the Women's National Cancer Control Campaign since its inception. I am also pleased to record that a former colleague, Mrs. Joyce Butler, was the leading light in getting the campaign started.

The eagerly awaited Forrest report has now been published, with proposals for a national breast cancer screening scheme. Everyone accepts that breast cancer is a killer disease, responsible for the deaths of almost 15,000 women per year, and there are about 24,000 new cases every year. Each year, there are 75,000 deaths among women from all forms of cancer—the highest mortality rate in western Europe or north America. Surgery, radiotherapy, chemotherapy and hormone therapy have produced only modest increases in survival rates after treatment, partly because patients present themselves only after a large tumour has developed. One of the messages that must go out clearly is that medical advice should be sought as soon as there is any suspicion of cancer.

The Forrest report summarises tests carried out in America, Sweden and the Netherlands, and concludes that there is "a convincing case on clinical grounds, for a change in UK policy on the provision of mammographic facilities and the screening of symptom-less women".

[Mrs. Renée Short]

The report states:

"It would not be sensible to introduce mammographic screening on a UK basis without providing the necessary back-up service to assess the abnormalities that would be detected".

The final report said that mammography was effective for mass screening, that priority should be given to the 50 to 64 age group and that screening should be carried out every three years. The report continued:

"These techniques should be carried out by a multi-disciplinary specialist assessment team — an essential pre-requisite of a screening service for breast cancer."

Forrest says that a unit with one mammography machine would need two full-time radiographers, who could carry out basic screening for about 12,000 women per year in the 50 to 64 target age group. Besides radiographers to carry out the basic screening, a high level of expertise in mammography will be needed so that false negatives and false positives which could endanger women's lives can be avoided. That is a major problem in the way in which testing is currently carried out. Radiologists are therefore essential to interpret mammograms and to work with the surgeons who would then have to carry out the surgical procedures. Forrest says:

"An established breast cancer screening programme with 120 basic units (which is what we need) will require 930 whole time equivalent staff, including 40 radiologists and 200 radiographers plus nurses and receptionists."

I hope that the Minister will confirm that those targets will be achieved.

Clearly, there are both manpower and financial implications. There will be considerable financial implications for investment in equipment, buildings and mobile units, amounting to about £18 million, with capital costs of about £31 million at 1985-86 prices. We are thus a long way from achieving the allocation of resources recommended by Forrest. If more frequent screening is required, more staff and equipment will be needed and costs will be proportionately higher. As research and practice improve, other age groups can be screened, but again more trained staff and equipment will be needed. The Secretary of State recently announced his contribution to this urgent programme as £6 million in 1987-88, so we are a long way off the totals recommended by Forrest. Demand for cancer screening will certainly increase among younger women and better training and techniques will save many more lives.

Britain's handling of science policy has been described by the American president of the Institute for Scientific Information as an "anti-science movement". He goes on to say:

"I say shame on you, Mrs. Thatcher, your budget policy is short sighted, it can only lower the cultural and economic standard of living of your nation. And what an ungrateful response it is, both to Britain's noble record of achievement in science and to its current legions of world-class researchers".

It is this lack of support for our scientists and researchers in science, technology and medicine that fuels the brain drain so that, unfortunately, many of our scientists go abroad, often to America, due to the lack of resources available in this country.

The new test for screening cervical cancer has been mentioned. This might be the first time that screening for cancers of the lung, bladder and stomach is a possibility. The test has been devised by doctors at the Whittington hospital. It involves measuring two chemicals in cell samples by liquid chromatography. The test avoids the present rather cumbersome system and results can be achieved at once.

I should like to consider the role that should be played by others who work in this area. A conference of the Royal College of Radiologists was recently told:

"Some existing centres are so bad—they have so many false positives and false negatives—that they positively do harm. We must improve or eliminate these centres or they will threaten the whole screening programme. If word gets around that the tests are inaccurate, women will not take up screening and the cost per patient will rise."

The necessary medical manpower is available if we decide that breast screening is a priority. We are training 32 more radiologists than there are posts available each year. It is not that they are in short supply, but that we do not fund the posts.

The role of general practitioners in persuading patients to accept screening is important. Experience shows that screening for breast cancer is much more likely to be accepted if encouraged by a GP. The response rate has been found to be highest when patients are sent a personal note with a provisional appointment bearing the GP's signature. The signature was found to be a real motivating factor. The Minister should encourage GPs to do that.

A survey by the National Federation of Women's Institutes in conjunction with the Women's National Cancer Control Campaign in England and Wales revealed that 65 per cent. of women had never been told by doctors that they should have a smear test and that 68 per cent of those who had had a first smear test had never had any form of reminder that another test was due. We have a good deal to do to ensure that information is given accurately to women patients, about whom we are most concerned.

Many women are worried that they are not told the results of tests. I hope that the Minister will be able to give us some assurance that she will take up these points with the medical profession.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister and the House, but I have to leave shortly after I complete my speech as I have a constituency duty early in the afternoon.

It would have been wrong if any hon. Member had used this debate as an opportunity to bash the Government or to make too much political capital out of what the Government have done. We do not want any of that in this constructive and helpful debate. Nevertheless, the figures for cancer deaths are a matter of concern.

If by cash injection, exhortation or just plain education the Government can do anything to reduce cancer deaths, they should do it. We will all die of something. That is an incontrovertible fact. Fortunately, none of us—I hope—yet know what we will die of. Some of us will just die of old age, we hope, and drop off the perch. Others, unfortunately, will die of cancer.

We know that 2,000 women die of cervical cancer each year. The tragedy is that most of those deaths are probably preventable. As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) said, few women have the test. Most women do not know whether the test is available and, human nature being what it is, most people do not think about it until far too late.

In the Trent region, people have heard that the smear test will be available for anybody who wants it. That is good news but it suggests, I think correctly, that the service is not yet available for anybody who wants it. There must be some system in which everybody in their sexually active years is called regularly for a smear test. It should not be left to the bright and prudent to make their own arrangements.

The harassed mother and the sexually active, working middle-aged woman just as necessarily need that test. They need to have it drawn to their attention in writing that the service exists, where it exists and what they have to do to take advantage of it. That is not done for the majority of women today.

If we are to reduce or even eliminate the 2,000 deaths annually that are due to cervical cancer, the onus must not be put on women to take their courage in both hands, trot down to the hospital, health centre or doctor and ask to have the test. Doctors are busy people, and most women who have children who they take to the doctor know that all too well. They are sometimes afraid of imposing unnecessary burdens on busy practitioners, so they hesitate to have the test.

A lot of women would come in for a test if called and, for a variety of reasons, they would fail to have the test if not called. We are talking of preventive medicine. We are worried about people's eating and smoking habits. We pontificate and campaign about them. I hope that this debate leads to resources being made available to district health authorities throughout the country to ensure that all women of sexually active age are called, and recalled from time to time, for a smear test.

I believe that most doctors would welcome such a scheme. I hope that none—I know of none—would make women feel that they were wasting the doctor's time, but if there are any I hope that they will be discouraged from making women feel that doctors are busy people and have far more important things to do.

That is my main point, but I should like to make another which has been touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims)—terminal care. I join my hon. Friend in paying a tribute to the hospice movement. We have a hospice in Nottingham and others are planned. It takes a great deal of the burden of physical and mental care and anxiety from the patient and his or her friends or family. The Health Service cannot do that, but it is something that it should encourage more and more.

Hospices attract—in a voluntary capacity generally—men and women of the highest social commitment. They do positive caring and therapeutic work and cannot receive enough praise for that. I hope that, if I die of cancer, the hospice movement will be ready to help when my needs are most. Hospices deserve all the praise that the House can bestow on them, and I support them.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): Hon. Members have spoken constructively in the debate, and I thank the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) for introducing it.

We need not go over the facts and figures again, because it has been demonstrated that cancer is an illness that touches almost every family in the land and many of our constituents. I do not want to go over the ground that has already been covered by hon. Members, but I would like to illustrate some of the problems in the treatment and care of cancer patients with regard to the experience of my constituents in Edmonton.

The problem in the North-East Thames regional health authority area is that proposals have been made to reorganise the treatment of cancer patients. A report has been made and we are now in public consultation, both of which I welcome. That shows that a great deal of genuine interest and concern is being shown by the regional health authority that proper care should be taken of cancer patients.

A great deal of concern has been generated through the consultation process among my constituents and those of hon. Members. They believe that the quality of the treatment will be reduced by the proposals of the regional health authority. It is suggested that there should be a reduction in the regional cancer treatment units from the present figure of nine. The objectives of that are laudable—to improve the care of cancer patients, to improve treatment, increase work on prevention, about which other hon. Members have spoken and to help implement the new Government proposals on screening, which are welcome and which go some way to meeting the genuine criticisms of the process thus far.

In practice, I have grave doubts about the way in which the reorganisation would work. I have raised this subject on the Adjournment, and my hon. Friend the Minister has been helpful and constructive in replying to that. I hope that I can now illustrate one or two points that I did not bring out fully on that occasion. My main concern about the proposals is that there will be a cut in the standard of service to my constituents and others in the region. There would be a drop in the quality of life for cancer sufferers. The concept of the quality of life is increasing in value in cancer treatment, and is something to which we are increasingly turning.

I wonder why my region has decided upon its plan. It is not a financial cut—spending will rise because of its plans. However, cancer treatment services will be radically disrupted in the area. We know that it is not because the region has a poor cancer treatment record; it is one of the better regions in terms of survival rates for cancer sufferers. We know that need for cancer treatment is not declining. Cancer is growing, and, with an increasingly older population, cancer may be claiming more of us than it has in the past.

A report has been brought out by my region called "A Better Cancer Service", which makes it clear that one of the main reasons behind the plans of the region is an increased reliance on chemotherapy, the treatment by drugs. The reliance on drugs is not a universally accepted medical fact. There is a great deal of doubt about the value of relying increasingly on drugs for the treatment of cancer. That worry is not purely restricted to radiographers, but comes also from chemotherapists who believe that, as drugs become more powerful and effective, they may become more toxic and more deaths may result from the side effects of that treatment.
